As long as the church has the power to close the lips of men, so long, and no longer, will superstition rule this world.

Blasphemy is the word that the majority hisses into the ear of the few.

After every argument of the church has been answered, has been refuted, then the church cries, "Blasphemy!"

Blasphemy is what an old mistake says of a newly discovered truth.

Blasphemy is what a withered last year's leaf says to a this year's bud.

Blasphemy is the bulwark of religious prejudice.

Blasphemy is the breastplate of the heartless.

And let me say now, that the crime of blasphemy, as set out in this statute, is impossible. No man can blaspheme a book. No man can commit blasphemy by telling his honest thought. No man can blaspheme a God, or a Holy Ghost, or a son of God. The infinit cannot be blasphemed.

In the olden time, in the days of savagery and superstition, when some poor man was struck by lightning, or when a blackened mark was left on the breast of a wife and mother, the poor savage supposed that some God, angered by something he had done, had taken his revenge. What else did the savage suppose? He believed that this God had the same feelings, with regard to the loyalty of his subjects, that an earthly chief had, or an earthly king, with regard to the loyalty or treachery of members of his tribe, or citizens of his kingdom. So the savage said, when his country was visited by a calamity, when the flood swept the people away, or the storm scattered their poor houses in fragments: "We hav allowed some Freethinker to liv; some one is in our town or village who has not brought his gift to the priest, his incense to the altar; some man of our tribe or of our country does not respect our God." Then, for the purpose of appeasing the supposed God, for the purpose of again winning a smile from heaven, for the purpose of securing a little sunlight for their fields and homes, they drag the accused man from his home, from his wife and children, and with all the ceremonies of pious brutality, shed his blood. They did it in self-defense; they believed that they were saving their own lives and the lives of their children; they did it to appease their God. Most people are now beyond that point. Now, when disease visits a community, the intelligent do not say the disease came because the people were wicked; when the cholera comes, it is not because of the Methodists, of the Catholics, of the Presbyterians, or of the Infidels. When the wind destroys a town in the far West, it is not because somebody there had spoken his honest thoughts. We are beginning to see that the wind blows and destroys without the slightest reference to man, without the slightest care whether it destroys the good or the bad, the irreligious or the religious. When the lightning leaps from the clouds it is just as likely to strike a good man as a bad man, and when the great serpents of flame climb around the houses of men, they burn just as gladly and just as joyously, the home of virtue, as they do the den and lair of vice.

Then the reason for all these laws has failed. The laws were made on account of a superstition. That superstition has faded from the minds of intelligent men and, as a consequence, the laws based on the superstition ought to fail.

What Jeremiah Hacker Has Done.

I wish you could giv me for a month or two one-fourth as much space as you giv to some others on less important subjects. I could then finish up my life's work and get ready to die, for I begin to feel weary of life and look forth longingly for that quiet rest that "knows no waking," yet am brimful and running over with truths that might benefit the condition of this poverty-stricken and priest-and-ruler-cursed world, if I had the means, or could find a paper to scatter my thoughts among the people. I hav always believed that I delivered the first real Infidel lecture ever delivered in this nation, more than sixty years ago, when there was not a Liberal paper in the country. I think I can prove by files of old papers that I published the first article ever published in this nation against land-robbers and in favor of free land for all. I know that I can prove by the files of the paper I published seventeen years in Maine, and by other papers, that I was the means, without the help of any other paper, of getting a law in Maine to giv every landless man who would cultivate it a farm lot for only fifty cents an acre—all to be paid in labor, making their own roads, the same as free; where, I am now told, scores of families hav good farms who never would hav owned an acre if I had not got that law.

I can prove by the files of my old paper and others that, with no help of any paper but my own, I induced the state of Maine to establish a reform school for juvenil offenders, to which boys are brought, away from the evil influences of old offenders in county prisons, educated, taught good trades, and sent forth honest men. There are usually from one hundred to two hundred boys in that school, and within the last forty years several thousands of boys hav gone forth honest men, who, had it not been for that school, would hav been further corrupted in the county jails and sent out to curse the world.

I can prove by your own columns that I was the means of starting the "Children's Corner" in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which, under the able management of the noble Miss Wixon, has proved so successful. I also hav a letter on file that will prove that I was the means of starting the "Children's Corner" in the Boston Investigator, that Elmina has so ably managed. I can also produce a copy of the Nashville (Tenn.) Liberal to prove that I introduced the "Children's Corner" into that paper, which the generous-hearted Ella E. Gibson has been conducting on a bed of sickness, robbed of her pension by our "blessed" government, after losing her health while serving as a chaplain and nurse in the army of our "Godless" but priest-ridden nation. These things are only as "drops to a bucketful" of what I hav done in the last sixty-five years, without regard enough for my own comfort to hav a decent suit of clothes or a comfortable home; but I do not mention them boastingly, for I hav done nothing more than my duty to my fellow-men, nor nearly so much as I could hav done if I could hav had sufficient means to work with. But I mention them that people may know who and what I am, and to ask if THE TRUTH SEEKER or any other paper in this nation is willing to giv me space to say what I want to for the good of our race before I die.

I notice that some writers can hav from one to three columns every week in Liberal papers to tell about blue skies, lofty mountains, flowing streams, golden sunsets, and are well paid for it; or about whether the mind or body first existed, or some other nonsense; but if I send an article, intended to show that every man has a natural right to land enough to make a home and raise his food on, it is either thrown into the waste-basket or kept back several weeks, while my lamp of life is fast running out.

We hav been living twenty years in a cottage of rough boards, battened over the cracks, but the cold wind blows through it in winter. Poor Metta, who wore herself out years ago, waiting on ungrateful friends, told me a month ago that she would rather die than liv another winter in so cold a place; so I hav run in debt for money at the risk of losing all, and now we hav a warm, comfortable little home; and, notwithstanding we are in debt, I wish to do something more before I die to help secure to every man his natural right to the land, that he may hav a home. What say you, Mr. TRUTH SEEKER, will you publish this and welcome me to your columns, or must I look for some other paper?

Remember this one thing, viz., that the time is near when there must be a change in our government, a better class of rulers elected, or there will be a more terrible war than this country has ever known; and the papers must be backing the people and lead them through the danger. The time, too, is near when every landless man will demand his birthright to land enough on which to build a home. This question will, ere long, claim as much attention as slavery did before the war, and will shed as much blood if papers do not do their duty.

Berlin, N. J. J. HACKER.

Can the Finite Comprehend the Infinit?

Is it not surprising that men of thought and education should ever giv a negativ reply to this question? But it is even so that many able Freethinkers, when confronted with this question, will drop their heads and hands, and meekly murmur, "No, no, of course, it cannot."

Now, the fact is that the finite can comprehend the infinit, and it is surprising that anyone should doubt it. But it is presumable that many hav not given much thought to the subject, and hence hav accepted the ancient idea without suspecting its fallacy. It is commonly defended in this wise: "Comprehension means to take in. That which contains a thing must be larger than the thing contained. A peck measure will not contain a bushel. Therefore the finite cannot contain or comprehend the infinit."

The trouble with the above is that there is no true comparison between taking in physically and taking in or comprehending mentally. For the fact is, we do comprehend things vastly greater than we are, millions of times the size of our heads. There is the infinitly small as well as the infinitly large. The infinit is simply the boundless, the limitless; it may be little or much, and to assert that one cannot comprehend the limitless seems absurd on the face of it. Yet, for the purpose of making it still clearer to some who may not hav thought on the subject, I giv a few illustrations.

Think of a drop of water. Think of it as divided, and one-half of it divided again, and then again, and so on; as long as you hav anything left you can conceive its being divided, and you cannot conceive of division as annihilating matter. You may conceive that when you hav only one molecule of water left the next act of division will convert it into two gases of hydrogen and oxygen, and you can then still conceive of division without limit. Some philosophers claim that every square inch of matter can or may be converted from a solid to a liquid, from a liquid to a gaseous, from a gaseous to an ethereal condition, or to such forces as light, heat, electricity, magnetism, thought, etc. In brief, that matter is condensed force, and that force is but matter etherealized. However this may be, it is evident that our own thoughts can be expanded or divided without limit.

Next, let us consider space. Space is infinit. Can we comprehend it? Nothing is easier. If we think of going to the most distant visible star, we think of space beyond that, and beyond the next, and so on. It is utterly impossible for us to conceive of a limit to the distance we might go. The infinit is but a limitless repetition or division of the finite. So it is with time. It is impossible to conceive of its commencement or of its end. Eternity may seem wonderful, but not mysterious or incomprehensible. An infinit form or number is not conceivable, because forms hav boundaries, and a number is a certain sum. We may properly speak of an infinit numerosity or multitude. It is also a wrong use of words to speak of the infinit as perfect. The perfect must hav limits. Perfection is a limit of itself. Neither can the infinit properly be said to be good or bad, for the infinit, or limitless, can hav no defined condition but that of limitlessness and conditionlessness. The infinit has neither center nor circumference—up nor down. Intelligence, reason, love, hope, thought, feeling, good and bad, are all purely finite attributes, and cannot be applied to the infinit.

Let us be alive to discover all the sophistries of our own arguments, as well as those of our opponents. "If a man fool me once, shame on him; if he fool me twice, shame on me." C. L. HASKELL.

Going, Going! When Will It Be Gone?

The Tribune of this city is a Christian journal on its editorial pages, and its editorials are often written by ministers out of a job. One of these lucubrations upon Christianity and evolution, printed Sunday before last, possesses some significance, therefore, as showing how far religion is surrendering to science. The editorial is made up of admissions as follows:

1. The foremost theologians openly avow their belief in the main theories of evolution.

2. The ministerial opposers of the theory are obscure preachers who do not attract the attention of either the men of science or the leaders of Christian thought.

3. Even Cardinal Gibbons attempts the reconciliation of science and Catholicism.

4. The organ of the English church admits that evolution may fairly claim to be an established doctrin.

5. That to harmonize the theory of natural selection with the Christian doctrin of special creation, it is necessary to throw away the design argument; and this "has already been done everywhere except in some theological seminaries where Paley still reigns supreme."

Another admission made by this writer will fill the reader with amazement. It is that Milton's "Paradise Lost," not the Bible, is responsible for the special creation theory; and that as Milton was only a man, it can be no slur upon God to repudiate it. The writer says: "Science predicates nothing as to the primary origin of life, and religion predicates nothing as to the origin of the present forms of life. Indeed, it may be said that science, though apparently cruel, was really kind in forcing religion to scan more closely its records. For the result has been to show that the essential positions of religion are not endangered by any facts which science has thus far established. For a long time it was supposed that Christianity was irrevocably committed to the theory of special creations, which evolution has swept away. But Christian scholars are now beginning to acknowledge that this theory derived its support not so much from the account of the creation in the Bible as from the account of the creation in 'Paradise Lost.' And to-day this theory, which Milton's great epic did so much to fix upon the consciousness of English Christendom, is not seriously held by the greatest scholars in the English church."

When Professor Huxley, in his lectures upon Evolution in this city, took up the "Miltonic theory" and pierced it with shafts of ridicule, the public laughed at his neat method of opposing the Bible. But the great Agnostic has been outdone by a churchman. John Milton is the theological sinner for whose mistakes the church has suffered the sneers of the intelligent world for the past few years. Milton is now to be thrown overboard, and, presto, change! Genesis is a scientific text-book of wonderful accuracy!

Paraphrasing the words of Mr. Huxley, one who is not a Christian theologian can only stand aside and admire the marvelous flexibility of a religion which admits of so many interpretations, commentations, and explanations, and still remains the same original Jacobs of a faith. The thaumaturgy of Moses becomes the most simple of legerdemain tricks beside the wonderful twistings of Christian "scholars."

One Useless Association.

In April the National Reform Association will hold a national convention in this city. For years this organization has been endeavoring to obtain the aid of prominent men in pressing its absurd, illegal, tyrannical, and un-American claims, but until now it has not met with marked success. The circular calling the present convention, however, bears the signatures of many gentlemen whom we should not expect to find in the company of Joseph Cook, Bishop Coxe, and their fellow-fanatics. Judges Davis and Groo of this city, Professor Seelye of Amherst, and the vice-chancellor of the University of New York will derive no fame from an alliance with the National Reform Association.

The purpose of this convention is to affect the constitutional convention of this state, when convened, and to induce the delegates there to insert in the new constitution "the fundamental principles of Christian morality, since the common law of our state recognizes the Bible as the foundation of our system of jurisprudence." The preamble and moving article of the constitution of the association is as follows:

"Believing that almighty God is the source of all power and authority in civil government, that the Lord Jesus Christ is the ruler of nations, and that the revealed will of God is of supreme authority in civil affairs;

"Remembering that this country was settled by Christian men, with Christian ends in view, and that they gave a distinctly Christian character to the institutions which they established;

"Perceiving the subtle and persevering attempts which are made to prohibit the reading of the Bible in our public schools, to overthrow our Sabbath laws, to corrupt the family, to abolish the oath, prayer in our national and state legislatures, days of fasting and thanksgiving, and other Christian features of our institutions, and so to divorce the American government from all connection with the Christian religion;

"Viewing with grave apprehension the corruption of our politics, the legal sanction of the liquor traffic, and the disregard of moral and religious character in those who are exalted to high places in the nation;

"Believing that a written Constitution ought to contain explicit evidence of the Christian character and purpose of the nation which frames it, and perceiving that the silence of the Constitution of the United States in this respect is used as an argument against all that is Christian in the usage and administration of our government;

"We, citizens of the United States, do associate ourselvs under the following articles, and pledge ourselvs to God, and to one another, to labor, through wise and lawful means, for the ends herein set forth:

"The object of this society shall be to maintain the existing Christian features in the American government, to promote needed reform in the action of the government touching the Sabbath, the institutions of the family, the religious element in education, the oath, and public morality as affected by the liquor traffic and kindred evils, and to secure such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will declare the nation's allegiance to Jesus Christ, and its acceptance of the moral laws of the Christian religion, and so indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all the Christian laws, institutions, and usages of our government on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land."

Accompanying the circular is also this blank for those voters to sign who think more of a foreign potentate than they do of American principles:

"The undersigned, who has sympathized and acted with the.....party, desires that the future platforms of that party shall not fail to contain an acknowledgment of Almighty God as the source of authority and power in civil government, of Christ as the King of all nations, and of the supreme authority of his moral laws; together with declarations favoring the Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic, the Defense of the Sabbath, the Christian features of our Public Education, and a National Marriage and Divorce law in harmony with the law of Christ."

If anyone can conceive of a scheme to more completely revolutionize this government we should like to hear from them. The Anarchists are conservativs compared with the Christians who run this organization, and the old Puritan times unlimited liberty beside the reign of religious terror it would usher in. An Infidel, under these proposed laws, would hav about as much right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness as a child in the claws of a tiger.

The National Reform Association is the antithesis of the American Secular Union. The two organizations are political enemies. The one is seeking to more closely unite church and state; the other to more completely divorce them. The National Reform Association is the crystallization of the dishonest spirit which would rob the Atheist, Jew, and pagan for the benefit of the church; the other is the honest protest of true Americans against the domineering and tyrannical religion which, when in power, effectually suppressed all freedom.

There is, however, no call for the existence of the Reform Association. The churches are getting the practical fruits of a united church and state by less open but no less efficient means. Their success as a beggar is greater than it will be as a highway robber. The National Reform Association should not call public attention to pious depredations.

Queer Infidel Writing.

It may be mean to reveal the secrets of the correspondence editor of the New York World, but circumstances seem to require his unmasking. In the weekly World recently appeared the following:

"L. A.—No one can 'make out a good case against the Christian Bible and the Christian religion,' or against any Bible or any religion, for the reason that a negativ cannot be proven. The burden of proof lies upon him who affirms. If you are satisfied with the evidences of Christianity, that should settle the question. Hundreds of books were written in reply to Paine, but none that hav lived, as they were not required. Paine was a very religious and devout man. If living now, he would be considered a very good Christian. He founded the Unitarian church, and the Rev. Henry W. Bellows, D.D., was his legitimate successor. The objection to Paine was not to his 'Infidelity,' but to his teaching different theology from that of his day, and to his abuse of the priests of the other denominations. Watson's 'Apology' and Paley's 'Evidences' are the books you should read; although in this day and generation it sounds strange to hear that the quibblings of Paine need refutation. If you will read the Rev. John Chadwick's 'Bible of To-Day,' Matthew Arnold's 'God and the Bible,' 'Supernatural Religion,' Mill's 'Posthumous Essays,' or any of the other 'Infidel' works of the present time, you will see that Paine's objections hav no weight whatever with modern skeptics. Paine, of course, had no special knowledge of the subject, and his objections were surface objections only. Ingersoll is a bird of the same feather—honest, perhaps, but ignorant. The question of the sufficiency of the evidence in favor of Christianity is not one for the uneducated or untrained to discuss, while the question of religion (theology) involves the very highest exercise of the human intellect and the resolution of the most abstruse problem that has ever been presented to the mind of man—the quantification of the predicate, or determination of the law of contradictories and excluded middle—words that convey no meaning to ninety-nine out of a hundred. In this respect religion does not differ from science—the vast majority of mankind must accept the statements of men in whose special knowledge they repose confidence, and not attempt to find out for themselvs. Suppose every person should doubt the almanac and undertake to figure out the eclipses and transits, how much better off would they be?"

As soon as the mail distributed the World, indignant Freethinkers began to send this anomalous paragraph to us; and in the last Investigator a gentleman occupies a column or so in discussing it as a piece of waggery. Among others who forwarded us a copy was Mr. S. E. Sower, of Michigan, who accompanied it by several pages of "refutation" and argument, with a request also that we forward it to the World if it is found unsuitable for our columns. Having a pretty fair idea of the motivs moving the editors of daily papers, and seeing, what every careful reader must see in the paragraph, that the editor wrote it with reservations and double meanings, we thought it scarcely worth while to print the reply sent us; and so sent it forward to the World. In reply we received this letter from the author of the libel on Paine and Ingersoll:

"THE WORLD PUBLICATION OFFICE,
"PARK ROW, NEW YORK, Feb. 20, 1888.

"Dear Sir: Will you kindly return the inclosed letter, article, and clubbing to the writer with my kindest regards and best wishes? If he had what ancient Greeks and modern street Arabs call 'gnous,' he would know that this answer was written by an Infidel and Agnostic. If he could only read between the lines, he would doubtless very readily see, as you hav already observed, that the point is made, or rather assumed, that after eighteen hundred years no one has been able to bring forward a single reason worthy attention why there should be a Christian religion, or any religion. Mr. Sower may be a good man, but he is not a wise one. He reminds me of the man described in Mark iv, 7—the thorns are very apt to choke him when he goes out by the wayside. Yours truly, T. E. WILLSON.

"TRUTH SEEKER,
28 Lafayette place, City."

We are pleased, of course, to learn that Mr. Willson is an Infidel and Agnostic, but at the same time we fail to see what exigencies of even daily journalism demanded that he should reveal that fact in the manner in which he did. His sarcastic references to Christian theology and the evidence obtainable as to its truth do not, it seems to us, require as an offset the slurs upon Paine and Ingersoll. Paine's "Age of Reason" is not quibbling, but a straightforward statement of objections to the Bible, which objections are as forceful now as when first made, and no more easily answered. Evolution, it is true, has since Paine's time furnished modern Infidelity with additional weapons, but as a document to convert church-members from their folly, "The Age of Reason" is to-day more useful than Darwin's "Descent of Man" or one of Spencer's essays. And to call Col. Robert G. Ingersoll ignorant is a work of supererogation, not demanded, we should judge, of even a penny-a-liner on a popular journal. Fealty to an employer, and submission to public superstitions, do not oblige a man to lie about a fellow-Agnostic.

If it was Mr. Willson's object to get an advertisment of the World, he has succeeded. If his intention was to intelligibly answer a bona-fide question, he has lamentably failed. May he learn wisdom from experience.

Girard College Theology.

In June of last year Mr. S. R. Wetherill, of Jobstown, N. J., engaged the editor of the Philadelphia Presbyterian in controversy over the perversion of Girard's bequest. The editor pretended to know little of the matter, but he was ably assisted by Dr. Herman B. Allyn, who has resided at the college for a year or more. He thus describes the religious services of the college:

"There is a chapel service, held twice a day, at which all boys who are not sick are expected to be present. At this service a portion of scripture is read by one of the officers of the college, generally the president or vice-president, while the boys read in concert a psalm or two, and at the after noon service sing a hymn; then a prayer is read by the one who conducts the service. A manual containing the psalms, arranged metrically for every day of the month, and selected hymns and prayers, is placed in the hands of each boy. The service is a simple and a very impressiv one. On Sundays there is in addition a discourse from some layman. No denominational religious instruction of any kind is given, nor are doctrinal points touched upon by the speakers, though in the prayers and hymns could be found some references to them, such as the trinity. These, I am sure, the boys themselvs rarely, if ever, notice.

"In addition to the chapel service, there is reading of the scriptures in the section and school-rooms. The Bible is used so much because, it is to be supposed, it was deemed impossible to instil the purest principles of morality without the Bible as a text-book."

Dr. Allyn's admissions alone will almost make a case for the courts. Two assemblages a day solely to teach religion, when Girard ordered that religion should not be taught; hymns, and prayers, and trinitarian doctrin, when Girard directed that no sectarianism should be allowed; discourses by lay preachers, violating the spirit of Girard's positiv prohibition against the clergy; scriptures in the school-room, when Girard stipulated that morality only should be taught the boys—all these constitute a good case against the trustees of the college. Under the plea of teaching morals they are instilling into the minds of the orphan boys their own peculiar sectarian religion, which has about as much to do with morality as a Methodist minister has to do with virtue.

It is certain that the Girard College management ought to be overhauled in the interest of honesty, and from respect to Stephen Girard's memory. Will not Judge Westbrook set the ball in motion?

Editorial Notes.

THE Mormon church has a membership of five or six thousand in Arizona, with thirty-five churches. They hav taken up all the best lands in that territory, and the Christians round about desire to persecute them.

THE professional charitable societies and the Young Men's Christian Associations are endeavoring to hav the interstate commerce law so amended that their officers and members can receive "courtesies" at the hands of railroad officials, and the Congressional committee is reported as favoring the scheme.

THE Catholic Union and Times says: "It would appear from the Roman correspondence of some of our English exchanges that, besides the beautiful copy of the Constitution of the United States, President Cleveland made a personal gift to Leo XIII. on occasion of his golden jubilee. It consisted of an exquisit jeweled card tray, with a plush base richly embroidered by Mrs. Cleveland. The dainty gift was accompanied by a cordial letter, which is said to hav given the holy father singular pleasure." Mr. Cleveland evidently learned a thing or two from Mr. Blaine in the last presidential canvass. He is working the Catholic vote for all it is worth.

MR. FRED. MAY HOLLAND, of Concord, Mass., has just finished a lecture on "Wages and Tariffs," and is ready to make engagements for its delivery, as well as for that of his lectures entitled, "The Medieval Millennium; or, Christianity As It Was," and, "Christus vs. Cosmos; or, Christianity As It Is."

THE Herald reports that the Rev. W. S. Rainsford, rector of St. George's Episcopal church, has resigned from the Nineteenth Century Club because Colonel Ingersoll had been invited to address the organization. The Rev. Mr. Rainsford evidently knows it all, and desires no further information.

A BAPTIST minister of Linesville, Pa., denies Canon Taylor's statement that the followers of Mohammed constitute the most powerful temperance society on earth, and says that in fact the Mohammedans are a drunken people. The minister is either ignorant or vicious. The Koran prohibits the use of wine, and the Mohammedans obey it strictly. The Mohammedans hav many sins to answer for, but drunkenness is not one of them.

THE Advocate, Methodist organ, quotes ex-Judge Noah Davis as follows: "He who is treacherous to the dead is not fit to associate with the living." The organ adds: "What a history of corrupt executors, defaulting trustees of benevolent institutions, unjustly contested wills, indecently hasty marriages, and dishonored family names the remark suggests!" We hope the trustees of Girard College subscribe for the Advocate and will read and ponder these two remarks.

A NOTICE in Secular Thought asks those Freethinkers in Toronto who are willing to come together to form a Sunday Association 'for the purpose of endeavoring to remove the present absurd and unjust restrictions placed upon the seventh day by orthodox superstition." To borrow a Boston interrogativ colloquialism, what is the matter with the Toronto Secular Society? It occurs to us that if the Liberal societies already existing in Canada and this country should go into practical work of this sort they would grow in numbers and influence, besides doing incalculable good.

THE Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER rises to remark that the free trade article published in these columns a few weeks since, and widely copied by other journals, was not written by himself, as erroneously charged. He would also explain that Mr. Van Buren Denslow alone is responsible for the sentiments expressed in the essay on the distribution of wealth. We giv all subjects and all sides an impartial hearing, and we never accept or reject a communication because its thought agrees or disagrees with the editorial think. A big paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER with only one thought in it would be monotonous reading.

THE following is the text of the oath bill prepared by Mr. Bradlaugh for the benefit of heretics. It has precedence for the second reading in Parliament on the 14th inst.: "Be it enacted by the queen's most excellent majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows: '1. Every person, upon objecting to being sworn, shall be permitted to make his solemn affirmation instead of taking an oath, in all places and for all purposes where an oath is or shall be required by law, which affirmation shall be of the same force and effect as if he had taken the oath; and if any person making such affirmation shall willfully, falsely, and corruptly affirm any matter or thing which, if deposed on oath, would hav amounted to willful and corrupt perjury, he shall be liable to prosecution, indictment, sentence, and punishment in all respects as if he had committed willful and corrupt perjury. 2. Every such affirmation shall be as follows: "I A. B., do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm," and then proceed with the words of the oath prescribed by law, omitting any words of imprecation or calling to witness. 3. This act may be cited as the Affirmation act, 1888.'"

MR. CROWLEY, the Central park chimpanzee, has just recovered from a severe attack of pneumonia. Mr. Crowley is a natural teetotaler, and if naturalized would probably vote the Prohibition ticket, but under direction of the doctor he took whisky and milk for his infirmity. When he was convalescent, a "Christian Scientist" visited him and asked the superintendent of the arsenal for permission to pray for Mr. Crowley. The disciple of faith-healing was persistent, and though Mr. Conklin had not much confidence in the "science," he thought at any rate it would be a diversion for the patient, and a little praying wouldn't hurt him. So the scientist in all seriousness and faith knelt before the cage and asked heaven's aid in restoring Mr. Crowley to health. Mr. Crowley didn't seem to take any interest in the proceedings. He turned his back sadly on the religious enthusiast and lay down on a meal-sack to hav a snooze. The Christian scientist prayed on for several minutes. In the course of the prayer the kneeling man said, in an earnest, argumentativ manner, "Now, Crowley, you are not sick; I am sure you are not. Crowley, come rise up and show that you are not." At the instant the chimpanzee arose, approached the side of his cage, and offered to shake hands with the gentleman. "What did I tell you? What did I tell you?" enthusiastically exclaimed the faith doctor. "He'll get well now. I won't need to see him again. I'll pray for him at home." Mr. Conklin said: "You would do a thriving business as a horse doctor," and turning to a reporter added: "He will probably claim credit for saving Crowley's life. I wish he had come Sunday night. Crowley wouldn't hav raised up then for the devil." But the "Christian Scientist" is satisfied that he saved the monkey's life.

MR. WALLACE H. MOORE thinks it strange that we should publish Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the Rev. Dr. Field and not publish Dr. Field's letters. For Mr. Moore's information we may say that we printed as much of the controversy as we could, selecting that part which is of the greater interest to our readers. If, in doing this, we were unfair to the Christians, then Mr. Field is unfair to the Infidels in printing his letters in pamphlet form without printing Colonel Ingersoll's replies. We may add, too, that neither THE TRUTH SEEKER nor the Evangelist had the legal right to reprint all the controversy. Moreover, the North American Review publisher has put the matter into handsome book form—both Dr. Field's and Colonel Ingersoll's articles—and THE TRUTH SEEKER is anxious to help him spread the gospel by selling it.

"NEW YORK, Feb. 17, 1888.

"DEAR MR. MACDONALD: That irrepressible brother of yours has just sent me the fourth number of the breezy little paper he and Mr. Putnam hav started in San Francisco.

"I want to say to you—and I am not afraid to say it right to your face—that I think your brother George one of the wittiest writers of the day. He is always interesting and always funny.

"He makes more out of small capital than any humorous writer I know. Given as a subject a twine string two and one-half inches long, he would contrive to say something about the frizzle in the end of it that would make the deacon in the front row relax his prehistoric glare of discontent into the facial gyration which passes in his circle for a smile.

"If I were not too ill to write in a proper and becoming manner, I should seat myself at my desk and make this charge directly to your brother; but since I am compelled to write from the depths of an arm-chair, and trust to providence that the recipient of my pencil-tracks will be able to read the note and keep his reason, I concluded to send this note to you. You hav already proved yourself equal to such a strain. It might be too much for your brother if it were sprung upon him suddenly. If you tell him what I say, break it to him gently, and add that you feel sure I meant well.

"Sincerely, HELEN H. GARDENER."

It givs us pleasure to note that there is no professional jealousy between the heretical humorist of New York and the amateur joker of San Francisco, whose attention is respectfully called to the subjoined document:

"NEW YORK, March 4, 1888.

"Messrs Putnam and Macdonald, 504 Kearny street, San Francisco.

"To THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, DR.

"To one reading notice (Helen Gardener of G. E. M.). $50.

"Claims for damages must be made within thirty days, or they will not be allowed in final settlement."

MR. SEAVER, in answer to a question, givs the following as a probably correct list of Liberal papers: THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Investigator, Ironclad Age, Freethought, Public Opinion, Secular Thought, Winsted Press, Standard, Independent Pulpit, and Fire Fly. With two of these, Public Opinion and Fire Fly, we are not acquainted. Henry George's Standard is not a Liberal journal, by any means. The Winsted Press is only so-so; Mr. Pinney, the editor, is a very able and bright writer, of Liberal tendencies, and the Press is probably the best of the patent-outside local journals in Connecticut. But Mr. Seaver overlooked some papers. Messrs. Walker and Harman will be surprised not to see Lucifer in the list; Mr. Tucker, of Liberty, would undoubtedly deny that his paper is a Christian sheet; and Moses Hull, though inclined to Spiritualism, calls New Thought a Liberal paper. The American Idea will print heresy when it gets its new press, and the Progressive Age is at it now. Lum's Alarm is zealously inimical to the church, and the Open Court cannot be called a pious paper. The Banner of Light, Foundation Principles, Olive Branch, and the Better Way are usually classed among heretical prints, though their specialty is Spiritualism. There are also a score or more of local papers which reach this office whose editors dare speak their minds on religious subjects, and their minds are not in subjection to the church. Besides these, the North American Review, the Forum, and the Popular Science Monthly print a vast deal of good Infidelity; and the daily press is subjected to the abuse of the preachers. England has four or five Atheistic publications, Australia two, and India one. Altogether, the cause of Freethought is well supported by papers; we wish we could say the papers are well supported by Freethinkers.

From the London Table.

I am disposed to take an extreme and sour view, having been moved by the fearless and outspoken statements of a canon of the English church, to question seriously within myself what is the actual and practical good of the professed Christianity of England at this present time. A tree is known by its fruits. What are the fruits of this? We are not particular about making its blessings apparent at home. We liv in a land absolutely seething with want, misery, ignorance, and vice in its most degrading and debasing forms, and for all the adequate efforts we make to cope with these crying evils we might as well profess a frank paganism or sacrifice to Mumbo Jumbo instead of going to church.

But the activity that is spared at home is conspicuously and uselessly displayed abroad. The money that might well be spent in civilizing Britons is lavished in futil efforts to convert Hindoos who do not care to be converted, and, in the generality of cases, undergo a marked moral deterioration after they hav gone through the process. Mohammedanism is, without an effort, making enormous strides in the East; Christianity, with enormous efforts, none at all.

Canon Taylor, quoting from the returns of the Church Missionary Society, says that in India last year 841 missionaries spent £48,000 in making 297 converts. In Ceylon, 374 agents secured 2.7 converts at a cost of £10,138 17s. 6d., and in Persia, Palestine, Arabia, and Egypt together, it required all the efforts of 109 missionaries and nativ agents at a cost of £11,804 9s. 6d. to baptize one person!

It may be argued that the worth of a human soul is not to be estimated in currency. That may be so, and it may be also that the particular Jew, Turk, Infidel, or heretic whose baptismal expenses amounted to £11,804 9s. 6d. is a bargain at the money, but only think how many human English souls could be saved, and how many human English stomachs filled, at a tithe of the expense.

Letters from Friends.

HELENA, NEB., Feb. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. M. A. Freeman gave three lectures at this place, and I want the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to know that I think that she is considerably above the average of the Liberal lecturers that I hav heretofore listened to. She is eloquent, talented, and logically argumentativ. She ought not to be idle. Brother Liberals, don't giv her any rest—let her voice be heard in our behalf continually.

Truly, W. P. BROOKS, M.D.

LOYSBURG, PA., Jan. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER arrives on Saturday, and with it for a companion on Sunday, that day is robbed of much of its dulness. Heston's pictures speak volumes, and I cannot understand why any Liberal could not indorse them. For my part, I think the paper in every particular is just what we want.

The life of a truth seeker in this place is not altogether a pleasant one. Some of the arguments used by so-called Christians here in their efforts to convert Infidels are social ostracism, anathemas, and a polite request for the blasphemer to leave town. How convincing such arguments are you can imagin. Some orthodox persons here, who deal honestly only when they are closely watched, will abuse you for saying you do not believe a God ever committed murder or advised his chosen people to steal. Thusly it is in Loysburg. Yours fraternally, W. R. HARTMAN.

DEERSVILLE, O., Jan. 22, 288.

MR. EDITOR: The two combats between Colonel Ingersoll and Rev. Mr. Field are worth a year's subscription. In my view of the case, Field is nowhere. Even some Christians here say the same, while others deny it, and I am compelled to tell the latter that they are either woefully ignorant of language or they are wilful, intelligent liars, which is rather rough, I admit.

Again, the young man you mention (on page 24) who was sent to prison for a long time is a sample of the products of Christianity throughout the world. We hav five bankrupts in our town, and every one of them is a loud-professing Christian, and has sworn lies to cheat his creditors. But by faith in Christ or Santa Claus at the last moment they will all meet in heaven, with their thieves, robbers, and murderers. What a jolly set they will be! They will be so pious that they will all hav their ears stopped up with wool on Sunday to keep them from hearing the dogs barking. But they will hav to remove the wool occasionally to hear each other play on their golden harps. So you see heaven will be filled with those pious characters, while hell will be crammed with honest Freethinkers. So we must prepare for our doom.

OBITUARY.

January 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: On January, the 9th inst., Mrs. Sarah Goddard, the wife of our esteemed Liberal friend, Thomas Goddard, left this earth-life. Deceased was sixty-six years of age. The family came from England during the late war, and hav been residents of DuQuoin and vicinity for several years. The writer has been acquainted with the family for nearly fourteen years, and never knew a more exemplary woman. She was a benevolent mother and kind, affectionate companion. The same love and affection was reciprocated by her husband and children. During all these years I never heard an unkind word from her, or from anyone directed to her. The family has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER almost from its commencement, and are thorough Liberals. Mrs. Goddard died in the faith in which she had for many years lived. That faith—or rather, a knowledge—was to do all the good she could while living and make those around her as happy as possible, believing if there was a future life she could not make a better preparation to enter it than by such a practice. We, who are left to mourn her loss, will ever remember her noble example. WM. A. THOMPSON.

WORCESTER, MASS., Feb. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: There are a number of subscribers to your admirable paper in this church-ridden city, but it is seldom that I see any letters from friends here, and as we hav a very flourishing society of Liberals I thought you and THE TRUTH SEEKER readers would be interested in our work. The society is called the Worcester Liberal Union, and has a lecture at 5 P.M. every Sunday. When we organized we had but few members and small audiences, but now, although less than a year old, we hav more than doubled in membership, and the audience has increased in a still larger proportion. Last Sunday evening the hall was filled to overflowing to hear Dr. C. L. Haskell lecture on the subject, "Good Reasons for Atheism." The popular doctor appeared in his usual dignified manner, delivering a lecture that elicited hearty applause from the audience every few moments. He began by relating his experience as a Christian, and how he gradually outgrew the absurd dogmas of the church. Then he proceeded to show the impossibility of the existence of the Christian God. It was a most masterly effort and will long be remembered for the clear-cut logic and illustration. The doctor had a blackboard diagram showing in rotation the attributes of the Christian God, and opposit the reasons based on knowledge—on facts.

Dr. Haskell lectures without expectation of profit. In connection with the Union we run a weekly Lyceum, and every month an entertainment, both of which are well patronized. We are advancing the cause of Freethought by strong and hard pulls. The churches are greatly disturbed over our progress, and several of their most bigoted preachers hav delivered sermons against our cause, but we profit by their opposition and hope soon to greet the Liberals of the country with one of the most influential societies engaged in the cause of Freethought. M. A. B.

PIPPIN LAKE FARM, Feb. 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: At our seventieth regular meeting, February 2d, we concluded a course of three lectures, delivered by Chas. Watts, the eminent logician. The respectiv subjects were, "Thomas Paine, the Political and Religious Reformer," "Freethought: What Has It Done for the World?" and "Religion or Morality—Which?" Great audiences greeted the speaker with their plaudits from time to time, as his sharply defined sentences and incisiv logic sounded the coming doom of superstition's power. Each night large audiences evinced the interest aroused, showing that the thoughtful are doubting the dogmas of priestcraft. Our mistake was that we did not hav a five-night course.

The apostle of mysticism, Father Leeming, at the close of the last lecture essayed to answer these brilliant flights of reason. For forty-five minutes he afflicted his intelligent hearers, edified the vicious, and elated the hoodlums with a diatribe of misrepresentation and buffoonery, never once alluding to the subject under discussion, and sat down amid the applause of his mental infants and the disgust of the refined. The patience of the audience was remarkable, for it bravely bore up and waited to see the priest's discomfiture. The time of retribution came, and swift was the onset invited by the priest's low invectivs. Truly he sowed the wind and reaped the whirlwind. A few striking sentences of withering sarcasm and telling facts wilted the Christian advocate, and for once, and a wonder, he was compelled to observe the decorum of debate, while Watts unmasked the priest but spared the man. We heard a devout Catholic say, "That Watts, I couldn't understand what he was a-sayin', but didn't the praste giv it to him, though?" Thus we hav another example of the development theory so aptly illustrated by Heston in the development of Orang and O'Rourke. Eighteen hundred years of priestly domination and the consequent suppression of the right of private judgment had, according to the laws of inheritance and adaptation, done their work and left their devotee a mental imbecil. His mind, from lack of use, like the wing of the ostrich, is becoming a "rudimentary organ."

We like THE TRUTH SEEKER binder very much, and Denslow's "Distribution of Wealth" more, but THE TRUTH SEEKER, under its present management, most of all.

MARIUS HEIGHTON, Sec. K. S. U.

FALL RIVER, KAN., Feb. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: We learn by the last TRUTH SEEKER that C. B. Reynolds was in Kansas, and participated in a first-class blizzard. The inference is clear that Mr. Reynolds takes no stock in blizzards. If he is not desirous of a more comprehensiv knowledge of blizzards, he had better pitch his cotton tabernacle in New Jersey, and there abide. Most Eastern folks had read of blizzards before Mr. Reynolds journeyed westward. The more advanced supposed much that was scientific to be embodied in a first-class blizzard. To investigate and giv to the world this much-desired science three self-constituted and self-sacrificing delegates pitched their tents on the top of Mt. Washington to make observations and spend the winter. The last that was heard of these martyrs to science was, "The wind is blowing ninety miles per hour, and the thermometer is sixty degrees below zero." This is all that science got from this adventure. Had Mr. Reynolds remained East, he could hav investigated a first-class blizzard that satisfied all New England's curiosity by spreading itself broadcast at the foot of Mt. Washington and all the region round about. So far, no one has abused New England because the blizzard chose to visit that historic spot.

It is a question as to who is responsible for blizzards. They usually enter Kansas on the northern boundary, and are at once accorded the freedom of the state, as the mayor of London extended the freedom of that city to General Grant. We suppose Dakota, Nebraska, Colorado, Minnesota, and all her majesty's Dominion extend the same courtesy when a blizzard invades their corporate limits.

When Mr. Reynolds pitched his cotton tabernacle in New Jersey, he got into trouble for alleged blasphemy. Now, when he visits Kansas, a blizzard overshadows him, and he forthwith commits the "unpardonable sin"—abuses Kansas and her people. A stranger, suffering somewhat with the "asthma," "with a severe cold," and crowned with a blizzard, is not likely to extract much poetry from his surroundings. Mr. Reynolds seems to hav been injected into Kansas on an unfortunate line. Like Job's warhorse, he snuffs malaria afar. No state beneath the blue dome of heaven is less afflicted with malaria than Kansas. As to mud, dirt, and filth, with the ground covered with snow and a first-class blizzard whistling to the tune of sixty miles per hour, and mercury fifteen below zero—all this truly bespeaks a city of paradoxes. As to Burlington we know but little. Never heard of its boom, nor of its pretentious character.

Fall River is only seven years old; has been of slow growth; has never had a boom; has a bank, two hardware stores, three dry goods stores, two weekly newspapers, three churches, an opera hall, two hotels, two livery stables, drug stores, doctors, brass bands, and salt well. The Liberals in and around Fall River will compare favorably with Liberals of other localities. Mr. Reynolds got a wrong start. He failed to materialize on the regular passenger train, and was given up for lost. Late in the day he came in on the local freight, and thus had to escort himself to nearest quarters. We are aware that the proprietor of the hotel where Mr. Reynolds quartered himself is not as far removed from his evoluting center as he should be, yet he keeps a good supply of eatables that are spread without stint and in good shape.

Mr. Reynolds growls because we pay such exorbitant prices for coal. Holyoke, Mass., gets coal from Lehigh, Pa., and pays $8 per ton. This Holyoke is spoken of as a comparativly new town—only forty years old. Kansas has cities less than ten years old with street-cars and electric lights, and puts on all the city airs of Boston.

We cannot but feel that Reynolds made a mistake in writing in the mood he was in. The sympathy for him on account of the "many stripes" he received in New Jersey is all gone. We wish him well in all his efforts to diffuse the gospel of Liberalism, but the days of his usefulness in Kansas are numbered. P. VAN HYATT.

SALISBURY, MO., Feb. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: When a man says, "Stop my paper; I don't like your views on the Chicago trial, and the social ethics, and those pictures offend the gentle and loving Christian," it seems to us that he puts an Alpha and Omega on the evolution of thought, so far as he is concerned; that his head is full of other people's ideas, with no room for more—the final climax of evolution with him. He seems not to comprehend that evolution applies to thought, as well as to the development of the species. Has such a one read the inspired words of the Hon. Courtlandt Palmer contained in the Social Science Review of Jan. 25, 1888, p. 8, published at No. 3 East 14th street, New York? If not, he should send ten cents and get a copy.

Did it ever occur to our puritanic Freethinkers that the term "Infidel" is more degrading in its original meaning than the term "Anarchy?" Infidelity originally meant the opposit of fidelity; in short, a hypocrit. Paine, in his great work, the "Age of Reason," says: "Infidelity does not consist in believing, or in disbelieving, but consists in one professing to believe that which he does not believe." That beats Webster too bad. It may not be altogether irrelevant if we say that, forsooth, many persons hav been mistaken in regard to what they thought they knew; they hav also often been mistaken in what they thought they believed, or in other words, a man does not believe everything which he thinks he believes. Thinking is one thing, and believing is another thing.

We, as unbelievers in the Christian superstition, feel that we hav a mission to perform. We hav no time to waste fighting an imaginary enemy; no time to waste shaking off epithets. Our motivs are pure; our object, to do good; and that epithet will finally blossom a rose to adorn the bosoms of fair women and illustrious men. As Mr. Ingersoll says: "We hav already lived to see certain words change places—to see orthodox become an epithet, and Infidel become a crown of glory—a guarantee of honesty—a title of nobility and distinction." (The colonel will excuse mistakes, as I quote from memory.)

Now, in regard to Anarchy: We hav heard the pious rant and the hypocritical cant. We hav also heard the so-called Anarchists' story, together with the opinion of eminent men. Whatever may be said of the wisdom and daring of their actions, there is no denying that the motivs of those hated men are pure, and, I might venture to say, their object a good one. Possibly, however, the route to their haven may be impracticable. Saying nothing about the deep sympathy which I feel sure those heroic people entertain for the oppressed; the thieving, brutal, savage, and unjust laws passed by irresponsible law-makers, and in the interest of church and greedy monopoly, which those brave men wished to set aside, I do not believe in stoning the prophets and brave thinkers of the age. Where they make a failure and commit folly, it is the part of the brave, generous, and heroic soul to make improvement.

Here in this world men's actions are governed for good or bad by an all-powerful and stupendous impulse. At times this God (impulse) is an angel of mercy; again he is an actual devil. The time will come when men will know that men who commit an act, good or bad, could not hav done otherwise. They will then be enabled to see that this God, this devil, has been the obedient servant of the assassin, as well as of the philanthropist. They will then set about the task of governing their own actions until all men will exclaim: "He that governs himself is mightier than he that controls an army." And for one I want to thank the heroic Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER for even so small an expression as, "The condemned men did not hav a fair trial;" for which he deserves great credit, and by the side of Governor Oglesby—Mrs. Grundy's slave—he is towering in intellect.

Friends, should we not feel proud of Eugene and Somerby, two grand men who own themselvs in spite of heaven or hell? Just think of having an intellectual slave for an editor! For one, I dislike "straight and narrow ways," rather than which I would take to the woods.

JOHN TRUEBLOOD.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Feb. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Will E. J. Bowtell please inform us how he was released from the Trappist monastery, and how long he remained there? I was greatly interested in reading his experience as narrated in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 288, but it needs a supplement to make it satisfactory. It is a grand lesson against wasting all the possibilities of the now in the hope of realizing the baseless fabric of dreams in some impossible future.

I wish all Liberals who are able to do so would heed the request of friends Harriet and Wm. Thorpe in the last TRUTH SEEKER and pay at least $1 a year to help the really needy of our ranks—the aged, sick, and destitute. I hav a case just now that has been a sore thorn in my side for months. All the old truth seekers who, like myself, hav taken the paper from its birth on till now hav read the ringing letters of R. M. Casey, of Seneca, S. C. He is now old and penniless, and, worse than this, is likely to lose his right hand, and possibly his life, from an injury resulting from a large splinter in the wrist. He has suffered worse than death for many weeks. Dr. Foote and his son, E. B. Foote, Jr., hav sent them $5 apiece, and I hav sent about as much more. This is all the help they had received when I last heard from them, a few days ago. Mrs. Casey is broken down and sick in bed. They are worthy people, but Infidels in a Christian community. Neighbors come in and go out and are asked if the old man is changing in his belief as he is more and more tortured by pain, but not one of them lifts a hand to help. I wish I could place before you the affecting letter of the poor old sick wife, soon, perhaps, to be left a widow. I know you could not resist such an appeal and be human. A God might do so, but not a living, loving man or woman. I will join the dollar list, and send my donation as long as I hav a dollar to spare. It is one of the greatest needs of our institutions. I hope it will be commenced.

One more item—why is it that our Liberal friends do not make more bequests to the cause? Wealthy Infidels pass away one by one and will immense sums here and there, but fail to remember Liberal publishing companies, the National Defense Association, and other worthy objects of need. If we wish to succeed, we must be more effectiv givers.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

BOONVILLE, IND., Jan. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3.25; please send the good old TRUTH SEEKER and the ANNUAL for the year. We hav seven churches here and five Sunday-schools, and not one school to study science in. I hav tried to get some to take THE TRUTH SEEKER. I loan mine to them. Excuse me for not sending a subscriber. I still remain your friend. This from the old Atheist, aged sixty-nine, raised an old-school Presbyterian, but who now doesn't believe in God, heaven, or hell, devil, angel, or ghost. JOHN A. REYNOLDS.

PAULINE, ARK., Jan. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find 25 cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL of 1888, as you know I never fail to get one. They contain more valuable and useful information than I hav met with in any other book of the same size. I liv in a hotbed of orthodox superstition. But they all know here how I stand, as I publicly oppose church tyranny and advocate Freethought—while others who call themselvs Freethinkers, in order to curry favor with the church don't like to be known as such. I hav only a few stanch comrades here, and we propose to die in the struggle for liberty.

Respectfully yours, W. K. BACHELOR.

BAKER CITY, ORE., Jan. 29, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I take the liberty to inform you we hav sixty-four Liberals in this place. I am a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hope to become a subscriber in the near future. S. P. Putnam delivered four lectures here last August. He is an able speaker. His lecture on "The Glories of Infidelity" was grand.

I think well of the Nine Demands. I as a Liberal think there should be one more added. That is the right of ballot to the ladies of our land. They are our mothers, sisters, and daughters. They hav climbed the ladder of fame almost to the topmost round. As Liberals, why not consider them our equal? Woman has been oppressed since the earliest dawn of her existence. In the Bible days she was considered as property. R. B. FRISBEY.

OMAHA, Jan. 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad my lot has fallen in the nineteenth century, that my brain is captured by such a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER. Believe me, I work hard to impress on others the worth of so grand a paper. I am well acquainted in Omaha. It hurts Christians when I want them to read some of those grand remarks from our great thinkers which to me are like the honey in the comb. Your paper is too grand for me to say anything. I hav taken your paper either twelve or fourteen years. I am in my seventy-eighth year and I feel that my head is level—life or death to this body. I would love to be with you one half-hour. I once shook hands with the beloved Bennett in Omaha. May prosperity follow you, is my earnest wish. W. L. GRAY.

MONTICELLO, ILL., Jan. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Having made my sister, a young lady stenographer in Chicago, a Christmas present of Miss Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods," I am greatly pleased to receive a letter from her giving her opinion of the book, from which I quote some extracts. I am sure that if more copies of Miss Gardener's splendid work could be placed in the hands of our intelligent young women, before the influence of the church blights their minds, they would never fall under that influence, but do noble work in the cause of Freethought. My sister writes: "I hav finished my book, 'Men, Women, and Gods,' and I like it very much. It suits my views pretty well, though I did not know before that my way of thinking was Infidel doctrin. I had never quite gone so far as to disbelieve the Bible wholly, and especially the New Testament part of it. Still, it is a great deal easier and more reasonable to look at it as she does. I hav always thought that probably it was a proof of my extreme sinfulness that I could not stretch my faith and credulity up over my reason. I am very glad to hav read this book, for I think it will help me a great deal. I feel now that I can go along and do as nearly right as I can, without worrying my brain over what is to become of me after awhile, if I don't believe things that I cannot believe. One thing she says agrees with my thoughts exactly: 'I believe it is better to build one happy home here than to invest in a thousand churches which deal with a hereafter.' I hav felt a freer feeling since I read that book, and feel that I can do right because it is right a good deal easier than because of a fear of something to come hereafter, or from any hope of a home beyond the skies. I read the book 'conscientiously,' as you asked me to, and I hav also read a good deal in the Bible since. I would like to hav a talk with you on this subject. I really had about reached this conclusion from my own reasoning before reading this book, but this has finished the matter, and I fear it will be a long time before I am gathered into the Christian fold; and yet my resolve to liv a good and useful life, and to make those around me as happy as possible, is not lessened by the reading of this 'cleverly blasphemous book.'"

My sister is, I think, a type of thousands of thinking, intelligent young women who are not satisfied with the fruits of faith, but are hungry for the truth, yet know not where to turn for it. To them—for whom the book was written—Miss Gardener's noble work will be the light in the darkness if they can only read it. And to aid them to read it, I would suggest to our Liberal young men that when they wish to make presents to their lady friends they include in the list a copy of "Men, Women, and Gods," for it is a book every young lady should be proud to own. And thus they will spread in the ranks of the sex that needs it most the gospel of reason, humanity, and truth. O. W. MOORE.

OLD RIPLEY, ILL., Jan. 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav once been a preacher of the gospel, and hav been convinced that its doctrins are degrading. I hav given the subject a great deal of thought, and hav written and published a work exposing the dogmas of the Bible. But realizing that all previous attempts hav proved and will prove insufficient for the accomplishment of the work, I hav therefore contrived a picture as an exegesis of true and false theology to serve as an object-lesson. It would prove a most invaluable aid and assistant to all exponents of Liberalism and Freethought. It is my misfortune, however, to be surrounded by orthodox bigots, and I am struggling between poverty and want for the maintenance of a motherless family of five children. I hav traveled several hundred miles for the sole object of getting my design drawn; hav found many who would undertake it, but on finding out what the object was would decline, covering me with abuse. I hav been greatly persecuted; driven out into the storm at all times of day and night, simply for expressing my honest opinion.

I would solicit correspondence with Liberals, whom I will inform of the nature of my proposed picture, and will gratefully receive their opinions as to the best way of publishing it, and any aid they may feel disposed to giv.

Ex-REV. JOSEPH N. MAXEY.

FREEPORT, N. Y., Jan. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: During one of the late cold evenings, a clerical friend of mine went into his snug, warm library to compose a sermon for the following Sunday. When the sermon was finished, he drank another glass of wine, lit a cigar, and began carelessly humming the tune of "John Brown's Body lies Moldering in the Grave." While thus comfortably enjoying himself and listening to the howling of the storm outside, the spirit moved him to adapt some new words to this fine old tune, and he kept right on until he composed five verses. He called them "A Preacher's Soliloquy," and here they are, word for word, just as he gave them to me. I hope some of your readers will commit them to memory, and sing them from one end of the country to the other:

Now every thoughtful citizen, whose head is fairly level,
Rejects those pious stories of Jehovah and the devil,
But we who get our living out of all this foolish drivel
Are marching bravely on.
Glory, glory to the age of false pretense!
Up with holy rigmarole and down with common sense!
If people want religion, they must pay the whole expense,
While we go marching on.

The merchant needs religion his patrons to cajole;
The patrons want religion for the welfare of their souls,
And your wily politician, why, he needs it at the polls,
When he goes marching on.
Glory, glory, etc.

We scare the weak and timid with terrors of damnation;
We wheedle want and poverty with merits of starvation.
Get these to work in concert and our gospel of salvation
Goes booming bravely on.
Glory, glory, etc.

To insure a strict observance and submission to our rules,
We must use our best endeavors to extend the race of fools.
More thunder in the pulpit, more religion in the schools,
Will keep us marching on.
Glory, glory, etc.

Let all this foolish bickering 'twixt Leo, Knox, and Luther
Be amicably settled and adjusted for the future;
We must preach and pull together or else I fear we're euchered,
And our marching's nearly done.
Glory, glory to the age of false pretense!
Alas! what would become of us in times of common sense?
I fear the day is coming when pulpit eloquence
Won't be worth a tinker's dam.

JEREMIAH O'BRIEN.

COALTON, KY., Jan. 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot afford to be without THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is a necessary evil which I feel must visit me at least once a week. And right here let me express my admiration for Mr. Heston's able illustrations. I think they do a good work toward showing up the ignorance of superstition. It seems strange to think of the gross inconsistencies of the people who are almost daily contributors in keeping up the church and foreign missions. How willingly and gladly they contribute to keep up an idle horde of useless men to teach something of another world about which they know nothing, while in their own neighborhood are the untold sufferings of the poor and helpless women and children, whose condition has been made in many cases by the oppression of Christian corporations! We hav one or two corporations headed by Christian gentlemen in our county whose heartlessness is not far from equaling Gesler's.

I think our earth far superior to any world which we hav any account of, much less know of. In beauty, grandeur, reality, and magnificence our earth is far above any description which we hav of the Christian heaven. How much better we should be if we would confine ourselvs to the natural, and liv in this world while we liv! And if death is the portal through which we find another and better world, let us rejoice when we find it to be a reality. Thinking of another world caused me to turn to Burk's Theological Dictionary to see what he said of heaven. I find the following: "Heaven is considered as a place in some remote part of infinit space in which the omnipresent deity is said to afford a nearer and more immediate view of himself, and a more sensible manifestation of his glory, than in other parts of the universe." Further on I find this: "Where this place is, however, cannot be determined." The same author has this about hell: "The place of divine punishment after death. As all religions hav supposed a future state of existence after this life, so all hav their hell, or place of torment in which the wicked are to be punished. Even the heathens had their Tartara; the Mohammedans, we find, believe the eternity of rewards and punishments. It is not, therefore, a sentiment peculiar to Christianity." This author says that Mr. Swinden endeavored to prove that hell was seated in the sun. He says also that Mr. Whiston advanced a new and strange hypothesis. According to him (Whiston), the comets are so many hells, appointed in their orbits alternately to carry the damned to the confines of the sun, there to be scorched by its violent heat, and to return with them beyond the orb of Saturn, there to starve in those cold and dismal regions. But, as Dr. Doddridge observes, we must here confess our ignorance, and shall be much better employed in studying how we may avoid this place of horror than in laboring to discover where it is.

Do not the above quotations seem simple nonsense, and a waste of paper, ink, and time? But such is theology throughout its entire pages, and then it finishes its sentences by saying, "We must here confess our ignorance." Why not say: "We are Agnostics, Atheists"—or something better than hypocrits and pretenders? S. P. HERRON, P.M.

HARDIN, COL., Jan. 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Being an American citizen, hence an interested party, I would like to ask if those articles from Van Buren Denslow voice the opinions of THE TRUTH SEEKER. As you giv them prominence without comment, I conclude you coincide with him in his conclusions. They are certainly an able defense of the existing monopoly, and capitalistic control of nearly everything under the sun. We certainly agree with him in that combined capital can produce more cheaply than individual effort, which fact will doubtless be admitted by about 8,000,000 people in this country who can find nothing to do. What a consolation to a man of family, out of work, and without a cent in his pocket with which to buy food or fuel, to know that these vast accumulations of capital, controling by means of special privileges granted by our government all the benefits of labor-saving machinery, railroads, all our immense coal and oil deposits, and also our circulating medium of exchange, money—for even this, the most important of all functions of the government, is farmed out to, and almost completely at the mercy of, bankers and bondholders—I say, what a consolation to the millions of homeless and penniless, that these immense, greedy, and absolutely conscienceless monopolizers of nearly every resource of the earth, in all civilized (and other) countries, whose motto, as expressed by Wm. H. Vanderbilt, is, "The public be damned," can produce so cheaply, can transport commodities over railroads (built and paid for by the public) so cheaply—and can also (which Mr. Denslow fails to state) make the consumers' ability to pay the limit of the price charged for commodities or for service rendered! The Union Pacific railroad owes our government about $80,000,000, and this debt has been allowed to take second place in favor of other evidences of debt, in shape of fictitious issues of bonds, and has also received as a free gift millions of acres of land, sufficient in value to hav more than built the road, Denslow to the contrary notwithstanding; as witness his assertion that the people get all these things for absolutely nothing.

We would like Mr. Denslow's answers to two questions. If the laborer is not a producer, what was the origin of capital? If, as we contend, capital could not hav existed without labor, is a creation of labor, and of right belongs to its creator, what has he to offer in justification of the undeniable fact that the greater part of all capital and wealth of the civilized world is concentrated into the hands of a few paltry thousands? I would prefer THE TRUTH SEEKER's answers to those of Van Buren Denslow, who considers that the question of profit must never be lost sight of, in the foolish consideration of what is just. It is not cheap production in particular, but something like equal advantages under the law, and something more than the ghost of a chance for their lives, that people want, rather than such jugglery as this of Van Buren Denslow in justification of the present legalized robberies. Labor-saving inventions hav had the effect to supply the wants (for those who are able to satisfy them) of the people of this country by the employment of only about four-fifths of those who must either work, starve, or become the recipients of charity.

I conceive that truth can result in injustice to no one, and as the present conditions and conduct of things in general, which Mr. Denslow labors hard to justify, unquestionably tend to the greater accumulations of wealth on the one hand and the deeper degradation and poverty on the other, a condition of things which truth and justice can certainly find no justification for, it seems to me that if the name, "TRUTH SEEKER," has any significance, it is inconsistent, to say the least, to publish, without comment, a defense of things which every man who thinks knows outrage every principle of justice. J. D. POTTER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

" Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Girls We Want.

Hail to the girl who always tries
Her very best to do;
Who will not any task despise
That helps her mother through.

The girl whose head is full of sense,
And trifles not her time;
One who with fashions will dispense
Which soon fade out her prime.

Who keeps good company or none,
And stands erect in frame;
Who to no fickleness is prone—
Makes womanhood her aim.

This kind of girl will surely grow
In head and heart and hand;
And yet will be, we surely know,
A mother in our land.

Then to the girl giv warmest praise
Who guardeth well her youth;
Whose motto in her album says,
" Hold always to the truth!"

JOHN P. GUILD.

Good Counsels.

A verse, by some lover of children written,
Comes to my mind, by which I've been smitten.
The counsel given is so very good,
I would not change it even if I could.
I quote four lines for children's daily use,
As follows, and hope they'll meet no abuse:

" Little children, love one another;
Keep the Golden Rules of heaven,
The faults of others to forgiv,
As ye yourselvs would be forgiven."

And what is heaven? methinks you ask;
To answer which, I'm sure, is no great task.
It is self commend, for being truly good,
And keeping daily in a cheerful mood.
To kindly speak to sister dear and brother,
And to obey father e'er and mother,
Yields heaven on earth. What want we more
While living here upon this mortal shore?
Yes, doing good and being good will insure
A real heaven, which all children may secure.

Naughty children themselvs do fairly hate,
As when they've naughty been unto a mate,
Or coarse and rude, or calling some bad name,
Which ever brings a real sense of shame.
A pilfering child and one who tells a lie
Is seldom happy found. I'll tell you why:
It feels ashamed and guilty all the time,
And thus is punished for its every crime.
I hope my children readers every one,
Each pretty daughter and dutiful son,
Will now unite, and the Children's Corner,
By being good henceforth, will truly honor.
And when these given lines you turn to see,
Remember the writer, Elisha B.

Three Rivers, Mich. E. D. BLAKEMAN.

Why I Am a Liberal.

I thought I would write and tell you why I am a Liberal. I will begin from the first and tell you just how I came to be a Liberal. I used to go to church and sit there as solemn as an owl, and would hardly dare say a word to anybody. I sat there and listened to the minister telling his story. I would go another Sunday and hear him tell the same old story over and over again, till I was getting pretty well sick of it, though I dared not tell my parents; so, after awhile, a man lent my father some Freethought books—though this man was about like the mule, for he still sticks up for the church and makes believe he is a Liberal; but he is not. He only pretends to be, but to pretend to be a Liberal and to be a Liberal are two different things. After this man lent my father these books he left the church and began to see things properly, and turned Liberal, and often used to tell my mother it was no use to go to church; but she said it would be no use to talk, she was going to church, and so went. My parents argued many nights, till at last my mother turned Liberal, and so we stopped going to church. I was no longer afraid of the devil coming and taking me to hell. I very soon became a Liberal, too, and I hav heard my father read a lot of trash from the Bible which was not fit to put in any book; and, after I had left the church, the minister of the Methodist church said one hundred angels could dance on the point of a needle, which I think is impossible. I hav not yet told you the great reason why I am a Liberal, but will now tell you. The reason I am a Liberal is because you don't learn anything by going and sitting in a church, like an owl, as I hav said before. There are some things in the Bible which are not fit for anybody to read. I would rather read one of Colonel Ingersoll's lectures than twelve Bibles. There are some people who go to church just for style, but I do not believe in it. I left the church four years ago. I am eleven years old, and go to school. I read in the fourth book, and we hav a very good teacher and a number of classes. Please excuse all mistakes. FRANK E. COLE.

Fonthill, Ont., Can.

I am a Liberal because Liberals are advocates of liberty for everybody, and also of free speech and a free press.

I am a Liberal because Liberalism aims to free the mind from superstition.

I am a Liberal because Liberalism will, in time, abolish the occupations of several thousand priests.

I am a Liberal because Liberalism is the mother of progress.

I am a Liberal because Liberalism is the friend of science.

I am a Liberal because Liberalism makes parents kind to their children.

I am a Liberal because true Liberals do not commit crime.

I am a Liberal because Liberalism is putting out the fires of hell.

I am a Liberal because Liberals do not persecute for opinion's sake.

I am a Liberal because my father is one, and he is kind and good.

I am a Liberal because I hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers and books. JAMES BERRIDGE.

[Aged eleven.]

Sand Lake, Mich.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As this is Thanksgiving day, and I am rather idle, I think that I will giv you a few of the reasons "Why I am a Liberal." In the first place, my father has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER since 1881, and I hav heard him read it, and hav read it myself; and its teaching, and hearing my father in fireside conversations on the subject of religion, are the prime causes of my being a Liberal. In the next place, when I was not more than ten years old, I used to think that if God made everything, as the Bible teaches, and has all power, then he deserves all the credit for what is good, and, on the same principle, all the blame for what is bad. And then again, I think that it is perfectly impossible for me to love God as well as I do my own father and mother, and the Bible says that I must not only love God, but that I must hate my father and mother before I can be his disciple, and that's enough for me—I can't be his disciple. I must acknowledge that I do not know how to love or hate God. Then again, I can see that it is not just to damn a man for what he believes, or for what he does not believe.

These are some of the reasons why I am a Liberal. I was thirteen years old the 16th of last September. JEROME B. BROWN.

Bronston, Ky.

I am a Liberal because when Mr. Ingersoll lectured here in Port Jervis he said, "Don't whip boys," and the Bible says, "If you spare the rod you will spoil the child," and I believe as Colonel Ingersoll does.

Another reason is because I like to hav other folks be Liberal enough to let me do just as I want to, and to think just as I like to; then I will be Liberal enough to let them hav their own way.

Another reason is, my father and mother are Liberals, and I guess that makes me a born Liberal.

I am twelve years old, and go to school when I don't take the liberty to stay out. The teachers call it "playing truant," but I don't call it so, being a Liberal, and doing as I like to about going to school.

Port Jervis, N. Y. WINTHROP D. MEAD.

Correspondence.

OLD RIPLEY, ILL., Feb. 2, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I read the Corner and like it very much. I am twelve years old, and go to school all the time. Of all the men who hav risen to the pinnacle of fame, many hav been Liberals, and I think they are good men, and hope that the good cause is making progress.

Cordially yours, EDWARD R. MAREY.

ARMSTRONG, IOWA, Feb. 8, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: There is a cold wind from the northwest to-day. The people of this neighborhood hav lyceums here every Friday night; father, brother Robert, and I went to the lyceum last night. Our teacher's name is Miss Florence Curtis. She is the best teacher that ever taught our school. I study reading, penmanship, geography, arithmetic, spelling, and drawing. I was ten years old in December. My uncle Joe, who went to Colorado, has come back; he went there for his health, but it cost too much to liv there. Two hundred people in Dakota and northern Nebraska during recent cold storms froze to death. Hoping to see this in print,

Yours truly, ETHEL BURT.

ELLENSBURGH, W. T., Feb. 6, 1888.

MISS WIXON, Dear Madam: I see so many letters in the Children's Corner I thought I would write one too. I am a ten-year-old girl. My studies are arithmetic, geography, reading, spelling, and physiology. I hav four brothers and two sisters. We liv close by the Yokima river. Well, I guess I will close for this time. Hoping to see my letter in print,

LOUISE PARRISH.

PAXICO, KAN., Feb. 7. 288.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As you published my other letter, I thought I would write again. We are having nice weather now. I am going to school every day that I can. I study arithmetic, spelling, reading, history, writing, grammar, physiology, and geography.

I like to read the stories in the Children's Corner. I think the essays, "Why I Am a Liberal," very good.

I am fourteen years old. I would like some of the Liberals of my age to write to me. Your Infidel friend, ROSA PINGER.

TITUSVILLE, PA., Feb. 12, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav never seen any correspondence from this place, I thought perhaps a few lines might interest my little friends who read the Children's Corner. I am eleven years old. My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I am very fond of reading the Children's Corner. There are a number of Liberals in this place; they hav a lyceum here which I attend every Sunday, and it is very interesting. I will close for the present. This being my first letter, you will please excuse mistakes.

From your little friend and truth seeker,

ETHEL G. STREETER.

MUSKEGON, MICH., Feb. 9, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am going to write to you and the Children's Corner now. I am well and can go to school; last week I spelled the whole class down. Miss Wixon, do you think it is nice for our teacher to teach us how to pray? Mr. Bell is coming here and going to giv three Liberal lectures. Many of my school-mates go to church and Sunday-school. But I do not care anything about going; I would rather sit on a pumpkin, and hav it all to myself, than go to church and be crowded on a velvet cushion. I will close now, for it is getting late and I must go to bed. I will write again. My regards to all the little truth seekers. I remain,

Yours truly, ADA VANDERLINDE.

[Praying to some unknown power is useless business, and a waste of time that might be more profitably employed.—ED. C. C.]

ELLENSBURGH, WASH., Feb. 6, 1888.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Madam: As I saw my other letter in print, I will try and write again, and see if this will miss the waste-basket. It has been very cold here, as cold as thirty-seven degrees below zero. There is very little snow here now. It is less than half a foot deep. That is very little for this country; it is four feet deep in the valley and fifteen feet in the mountains sometimes. My studies are as follows: Fourth reader, spelling, arithmetic, physiology, geography, and writing. I am twelve years old. There hav been a great many serious accidents on the Northern Pacific railroad this winter. It is not safe to travel on it at all. When the three-mile tunnel is completed there will be no accidents at all to amount to anything, because the main part of the accidents happen on the switch-back. I will close with good wishes to you, and also to the Corner.

THOMAS W. PARRISH.

THREE RIVERS, MICH., Feb. 14. 1888.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Lady: You will learn by this paper that the writer was thrown from a sleigh a few days since and had his left arm broken. Being a regular reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and much interested by your Children's Corner, while unable to work, I hav ventured to write a few rhyming lines for the children, which, if you wish to do so, you can hav published, and welcome, and I shall be pleased to see them laid before the children. It is they who will yet hav to conduct the affairs of this our great nation, and every word wisely given for their best well-being should be carefully done to guide them in the paths of virtue and goodness.

Brother D. M. Bennett and the writer were old-time friends—schoolmates, messmates, etc.; therefore you will not think strange that I am interested in everything published in the grand periodical he started in Paris, Ill. I hav taken it from the first. The Truth Seeker Company published my "Two Hundred Riddles" for children some years since, which you may hav seen. Every one of them was invented by myself, and first written by my hand.

It comes easy for me to write poems, as well as prose, and if I can be any help to you in that line at any future date, please be free to let me know.

Mrs. Blakeman is also interested in reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, and especially the Children's Corner.

With these few lines, accept our best wishes for your health and prosperity.

E. D. BLAKEMAN.

[Our friend Blakeman's contributions are interesting, instructiv, and always welcome in the Children's Corner. We hope the broken arm may soon be as good as new, and trust that both our worthy friends may liv long and be always happy.—ED. C. C.]

The Trick that a Good Little Boy Did Only Once a Day.

Many years ago one of the most famous elephants that traveled in this country was "Old Columbus." During one of his summer trips through Virginia he stopped at the town of D——. In the neighboring town of H—— a boy, familiarly called "Dave" and notorious for leadership in all kinds of mischievous tricks, determined to show off before the other boys at Old Columbus's expense, and invited several of his companions to go with him.

Having come to the elephant's stable, Dave gave him first candy, then cake, and then finally cried, "Now, boys!" and slipped a piece of tobacco in his proboscis, intending to get out of danger and enjoy Old Columbus's disgust and anger.

But before he could move Columbus seized him and whirled him upward through the opening overhead against the roof of the stable.

Unhurt by his very unexpected rise, Dave dropped on the haymow. The other boys below, supposing this to be the "trick" promised them, cried out in admiration:

"Dave, Dave, do that again!"

Dave, comfortably seated out of harm's way, very earnestly answered:

"No, boys; I only do that trick once a day!"

A Bright Little Girl.

We heard the other day of a young minister who was "taken down" very handsomely by a bright little girl. He had been called upon quite unexpectedly to address a Sunday-school, and to giv himself time to collect his thoughts he asked a question. "Children," said he, "what shall I speak about?" A little girl on the front seat, who had herself committed to memory several declamations, held up her hand, and in a shrill voice asked, "What do you know?"

"WHAT kind of boys go to heaven?" asked a Sunday-school superintendent. "Dead boys," yelled the youngest member of the infant class.

About Rocks.

Rocks may be divided into several kinds or classes, but the two grand divisions are stratified and unstratified rocks. Unstratified rocks are those which were once in a melted state from intense heat, and which hav since cooled into a half-crystallized state, the same as water, when growing colder, crystallizes into ice. Ice is rock much the same as granit and sandstone are rock.

Crystallization means those forms in which particles of a liquid arrange themselvs as it hardens into a solid, or in other words, as it freezes. Granit, iron, and marble are frozen substances, for with greater heat they would become liquid. Rock may be changed by heat into a liquid or molten state, as ice is changed by heat to water.

Stratified rocks are not crystallized. Instead of having cooled from a liquid into a solid state, they hav been slowly built up piece by piece, and grain upon grain, into their present form through long ages of the world's history. They are called stratified because they are in themselvs made up of distinct layers, and also because they lie one upon another in layers, much the same as the leaves of a book, or as the bricks of a house are placed. Stratified rocks are also called sedimentary rocks.

The stratified or sedimentary rocks of the present day are made from the sediment first taken from the land by streams and rivers, and then allowed to settle on the sea-bottom, where the different layers are formed, and in this manner a large portion of material is every year taken from the land and given to the sea. Running water can support and carry along sand and earth which in still water would quickly sink to the bottom. The land is continually crumbling away, and fresh land under the ocean is being built up from the same materials which the streams and rivers hav taken from islands and continents. Geologists say that by this method the enormous formations of stratified or sedimentary rocks hav been made.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

The Church of Practical Religion

BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Literary Notices.

Readers wishing to study Spanish or German are informed that "Spanish Simplified" and "German Simplified," the publications of Augustin Knoflach, New York, are highly recommended. $1.25 each.

Prof. David A. Wells devotes the ninth of his series of articles on "Economic Disturbances," which appears in the Popular Science Monthly for March, to the labor question. In the same number Andrew D. White, in one of his "New Chapters in the Warfare of Science," describes the era of attempts at compromise between scripture and geology. The price of this magazine per number is 50 cents.

Those searching for proof of continued existence after death will find many arguments based, not upon myths, but upon scientific physical analogies, sensibly presented in "The Evolution of Immortality; or, Suggestions of an Individual Immortality Based upon Our Organic and Life History." The author is C. T. Stockwell. The book is handsomely printed and tastefully bound in cloth. The publishers, Charles H. Kerr & Co., fix the price at 75 cents.

A handsome present to a young person, or to any interested in puzzles, would be a yearly subscription to the Puzzler, published monthly by N. D. C. Hodges, New York, at $1.20 yearly, or 10 cents a number. This publication seems peculiarly suitable for a gift, being got up in a handsome manner, printed on heavy paper, with a lithographed cover of much beauty. Each number contains entertaining puzzles and game problems, and the answers to those contained in the preceding issue.

"The National Sin of Literary Piracy," by Henry Van Dyke, D.D., is published by Charles Scribner's Sons at the price of 5 cents. International copyright is a desirable thing, and a commendable first step toward the removal of the present maintenance among nations of "the relations of savages." But it would hav suited us well enough to hav literature-thieving condemned on other grounds than that it is not in accord with the "Ten Commandments," with "righteousness," and with the "Christian church as a guardian of private and public morals." And why not call it a crime, not a "sin?" Yet when the doctor, after describing the "iniquity," queries, "Has the church nothing to do with this?" we cannot maintain quite so firm a dissent. In fact, truth compels us to answer in the affirmativ—the church, reverend doctor, does hav much, ever so much, to do with thievings, piracy, and all those things.

"What I Saw At Cassadaga Lake: A Review of the Seybert Commissioners' Report," by A. B. Richmond, a member of the Pennsylvania bar, is published by Colby & Rich. It is an essay at refutation of the conclusions arrived at by the Seybert commission for the investigation of Spiritualism. The author's style is one of keenness and brilliancy. As a specimen of his ability with the weapons of ridicule and sarcasm we may quote: "The true investigator of phenomena does not waste his time in the vain inquiry of why it [spiritual intelligence] did not occur in some other manner. Why does the night-blooming cereus open its beautiful petals only in darkness, when all the other gems of the floral kingdom love the light of the sun? Who knows? save that the spirit life of the plant demands certain conditions which must be obeyed. Environed in the light of day the plant refuses to bloom; enveloped in darkness it obeys the laws of its being, and opens its petals in the midnight air. Why does hydrocyanic acid—a most subtil poison—lose its deadly properties when exposed to the light? Why does the photographer require a 'dark séance' in preparing his plates? Why does light affect his sensitiv chemicals? Who can tell? We only know that it is so, and must be content with that knowledge until nature unfolds her secrets to the investigator. So it is with spirit life. If there is such life, it must, of course, be governed by natural laws; what those laws are the investigator must seek to find, and not become discouraged on the very threshold of investigation because the phenomena are not in accordance with his esthetic tastes. You see, the spirit world was probably created before the Seybert commission, and therefore it was impossible to consult that honorable body as to the most proper manner in which spirit life should make its presence known to the denizens of earth. Of course, this error of the creativ power is to be lamented; but as it is irremediable, the world must be content, and you ought not to be offended, or feel that you were slighted." Price $1.25.

In the February Forum Senator Cullom presents an article on "The Government and the Telegraph," the gist of which may be given in a few extracts: "In 1843 Congress appropriated $30,000 'to test the expediency of the telegraph projected by Professor Morse,' and in 1844 the line already referred to was constructed with this appropriation. This line, erected with the people's money, was placed under the charge of the postmaster-general where it properly belonged, and for three years it was operated by the government in connection with the postal service. The government was, therefore, the original promoter of the telegraph in the United States. It demonstrated its practicability, something no capitalists could be induced to undertake, and yet to-day the United States is the only civilized nation in which the telegraph is not under government control. The advocates of a government telegraph are suggesting nothing new. They are simply advocating the policy which prevails in all other leading nations. . . . Some idea of the saving that would hav been effected to the public can be gained from the fact that from 1867 to 1883 (both inclusiv) the shareholders of the Western Union Telegraph Company received $34,000,000 in cash dividends, in addition to stock dividends of $25,817,198. . . . When England found itself in a position similar to that which the United States occupy to-day with respect to the telegraph business, the British government did not long hesitate to act, but bought out the existing lines and assumed control of the business. And this was done, too, although the government was forced to pay extravagant prices for the lines, and to assume a heavy indebtedness in order to buy them. But England has never hesitated to undertake any expenditure, however enormous, that promised to promote the business interests of the nation, a fact which largely accounts for her success in maintaining her commercial supremacy. . . . The results of the purchase of the lines in England afford the best answer to the objections raised against the assumption of the telegraph business by the government of the United States. It is amusing, after this length of time, to read the arguments that were adduced against the absorption of the telegraphs by the state. Every reason has been proved wrong, every prophecy has remained unfulfilled. . . . It is claimed that this plan would practically confiscate the existing telegraph properties by driving the companies out of the business, and would establish a government monopoly; but this objection comes with bad grace from the Western Union Company, which has itself driven more than fifty competing companies out of the business, and confiscated their properties at a fraction of their original cost. The Western Union has never been granted a monopoly of the telegraph business; it has simply acquired it, and has enjoyed enormous profits therefrom. It is not proposed to prevent the Western Union from carrying on its business. It will be free to compete with the government for the patronage of the public. And if it can furnish better service than can be given under a government system, as its advocates insist, it will be assured a profitable business. . . . It is contrary to the genius of our institutions to multiply the functions of government unless some great gain is probable. I do not believe in a paternal form of government, but we are often obliged to choose between two evils, and I do not believe the American people will hesitate long in making a choice as between a government control and a private monopoly of the telegraph." Murat Halstead presents statistics which he claims to prove that the Southern whites are "nullifiers of the Constitution" by intimidation "of the colored citizens from expressing at the ballot-box their preferences in places where they endanger the political supremacy of the Democratic despotism." "Even in Virginia," he represents, "the colored people are embarrassed and cheated by registration regulations prepared to confuse them and keep them from the polls, and the Democrats manage to supervise the counting and returns so as to maintain, on important issues, the solidity of that corner of the South." Mr. Halstead conceives our future prospects to be of this nature: "In 1888, Congress and the Supreme Court will, in all probability, go with the presidency. The whole government is therefore at stake. If the Democrats get it, resting and dependent upon the South made solid by the nullification of the war amendments of the Constitution, what will they do with it? That is the question to which public attention must be directed. We may be sure that those who hav been the self-constituted interpreters of the Constitution, and hav been proud of their relations to that instrument, which they hav regarded as their own platform and political gospel, will find a way to remove from it the portions that were pinned to it with bayonets and that they hav made a dead letter. They are experts in precisely that line, and they hav opened a vast field for the display of their talent. With a Supreme Court of their own they would speedily rid themselvs, under cover of decisions as to former regularity, of the reproach of nullification. The amendments as they stand might be declared to be the fruit of unconstitutional as well as unholy violence. The cry would be raised that the 'old Constitution' was the one stay and support of the country. This would prepare the way for putting the gray upon an equality with the blue in the pension lists. Why not, if the Confederate cause was originally constitutional and always good? Then come the war claims. Are our fellow-citizens from the Ohio to the Gulf of Mexico, with the law-making power in their hands, to submit forever to outlawry?" Those who hav not had time to pay to Irish affairs sufficient to obtain a clear understanding of just what is the matter over there may find useful a few extracts presenting the substance of an article by the American novelist, Julian Sturgis, on "The Cause of Irish Discontent:" "What is this Ireland? To orators it seems to be a sort of female in distress, asking for equity, or for liberty, or for self-government, or for Grattan's parliament, or for a rise in prices, or for a change of weather. . . . The end which the tenant-farmers of Ireland desire is the settlement of the land question. But what is the settlement which they desire? They wish to become the owners of their farms. They do not wish to buy them; the time of such modest desires has gone by; they wish and they expect to get their farms for nothing, or for next to nothing. They do not wish the government to buy out the landlords. This buying out the landlords would involve a loan; and this loan would involve payment of interest by the tenant-farmers, who would rather pay rent. Indeed, unless the process of developing into landowners were to go on forever, they would hav gradually to pay the principal also. They do not wish that the state should buy out the landlords and assume their place, becoming forever the one landlord of them all. They would rather pay rent to their landlords than to an official collector. . . . That which the tenant-farmers desire is to pay no more rent in any shape or to any people. They wish to become owners of their farms; to pay nothing, or next to nothing, for the acquisition of this ownership; and to cease paying rent from that time forth forever. This they desire, and this they expect. Two lessons are preached daily to them. One lesson is, that it is unfair to remove them from their farms, whether they pay rent or not. The other lesson is, that land in Ireland has ceased to produce rent, i. e., that an Irish farm can produce nothing more than the fair profit of the farmer. Take these two lessons together, and there follows inevitably the practical advice, Pay no rent and stick to your farms. This then, this taking of their property from the landlords without compensation, or with compensation extravagantly inadequate and unfair, is what the tenant-farmers expect from a Dublin parliament. The present government of Great Britain and Ireland hav promised to produce a scheme for buying out the Irish landlords, but no such scheme will now content the Irish tenants. The Parliament of the United Kingdom will go no further, not having yet accepted the doctrin that it is fair to deprive people of their property, even of their property in land, without a fair, or at least a decent, compensation. But a Dublin parliament would be forced to go so far, and to act in accordance with this doctrin. For this very purpose is its existence desired by the Irish peasantry. . . . Causes which modify a people's character are at work in Ireland—the national schools, the books and newspapers, the ideas which come back from the lands whither the emigrants go. Could an Irish parliament increase the strength of these transforming forces? The great majority of its members would be returned by Roman Catholic votes, and any change in the existing educational system of the country would be a change from the present equality of all denominations in the work of education to the endowment by an Irish government of Roman Catholic teaching. Whatever good such teaching may do, it will hardly be said that its chief effect is to make men labor unceasingly that they may lay up treasure in this world." The Forum is sold at 50 cents per copy, or $5 a year. This magazine, or any other periodical wished, may be subscribed to through this office.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

Dear Henry, K. M. Q."

OMAHA brute: "Humph! So you believe all this theosophic nonsense, do you?" Washington lady: "Nonsense, indeed! Can one doubt the evidence of their senses? Did you not see in the papers that while Prof. Elliott Coues, our great leader, was in Chicago he projected his astral body to Washington, and a lady there saw him?" "I did." "I am that lady. I saw him standing before me as plainly as I see you now." "Humph! Did he hav his astral clothes on?" (Lady faints.)

"DO you not think, Miss Smith," he pleaded, "that in time you might learn to love me?" "Possibly," the girl replied. "If you could render me a statement of what you are worth, Mr. Jones, I might learn to love you. I'm very quick at figures."

It ain't proper to say 'hav knowed;' you should say 'hav knew.'"

COUNSEL: "Now, then, sir, did you, or did you not, threaten to kill the plaintiff?" Witness: "I did——" Counsel: "That will do. The jury will notice the admission." Witness: "But I havn't finished. I was about to say that I did——" Counsel: "Quite right to confess it. You may step down." Witness: "Your honor, I insist upon my right to finish the sentence." Judge: "Well!" Witness: "I did—not."

SHE sat idly watching the empty oyster shells on her plate, while he finished the last morsel of cracker within reach. "Mr. Sampson," she said, with a little blush, "do you think that young ladies are justified in taking advantage of their leap year privileges?" His heart gave one great saddle-rock bound, for she was rich and he was poor, and he loved her with that mad passion so common to this condition of society. He fervently assured her that he did. "Then, Mr. Sampson," she said, shyly, "I think I would like a dozen more on the shell,"

Gems of Thought.

WHEREVER the facts of physical nature and mental life hav been found to disagree with accepted traditions of theory and practice, the traditions hav given way, point by point. And this is as true of those who disclaim any change as of those who advocate an entire making-over of the philosophy of belief and the conduct of life. The "Andover controversy" is but one of a thousand proofs that the Christian system of religion is riddled through and through with unbelief of its ancient dogmas. And, in Judaism and other special religions, the tendency toward giving up the exclusiv beliefs and accepting as fixed only what common experience proves true is no less marked. Even the Brahman caste of India yields to the democracy of facts that rules the intellectual world of to-day. And, although in the Christian, as doubtless in other special, organized religions, the temples are crowded with worshipers, the God they bow before is less often their highest ideal than conventional custom, social enjoyment, and unthinking consolation. Hence, we may say that the "unchurched" include hundreds and thousands of those whose names still remain on the church-books, and whose constant presence at the church-meeting gladdens the heart of the faithful believer, but whose highest thought and deepest devotion of religion are not phrased in the liturgy they repeat. —Mrs. Anna Spencer.

THE thought which robs death of its enmity is that, when we are gone, others as full of life as we will swarm into our places. Death is impartial distribution. What it stands for is "the greatest good of the greatest number." Though there should be no other life in store for us, we should be willing to move on and make room for the new-comers. Death the enemy of youth and beauty! Yes, it does sometimes snatch them from our sight and keeping. But it is death alone that makes them possible. "Room for the young, room for the brave, room for the beautiful!" Thanks to thee, O death! there is never any lack of little children in the world; never any lack of boys and girls; never any lack of fresh young minds trying anew to solve the old, old problems; never any lack of fresh young hearts to thrill with the old, old rapture; never any lack of fresh intelligence, curiosity, and will; never any lack of men and women, in their full-orbed maturity, ready and glad to grapple with the tasks and questions of their day. —Chadwick's Victory Over Death.

COME to me, O ye children!
For I hear you at your play,
And the questions that perplexed me
Hav vanished quite away.
Ye open the eastern windows
That look toward the sun,
Where thoughts are singing swallows,
And the brooks of morning run.
In your hearts are the birds and the sunshine,
In your thoughts the brooklet's flow,
But in mine is the wind of autumn
And the first fall of the snow.
—Longfellow's Children.

IF we are to suppose a miracle to be something so entirely out of the course of what is called Nature that she must go out of that course to accomplish it, and we see an account given of such a miracle by the person who said he saw it, it raises a question in the mind very easily decided, which is, Is it more probable that Nature should go out of her course, or that a man should tell a lie? We hav never seen, in our time, Nature go out of her course; but we hav good reason to believe that millions of lies hav been told in the same time. It is, therefore, at least millions to one that the reporter of a miracle tells a lie.—Paine's Age of Reason.

THE author of "Ecce Homo" claims that there is something which may properly be called natural Christianity, as distinguished from the supernatural Christianity of the disciples of Christ; and he means by natural Christianity the emotions with which men regard an ideal humanity, when they shape themselvs and endeavor to make their brother-men shape themselvs to a human ideal that is far above the rules and standards of any external law. He is deeply convinced that not only do we throw away a very great reserve of power by branding as Atheists all those who do not confess a personal God, communicating with men and hearing their prayers, but that we waste power by not admitting, as distinctivly Christian, those who are always eager to enlarge and elevate the human ideal of character, and to judge human action rather by the sympathy of genius than by the cut-and-dried code of authoritativ custom.—London Spectator.

RELIGIONS are subject to the same great law of evolution that everything else is. Change and progress are the universal law. We can stand still in nothing. The ideas, the philosophy, the science, the arts, the religions, of five thousand years ago, of two thousand years ago, of one thousand years ago, are not all that we should search for, not all that we need at the present hour.—D. M. Bennett.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 15. No. 10. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, March 10, 1888. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

THE EFFECTS OF CHRISTIAN DOGMAS.—FINAL RESULT NEXT WEEK.

Notes and Clippings.

SOME of the church-members of England are protesting against the everlasting contribution-box in Sunday-schools, on the ground that it drives scholars away to museums and libraries, which are free, and thereby injures the cause of religion.

THE Grand Army post of Bedford, Ia., held their Washington's birthday celebration on the 21st this year, instead of the 22d, because Wednesday was prayer-meeting night. The orators of the occasion were all ministers, who could not forego their weekly pray even to honor George Washington.

THE will of a man who was hanged for poisoning his wife has just been probated in Cork. The murder was committed that he might marry the governess, with whom he had been too intimate, and after he provides financially for the illegitimate issue, he adds: "I trust my children will be brought up in the Protestant faith. The Bible pure and simple is the true religion."

THE negotiations between the Vatican and Russia hav proved fruitless. Russia demanded that Catholic bishops throughout that country should be appointed by the czar; that the Russian language should be exclusivly used in Catholic churches in Russia, both in preaching and in catechising, and that the offspring of mixed marriages should be educated in the orthodox Russian church. Mr. Pecci, of Rome, head of the Latin church, could not see his way clear to grant the demands, and the Greek and Roman Catholic churches will remain enemies for the greater glory of God and Christian brotherhood.

THE Lewiston, Me., Journal finds, as the result of an elaborate investigation, that one-third of the churches in Maine are closed on account of lack of support, and that one-half the people of the state are non-church-goers. The returns from the canvass show that out of 1,362 churches in the state, 417 are vacant.

DR. PATTON, the president-elect of Princeton, seems to belong, says Life, to the old school of college presidents. "I am a Presbyterian," is Dr. Patton's constitution and by-laws, and the test of the special branch of learning in which he excels lies in the ability to say what a Presbyterian is, and what he is not. As soon as Dr. Patton made a practical demonstration that he knew how to make this distinction, Princeton cried out for him, and added him to her stock of learned men. She has kept him in stock ever since, and now has brought him out promptly and with pride, to put on the shoes of the venerable McCosh.

THE non-sectarian status of our public schools is an absolute necessity, says the Banner of Light, if the liberties of this country are to be preserved, and the sooner our people take action in this important matter the better it will be for all concerned. These schools are opened alike to Protestant and Catholic, Jew and gentile. We fully agree with the San Francisco Argonaut, wherein it says that the religious training of children should be left to the parents themselvs. School attendance is compulsory by law, and good order, good morals, good habits, and the rudiments of learning are legitimate subjects for public education, while creeds and catechisms, faiths and beliefs, doctrins and dogmas, are questions of personal preference only, and, as such, pertain to the household alone. This is a free country, so free that each man may worship the God of his choice without let or hindrance, and no church organization shall be permitted to proselyte children at the public cost, and under cover of the laws which compel education.

THE Jamaica-ginger drunkard is a product of Prohibition seldom found, except in the Southern states. In the sparsely settled regions of the South liquor is sold, if at all, in the "general stores," and these will not take the risk of losing their general trade by selling liquors surreptitiously when public sentiment has decided in favor of Prohibition. But they can sell Jamaica ginger, and the thirsty toper can become fairly drunk on a half-pint bottle of this mixture of alcohol and essence of ginger. In view of the use of Jamaica ginger as an intoxicating beverage, the town officers of Dawsonville, Ga., hav passed an ordinance prohibiting the sale of that tipple within the town limits.

"I ATTENDED a funeral at the home of a Christian science family the other day," said a gentleman of a severely Materialistic turn of mind. "Of course, it was a Christian scientist who preached the funeral sermon. The burden of his remarks was that there is no pain, no death, no suffering, no grief, in this world save that which we imagin. When the service was over the pallbearers carried the coffin down the slippery steps from the door to the walk below, and the minister followed. As he set his foot on the first step his heel flew from under him, his legs went up into the air, and he came on the middle of his back, striking very heavily about five steps down. It must hav all but broken his spinal column. He was helped to his feet, and with his hand on his back he limped around a little circle and groaned in a most piteous manner. He was a very badly hurt man, but if he had been my own brother, and had been killed, I should hav had to laugh when one of the young persons who came down the steps with me afterward gravely but softly said: 'No pain, no suffering, no grief.'"

THE real meaning of the pope's letter to Archbishop Corrigan denouncing Henry George's land theory as false and vicious, is thus defined by a Detroit journal: "The importance of this letter from Rome is not theological or moral, but political. If Catholics could only be persuaded that it is binding upon their consciences, it would prove a potent campaign document for the Democrats in 1888, for it would head off the enormous defection which is now taking place of the Irish-American Catholics from the Cleveland Democracy to the new Labor party. Does not this account, by the way, for the singular zeal of the Democratic press all over the country in trying to persuade American Catholics to heed and reverence the Corrigan letter? The Cleveland organs are unanimous in their opinion. The orthodox utterance among them is that which we quote above from the Free Press. It was formulated a week ago by high authority, and has got almost all over the country now. It might be freely translated into the language of American politics as follows: 'Atheists, Jews, Infidels, Agnostics, Protestants, and all others but Roman Catholics may do as they please in 1888, but Roman Catholics must vote the straight ticket. They'll be damned if they don't.'"

Communications.

Science or Religion.

There are in the United States to-day eighty thousand ministers of the gospel. Presuming they deliver one sermon each per week for fifty weeks, the total for the year would be four millions. Quite a large number of sermons.

Let us go further and sum up the sermons delivered in the cause of religion for the last, say one hundred years. What a grand total we get! It is apt to make us wonder, and in thinking it over one naturally asks himself, Why so many sermons to prove a fact true?

When a fact is shown to the world, its truthfulness is established, and for a society to form and go about proclaiming that a fact is a fact becomes unnecessary.

If the cause preached from the pulpit is a truth, it would be, so it seems, an absolute truth; its diaphaneity would be so evident as to dispel all question. The very knowledge of the question would hav been born within us, and would be positivly essential to our life and being. Now, if this cause is truth, why so many millions of sermons to prove it? If a God existed, the fact would be just as apparent as the existence of the sun.

Why not go about preaching the sun's existence? Because the knowledge of it is born within every living thing; and so if a God existed the knowledge would be born, not acquired. Our life would demand it, and the time of thousands of men would not be required to verify its truthfulness. The fact would be apparent to every human mind, every race and color.

Whatever good could arise therefrom would not be limited to a few.

When a person expresses himself in this manner it is termed blasphemous, and he no longer enjoys the open, pleasant smile of welcome that once pervaded his social circle, which, for the want of generosity of thought, a relief from stagnant, cramped, contracted ideas, has shut him out.

But is not speech free, so long as carried on with strict regard for law and order? One person should enjoy the same right to denounce the existence of a God as another to uphold it, and because one wishes to believe in such a thought he should not be banished.

If real truth was sought in a broad, open way, and not by the limited rays of a dark lantern, it might be revealed oftener. The way in which truth in its true sense is walked around, shunned, and covered would lead one to think a few people on this free earth held a right to monopolize the God business. If anyone in the interest of humanity and for the good of mankind says there is a God, I claim the same right to free speech, and say for mankind: Don't be led into any such foolishness, for it cannot be proven. Millions of sermons hav not made the God business clear and plain enough to go henceforth unquestioned. The myth is losing ground, and is being doubted more and more every day.

The cause advocate would say to this, "Pooh!" and naturally he might; for he searches with a dark lantern, and not by broad, open light. If he made use of this, he could learn something by looking at statistics; not the statistics of the wilds, but of large cities that boast of churches and able preachers.

Take New York city, for instance, with a population of 1,300,000. Only half that number is recorded as going to church at all, and that is not the minimum figure, for in 1880 the whole number of churches, chapels, and missions of all kinds was given at 489, with accommodations for only 375,000—less than one-third the entire population at that time, and 100,000 of that number were Catholics.

The whole number of Protestant communicants recorded for 1880 is given at 83,400; quite small, when compared with the entire population, 1,206,577.

These figures are significant. They show that the church is positivly losing ground. And why should it not, when after years and years of preaching it fails to prove anything? What a grand imposition the church is, exempt from taxes, and yet it seems as if nearly all were more or less in debt.

The cause would ask: Would you take away the church and giv nothing in return? Yes, by all means. It has always taught absurdities and fog, and cultivated ignorance and superstition.

As for doing good—never. A drawback to the world's progress it has always been. As the world advances in knowledge, its regard and respect for religion grow less. As the people develop in their knowledge of the sciences, so will they in the same ratio doubt the existence of a God.

The shock would be severe enough to cause faintness to the religious if told that religion had done harm and was a drawback to the world's progress; but such is the case, and it is recognized by many who, for fear of ostracism, would rather hold their peace.

Christianity does not shine forth in the same light as of old. Science is crowding it out. The God business has been talked out, and is no further advanced to-day than it was five thousand years ago.

Religion is no further advanced than when the first edition of that old book of fables, the Bible, was first put on the market.

Does the world owe one debt of any kind to religion, for its progress?

The advancement of the world is due to science, and not to fables shouted down from the pulpit to a sleepy, cramped mind.

Teach a child the sciences and the laws of nature, and after a number of years, sufficient to form an understanding, giv him a copy of the Bible for perusal; could he accept its fables in any other sense than the ludicrous?

Science or religion, one or the other, is truth; both cannot be.

Religion, superstition, and ignorance go hand in hand.

The growth of the Christian religion emanates from the Bible, a book filled with absurdities from one cover to the other. For a body of learned, scientific men to form one clear understanding of its meaning is impossible, and as for acknowledging the book as a basis of law to guide us, it is an absurdity.

The Society for the Suppression of Vice, among other noble doings, prohibits the manufacture and sale of obscene literature—any matter that will tend to corrupt the moral ideas of youth. The society is composed of religion-promoters, yet look—they will send their children to Sunday-school and hav them taught from a book which, if put in any other form, would be rejected from the United States mails, simply because of the vile stuff contained—whole chapters of reading matter unfit to be read at all, to say nothing of putting it up as something to be learned by children.

If the Bible, and all abstracts and writings from it, could be removed—of course, impossible, but we will just suppose the case—would the people be less learned in science, art, and culture? No; but on the other hand, the world would be further progressed if religion was less cultivated.

If these eighty thousand ministers, now living by beggary in edifices exempt from national claim, if they were to divert their mind entirely from religion and giv their entire time and attention to the cultivation of youth's mind in science, unmixed with religion, the world would not go backward, but would progress even faster than it does now with its existing handicap.

An American Voter's Protest.

Things seem to be working admirably for the final sale and delivery of our civil and religious liberties to the tender care and keeping of the pope of Rome; when the old order of things will be revived, and the use of thumbscrews and instruments of torture for "heretics" and non-Catholics will be in better demand than Galileo's telescopes or works of art and schools for useful learning in science and progress. In the corrupt scramble for office, our political bosses are doing their best to sell the best interests of mankind to the highest bid from the Catholic church for political power, when the education of the people will be in the keeping of trained teachers from institutions with ancient moral stench, politely and charitably called "monasteries," "nunneries," "convents," etc. And the people, following the dictation of party and corrupt party leaders, seem to be oblivious of the danger so plainly seen by any careful observer.

What do we see?

Hon. J. G. Blaine, after marrying his family into the Catholic church—posing before the people as a sort of Protestant or non-Catholic—hastens to Rome to honor the pope's jubilee in person, while he is perfectly well aware that the Romish church is seeking by all the arts of Jesuitic intrigue and deception to undermine and destroy our system of government by destroying our American system of free public schools; seeking to substitute parochial schools, under the exclusiv control of Catholic priestcraft, for cramming the rising generation with bigotry and superstition in counting beads, and kneeling and bowing before putty and plaster of paris images, suppressing in their education all historic facts about the black and bloody record of the cruelties, tortures, murders, persecutions, dungeons, inquisitions, and St. Bartholomew massacres that hav been practiced by that church, not to mention the notorious licentiousness, infanticides, and gross immoralities of its former popes, cardinals, bishops, priests, and "religions!"

So much for Blaine and his efforts to secure Catholic influence and votes, in view of again running for president.

Whereupon Grover Cleveland, the moral and political "reformer," elected by Christian voters, discovers the situation, and in view of reëlection by Catholic votes, he stacks the cards, by utilizing his official position in the appointment of spoils-hunters and appropriation of public money for the benefit of the church, to deal himself a royal sequence flush, which beats four aces, and is playing to raise Blaine out of the game, which he is sure to win on the show down, if Blaine has the pluck to "call." Cleveland not only squanders public money and patronage to win the Catholic vote, but he apes monarchical royalty and sends the pope a jubilee present in the name of the American people, without their wish or authority.

By this sycophantic aping he virtually recognizes and indorses the papal claim that the pope is the rightful temporal and spiritual ruler over all kings, potentates, and rulers of all nations of the earth by virtue of his fantastic role as "successor to Peter," holding the keys of both heaven and hell, with "power to loose or bind whom he may"—to forgiv sins and absolve from punishment, as well in temporal as in spiritual things—in short, the august and infallable Pecci.

It does not mitigate this insult to the non-Catholic American people to say that the present was a copy of the Constitution, nor that he did it as an individual citizen, as his secretary of state claims. Would he hav sent it had he remained an obscure inhabitant of Buffalo, running a private institution, instead of the government of the United States? Not much. He sent it because he occupied a high position as president, and would thus be recognized as representing the whole people, and thereby gain favor in the eyes of the pope, and especially the pope's followers—the Catholic voters in the United States.

He sent the present as president and representativ of the whole nation, or Archbishop Ryan and Cardinal Gibbons both lied to the pope in presenting it. Ryan told the pope it was "expressiv of the veneration and felicitation of his 'excellency' the president of the United States;" that it was "a tribute paid to your holiness by the ruler of sixty million people;" that his holiness had "received recognition from the kings of the world" and now received through "the most worthy president, the tribute of a free and independent people," etc.

Cardinal Gibbons, in his letter to the pope telling how Cleveland had asked him to transmit the gift, is equally gushing, and then the members of the delegation kneel before his holiness and receive the apostolic benediction "for themselvs and for their people," meaning the people of the United States whom they represented in presenting the gift.

Thus Cleveland has virtually prostrated the whole American nation on their bellies at the feet of the papal "throne," crawling and scrambling to get a smack on the pope's big toe. How do they—that is, the Protestant and non-Catholic portion of the people—like the situation in which they find themselvs placed by Grover Cleveland to insure the Catholic vote? Is not the humiliation delightful to enjoy? How long will they consent to be thus used as footballs by the political bosses of the parties for spoils—"for revenue only?" Is it not about time that the patriotic American citizen began to consider the situation, and bolt the track and the program made by the bosses? Since there is but little choice in the leading and ruling elements in the old parties, in this question of eternally selling out to the Catholic church vote, under threat of the priests that they can turn the vote for or against any candidate; and now that the leaders of the Henry George party are ready to traffic in the large vote developed on a single idea, and turn it in where it will most effectually help to second the plots already laid to capture the pope's vote, and humiliate Dr. McGlynn, who appears to be about the only American Catholic with American sentiments and sympathies, and allegiance to the American government before his allegiance to the pope; and since the Prohibition party is the ally of the saloon and whisky traffic against a high license or tax to regulate and diminish the evils of intemperance, is it not the proper time to organize American sentiment and manhood into a party of independent Liberals to maintain free speech and free press, and vote for no one who will not proclaim freedom from Catholic or other sectarian bulldozing, and go for sustaining our public school system—a party for the substance of the Nine Demands—putting its candidates in the field so that those who wish to can vote with a clear conscience? Such a party, with Colonel Ingersoll to lead, would poll votes enough the first time to warn the politicians against trading our birthright for the pope's efforts to destroy this government.

Notes From the Lecture Field.

There are strange people in this world, and one meets with more of them the farther he gets away from the highways of travel. On the 8th of February I lectured at Farmersville, Ind., to a very enthusiastic audience. It was in this immediate vicinity that I held a joint discussion with Elder T. J. Purvis, one year ago. As he was present at my lecture on the 8th inst., I invited him to reply; but the only reply he ventured to make was that he had not acquired the art of replying to jokes and fun, and would therefore hav to decline the invitation. But this did not suit his friends, and he was urged to challenge me for another debate, which I was only too willing to accept.

In recalling to mind the debate I had with the gentleman, I cannot forget the ostentatious display of one of his friends, who perched himself in a conspicuous place, announcing that he was going to take down in shorthand the entire debate and hav it published; but after the discussion was finished, there was no forthcoming published report to be seen. There was no paper that would undertake it, or even giv a synopsis of it. The same thing occurred last November in Salem, Neb., when I held a discussion with Elder T. J. Williamson. The church party there had imported a stenographer to take down the whole debate and publish it as an exterminator of Freethought in that town. The stenographer worked hard and I helped all I could, but it was the same old story—the mountain labored and brought forth a mouse. There was no adequate effort made to hav a complete report, so the whole thing fell through. Hardly a squib of a notice was given in the paper about the debate after it was over, but before it began this same paper was willing to do wonders if thereby it could only hav the debate published in full. I hav noticed that the people of the town where a discussion is held are not so fierce for the publication of the debate after it has been held as they are before it. I hav heard some of them explain that "it would not be favorable to the cause to hav it published." I called Elder Williamson's attention to the fable of the horse and the hen. A hen went into the horse's stall, and prudently suggested to the occupant that if he would not tramp on her feet she would not tramp on his, explaining doubtless that it would not do any good to step on each other's feet—that is, it would not be "favorable" to the general welfare of the hen.

At one place I stopped with a good, honest farmer, but not particularly Liberal. It was bitter cold weather. In the morning I was invited to follow the host and he would show me a place where I could wash; it was on an open porch, in cold, cold water, with snow flying in the air, and no soap. Jerusalem! didn't I get through with my morning ablutions in a hurry? And this was not all. There was poor dog Tray lying upon a coffee-sack shaking as if he would go to pieces. And that was all the bed the poor fellow had. Who would wish to be a dog with such a bed? That's what I regard as cold charity.

In "Egypt," where I hav been traveling for several weeks and during a cold spell of weather, the usual custom is to hav the door open. And the colder the weather, the more conspicuous this habit becomes.

While riding on the steamboats I noticed that most of the whites had a large percentage of negro pronunciation, as for instance, I heard a Kentucky preacher say, "I neber seed dat befoh;" "Gimme chaw terbacah." And among those who rejoice in the claims of a splendid education, the English language is fearfully maimed and mangled. I might giv many illustrations, but one will suffice. The little word "at" plays an important role in the Hoosier's limpid sentences. I heard quite often such uses of it as the following: "Where is he living at?" "Where does he board at," etc., emphasis always on "at."

I gave two lectures in Vevay, Ind., and as the aborigines had not the slightest conception of the waywardness of a Freethought lecture, you can hardly imagin the howl that went up Sunday evening after I had given two lectures. Mr. John Bakes, a man over eighty years old, is the veteran who invited me down into Egypt. I wish the grand old man may hav the pleasure of hearing other Liberal lecturers shake the dry bones of the fossils of Vevay.

I am to return from here to Chicago next week.

DELTA, COL., Feb. 7th, 8th, 9th.—I was assured Delta and Hotchkiss were a barren, steril wilderness, but I found this was a mistake of the most gigantic dimensions. Delta has never been boomed, but it is a happy, prosperous little city, surrounded by excellently good ranches. For twenty miles around there are macies (table land on tops of mountains) and rich bottom lands that will yield as bountiful crops as any land that ever lay out of doors. Here, as elsewhere—well, everywhere in Colorado—the one all-important need is water. No vegetation without irrigation. One of the surprises of the mountains is that when you hav ascended ten to fifteen hundred feet to the top of the mountains, you find you hav only got to the base of other mountains just as high. On the summits of the mountains are immense parks of natural grass, the free grazing-ground of the district. But the cows do not at all confine themselvs to the grass-growing places. The sides of the mountains, as well as the cañons and valleys, are spotted with stunted sage brush and occasional cactus, that seems to be making a feeble struggle for existence in a desert of dust or rocks. The cattle wander everywhere. It is surprising to a tenderfoot to see cows and calves breakfast on cactus, and dine on dry sage brush, and yet keep in good condition. But they do it. With Colorado cattle it is but a thing of custom.

Every ranchman that has any amount of stock—from one hundred to two thousand horses and cows—employs regular riders—cowboys—who are engaged the year around, paid $30 a month in winter and $40 a month in summer, with board; the ranchman supplying the horses to ride, and each cowboy needing from three to five. The cowboy rides to the grazing park of the herd each day, and makes, besides, frequent circuits around and over the mountains, looking after strays, and if any are found not doing well they are driven in, kept in the corral, and fed up. Every spring and fall they hav a "round-up." All the cowboys, under a captain appointed by the commissioners of the district, ride over the entire district, and drive in all the cattle and brand all the calves. Each ranchman has his own mark or brand. Calves found with cows are branded the same as the cows. When calves are found without cows, so identity is doubtful, they are generally killed and divided among those who find them, or used to supply the troop of cowboys while out on the round-up. The law is, if any ranchman kills a cow or a calf, he must hang the hide over his fence facing the public road for thirty days.

I enjoyed a happy asylum of peaceful rest in Delta, at the truly hospitable home of that stanch Liberal, J. J. Barker. The testimony of the Christians is, "He is the stanch friend of the poor, the ever ready helper of the needy, the most accommodating of neighbors, the most generous and public-spirited of citizens, the truest of friends, but the most dreadful, horrid, wicked, man in all Delta—he doesn't believe the Bible." And his fair and gentle wife is just like him.

My first lecture was delivered at the school-house, which was too small to accommodate the eager crowd that attended. The next two lectures were delivered at the court house, which, although double the capacity of the school-house, was too small. A very large number could find only standing-room. The demand for Liberal publications exhausted my supply. I obtained a number of new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

HOTCHKISS, COL., Feb. 10th, 11th, 12th.—The gentle, kindly-hearted Stephen Bailey, who owns the stage route, took me from Delta to Hotchkiss, twenty-five miles over the mountains. Hotchkiss is named after the veteran Liberal and pioneer settler, E. T. Hotchkiss, who has the best ranch, the largest brick barn, the handsomest brick house, the most promising young orchard, and who succeeded in inducing his fellow-ranchmen to erect the nicest brick school-house to be found outside the large cities in all western Colorado.

I delivered four lectures in the new, large, brick school-house. My audiences were seven-tenths cowboys. They came from far and near, many bringing their best girls with them. I do not desire either more intelligent, more interested, or more courteous hearers.

Friend Hotchkiss's house was the general rendezvous. The hospitality of the ranchmen of Colorado is as boundless and extensiv as the mountains. There seems no limit to it. Yet the ordinary house of the ranchmen is a mere cabin, having, like Noah's ark, only one door and one window. It is wonderful how very small a space is really a necessity to accommodate quite a number of people.

Christianity is quite scarce at Hotchkiss and vicinity, and what there is is of the poorest quality, mainly monopolized by the lowest order of ignorant foreigners.

DELTA, Feb. 14th.—I returned to Delta, under the direction of good friend J. J. Barker, who had enlisted my sympathy for a poor widow with three little children, whose health and strength had given out, who found work hard to obtain and poorly paid. And although the Christians had, unsolicited, given her their prayers, she ungratefully complained that prayers were unsubstantial diet, and failed even to keep the bare toes of her poor babies from chilling with cold. We decided to deliver a lecture for the sole benefit of the widow and her little ones. Every man, woman, and child paid admission. One Christian poked his head in and remained five minutes, pretending to be fumbling in his pockets for change; hinted at being desirous only just to remain a little while: "Wasn't interested in such irreligious carryings on;" but the stony-hearted doorkeeper was obdurate, and the good Christian had to depart. Another, full of guile and the Holy Ghost, with the help of the Lord did manage to beat Brother Baker out of five cents. So the entire amount of receipts was $24.70, which he paid to the poor widow next morning, making her heart glad and the children jubilant.

The next night, by urgent request, I lectured on "The Heaven of the Bible," to a good audience, and bade farewell to the many dear, kind friends I had made during my very pleasant sojourn at Delta.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

The Gospel According to Common Sense.

THE RESURRECTION FROM THE DEAD.

It was a very apposit reply of the Apostle Paul, when some of his disciples asked, "How are the dead raised, and with what body do they come?" "Thou fool!" and then he goes on to explain that it is by sowing the proper seed in the proper soil.

It is noteworthy that, whilst the founders of the Jewish religion, from Abraham downward, were much-married men, and did not confine themselvs to one wife, the founders of the Christian religion, Jesus and Paul, were bachelors. Having no lawful heirs or representativs in the succeeding generations, the question naturally arose how their predictions of a kingdom in perpetuity could be carried out. The absurd theory of the resurrection of their natural bodies was evidently invented to meet the emergency.

The ancient Jews knew nothing of the post-mortem existence of an individual, and the Old Testament says nothing about the matter. On the contrary, we read: "The dead praise not the Lord, neither they that go down into silence" (Ps. cxv, 17). "Man dieth and wasteth away; he giveth up the ghost, and where is he" (Job xiv, 10)? The idea of an incorporeal state of existence was borrowed from the heathen poets and philosophers by the learned Pharisees. It was by no means a comfortable doctrin. The souls of the departed, good or bad, were imprisoned in hades, where, according to the poets, they could think and talk, but could by no means ascend to the upper air. It is easy enough to die, according to Virgil: "Facilis descensus averni;" but to come to life again is another matter, and of transcendent difficulty. Jesus evidently paraphrased Virgil when he said: "Broad and easy is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many go in thereat; but strait is the gate and narrow the way that leadeth to life, and few there be that find it." Virgil invented separate receptacles for departed spirits, distinguishing the bad from the good, but they were both located in hades. Homer knew of no such distinction. The ghost of Achilles says to Ulysses:

> I'd rather be
> The servil hind for hire, and eat the bread
> Of some man scantily himself supplied,
> Than sovereign empire hold o'er all the shades.

Supposing it to be the case—which is supposing an impossibility—that dead people hav a conscious existence, nothing could be more dreary than their fate; to say nothing about the fire and brimstone business, which was invented by the Italian monks either preceding or following Dante, some centuries later.

The ancient philosophers, notably Pythagoras, Plato, and the poet Ovid, took a much more cheerful view of the life to come, though in some cases anomalous and grotesque. There is no question but that carnivorous man by process of digestion and assimilation in some manner transmutes animal into human flesh, but the way by which he again descends into the brute form by becoming grass, and so nourishing the animals destined to supply the larders of his descendants and heirs, is much more complicated and takes a long while about. Yet Ovid pathetically entreats his disciples to abstain from animal food lest they should be guilty of eating their relations! He firmly believed in the metempsychosis or transmigration of individual souls from men to animals, and so back again. The doctrin is an absurd one, but has some kind of basis in natural philosophy. The Christian doctrin of the resurrection is still more absurd, for it has no such basis whatever.

The champions of modern Christianity contend that Jesus was the first who rose from the dead, and that he inaugurated his new doctrin by a practical example. But if Jesus really rose from the dead, where is he? If he died again or "ascended into heaven," i. e., vanished into thin air, immediately after, what was the use, or where is the proof, of his resurrection? It is strange that the unsupported assertion of a few ignorant fanatics should influence the whole civilized world to believe so monstrous an absurdity. Not only has Jesus failed to make an appearance (according to promis) either personally or by proxy, but there has been no repetition of the phenomenon, although the power to work the same miracle was promised to all true believers. "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works shall he do because I go to the father" (John xiv, 12).

It may not be quite orthodox, 'tis true,
  But in my head a notion I hav got
That when a sinner once hath had his due,
  That is, when he is dead and gone to pot,
  'Tis better far to let him lie and rot.
With all his imperfections on his head,
  And from the book of life his name to blot,
Than rake him up again, as has been said,
By a post-mortem resurrection of the dead.

Because what changes must hav come to pass
  By means of that alchemist Father Time—
One part of man converted into grass,
  And one reduced to carbonate of lime;
  The volatil in viewless gas sublime,
The saturnine like metals sunk beneath;
  The victim and the author of the crime,
By which that victim was deprived of breath,
Alike commingled in the charnel-house of death.

For the creator 'twould be endless trouble
  To piece together all the parts disjoined;
Again connect each member with its double,
  The inert body with the activ mind.
  It would be scarcely possible to find
The parts component of each man and brother,
  Without in such way mixing up mankind,
And good and bad confuse with one another.
That to distinguish them would cause no end of bother.

Foote stands at the head—that is, head and Foote come into conjunction on this occasion; and that you may not misinterpret this rather anagrammatic expression, let me explain that it is Dr. E. B. Foote who stands at the head of the Roll of Honor, having generously placed in Mr. Eckhard's hands his check for $100. The doctor has contributed liberally, and fought valiantly, for Secularism these many years, and it is to be hoped he will soon see the triumph of the principles he has espoused. Dr. Foote's labor of life has been to free mankind from the slavery and suffering which ignorance of nature's laws invariably imposes, and in his "Plain Home Talk" and Health Monthly to learn man that, to conquer nature, he must obey her laws, and to obey must understand them properly. In that honorable sphere he also labored to abolish the narrowness and greed which environed his calling; he has helped, more than any other, to Liberalize the Esculapians and benefit the race. There are many, I know, who feel their indebtedness deeply enough to place on his brow their anadem of gratitude. We repeat with Dickens, "May the doctor liv long and prosper."

Friend Geiger, of Hudson, N. Y., writes:

MY DEAR MR. STEVENS: Something new this time. On reading your appeals for our cause, it occurred to me to try my hand. Met two friends who were willing to put down an "X," on condition that their names should not be published; of course, I agreed. Hope you will agree with me that half a loaf is better than no bread. Shall try again. Please acknowledge the $20 inclosed from two friends from Hudson, N. Y. Yours truly, L. GEIGER.

That's the kind of missionary work, Brother Geiger! There is no half a loaf about that. Convey to the "two friends" our gratitude. Mr. Geiger also informs me that they celebrated Paine's birthday in Hudson. "Oh, what a party!" friend Leonard writes. "Three in number. Wished for you and Mrs. Freeman, but hoped you had a larger company, though you could hav no better. We three, we happy three, we band of brothers"—you know the rest. It is no use thanking Brother Geiger, he will keep right on anyhow, for he has placed in our treasury during and since the Congress $95.

Owen Thomas Davies, of Brighton, Cal., in response to our letter called on Mr. Putnam at the office of Freethought, and paid a $25 life-passage, cabin accommodations, in the fast-sailing steamer, American Secular Union. She is a gallant ship, and has successfully weathered many a gale. Mr. Davies is an avowed, outspoken Freethinker, a clear thinker and great debater on Secular subjects.

Edward Chope, of Detroit, one of these hearty, earnest, honest Englishmen who are in the habit of forming their own opinions and affirming them, took a life-membership at my solicitation. He has attained the ripe age of seventy-three, though he would readily pass for twenty years younger, as there is nothing indicativ of "declining years" about his appearance—the result of an Infidel's correct living.

At nineteen Mr. Chope was a poor Devonshire apprentice, but with spirit enough to resist the atrocious treatment of that time, and he left his nativ land. On arriving in America he was not figurativly but absolutely penniless. But with that unconquerable determination for which the Briton is famous, he settled in Detroit in 1837, built up a large business, acquired considerable property, and has practically retired from control of the most famous truck and wagon works in Michigan, leaving his business to his sturdy sons. Mr. Chope is a great admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Heston, Putnam, and George.

To the generosity of Wm. Whittock, of Dushore, Pa., the American Secular Union is indebted for a contribution of $15, which will print a good many pamphlets to assist in wiping out the power of orthodoxy, and for which we feel duly grateful. Are there others in Dushore willing to do more?

Mr. Carl Hyldahl, of Fort Thomas, Ariz., duplicates his donation of last month with another check for $5, as a further token of his appreciation of our efforts and as an earnest of his desire for the triumph of Secular principles.

James B. Hassett, of Little Rock, Ark., sends words of encouragement that a new organization is about to be perfected there. That speech of Senator Crockett's should rouse every Liberal and lover of justice in that state to activity until such outrageous laws as are there enacted liv only in memory as relics of barbarism. Mr. Hassett sends $5 for the Campaign Fund. Many thanks.

Miss Voltairine de Cleyre's success at Pittsburgh as lecturer and orator has been something phenomenal. She has also aroused our Pittsburgh friends to noble enthusiasm and efforts in aid of the work of the American Secular Union, and we take this occasion to extend to those whose names appear above our unqualified thanks for their much-needed assistance, and our hope to be enabled to render a satisfactory account of our stewardship. Henry Hoover, in a private letter, wrote: "Miss V. de Cleyre lectured for us in Maltby Hall, Sunday, January 29th, on 'Secular Education,' and on Monday evening, January 30th, she delivered one of the finest Paine orations ever listened to in Pittsburgh or anywhere else. She closed by reciting an original poem entitled, 'An Unchristian Death,' in a style so lifelike and tragic that, had she not read it to me previously, I could not hav sustained the role of clergyman in the tableau. She disarmed all just criticism . . . and captured all hearts." Not only does our brilliant co-worker do grand work for us, but she contributes $5 to the Campaign Fund herself.

Judge I. S. Lee sounds the battle-cry for the Freethought battalions in Quincy, where superstition has ever held almost undisputed sway. A fine society is already organized, among whom the secretary can find several personal friends—Captain Steinwedel, Wm. A. Bader, and Ernst Bertschinger, the latter an old member of our Chicago society. Brother Lee is doing nobly.

Aunt Elmina sends $1 to help the cause. Well, when one who has passed through such a fiery furnace of persecution as she yet, undaunted in spirit, stands forward to continue the fight for others, success ought surely to be near at hand.

Geo. Maddocks, of Hamilton, Ont., whom we hav had the pleasure of meeting in Chicago, forwards $1 to the Campaign Fund "and $1 for our persecuted brother, E. C. Walker. . . . I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER family will help our brother as he did our dead hero, D. M. Bennett, when held by the tools of the church." This being the first dollar received from the Dominion, we rejoice to see that at least Brother Maddocks has not forgotten the American Secular Union.

Wm. C. Howard, of Volo, Ill., attended the last Congress and sends $2 to the fund. As Brother Howard is not overflowing with material wealth, this is quite a liberal donation for him, but he feels glad that he possesses the priceless satisfaction of being one of those whose mental riches hav ennobled our cause.

Thos. G. Rook, of Salem, Ia., is performing splendid pioneer work, sustaining almost alone the standard of Freethought in his vicinity. He writes glowing accounts of the fruit he expects as a result of Mrs. Freeman's grand lecture there.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

The Distribution of Wealth.

In reading Van Buren Denslow's articles on the "Distribution of Wealth," and especially the one where he makes the people all millionaires many times over, and no one willing to work, because all were so immensely wealthy, we—Mr. Slenker and Elmina—had many a talk on the possibilities and probabilities of such an experience. In supposing every person in the world to wake up some morning possessed of $800,000,000, Mr. Slenker made the following calculations, which, being rather of an interesting nature, I copy from his slate for THE TRUTH SEEKER:

If it were all in coin-gold, there would be more gold than all the manufactured iron on the earth. We will make a simple calculation:

A gold dollar weighs 25.8 troy grains; 7,000 grains make an avoirdupois pound; then 1,000,000 gold dollars would weigh 3,685 pounds, omitting the fraction. Allowing gold to be 19 times as heavy as water, it would make a cube of 17½ inches to a side, or 5.363 cubic inches, and 800 times this much would giv to each person 4,290,636 cubic inches of gold; allowing 1,500,000,000 people on the earth, it would make 6,435,954,600,000,000 cubic inches of gold for all the inhabitants of the earth. This would make a cube of 3 miles to a side, lacking 339 ft. 2 in.; or it would make a globe 3 miles 3,392 ft. in diameter. Drawing this cube or globe of gold into the size of ordinary railroad iron track of 23 pounds to the foot, it would make 1,244,518,000 miles of track, and it would be nearly 2½ times as heavy as iron. This would be enough in length to belt the earth 49,741 times. Allowing 5 feet of space between each rail, it would cover a zone 47 miles 545 ft. wide around the earth, enough to reach from here to the sun 14 times.

Now, it must be evident to all that such an immense amount of gold would render this metal entirely useless as a circulating medium, and make it valuable only in the arts, and dog-cheap at that! It would make all who hold land, houses, grain, and other concomitants of necessity or luxury the wealthy classes. The millionaire who has all his riches in bonds, notes, and mortgages would be a pauper, for these could be paid out of the $800,000,000 and the payer hardly miss the gold, while the payee would not be at all the gainer, save in being the possessor of a small addition to his pile of metal.

Until some other medium of exchange was agreed upon, we should be compelled to fall back upon the old barter system of exchanging a bushel of wheat, or corn, or potatoes for dry goods and groceries, and so on through the whole list of wants and supplies. All this proves that the real financial wealth of a people consists in produce, and not in money.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Snowville, Va., Feb. 28, 288

[Mr. Slenker's calculations are based on error. Mr. Denslow's figures were eighty millions, not eight hundred millions. But the figuring is just as interesting for all that. The average man is just as likely to possess $800,000,000 as $80,000,000.—ED. T. S.]

A Vision of Paradise.

Translated for the San Francisco Argonaut from the French of Ludovic Halevy.

My friend Armand was married day before yesterday at St. Clotilde's church. When I arrived, there was a great crowd, and the ceremony was going forward. I managed to slip in. The priest was finishing his little harang, and wound it up with this sentence:

"Therefore be united on earth till you are eternally united in heaven."

I could not restrain a slight exclamation. Armand's bride was not a young girl—he was marrying the pretty little Countess Jeanne de Charmelieu, the widow of my friend Gaston de Charmelieu.

This charming widow was destined to make my friends happy. After Gaston, Armand. On earth, nothing could be simpler; but above, in heaven, there would be two aspirants for the eternal union! Gaston and Armand, the first and second husbands.

I fell into a brown study. The sentence used by the priest probably appeared in all the short sermons that conclude wedding services. So five years ago, of course, the same promis was made to Gaston; he was told that if he lived and died like a Christian, he would meet his little Jeanne again in paradise, among the angels, the archangels, the principalities and powers. Meantime there was a great stir going on around me. Mass was over. The great organ gave us Mendelssohn's march. I followed the crowd, which bore me to the vestry-room. I shook hands with the bride, and shook hands with the groom, but said not a single word. I was very careful not to speak, for I had a piece of folly at my tongue's end, and if I had spoken at all, I don't think I could hav restrained myself from saying to Armand:

"Did you take in the full meaning of that sentence about the eternal union? There'll be two candidates, my dear fellow, for that eternal union."

I left the church, I made some calls, I rode my horse, I dined at the club, I went to the opera, and still that idiotic perplexity haunted me:

"How will Armand and Gaston settle it some day in another and a better world?"

I went to bed and to sleep, and here the dream begins. A dream, bear that well in mind, nothing but a dream.

. . . . . .

I was in paradise, at the station. Trains were going in and out; the cars started empty, and came back more or less well filled.

St. Thomas was the stationmaster. I chatted with him, and he very civilly explained the working of the system.

"The trains," said he, "start from the earth, touch at hell, touch at purgatory, and hav their terminus in paradise. We are very crowded just at present. The pope has been having rather a bad time of it for the last few years [this was in 1870, during the occupation of Rome]; and there has been a little atmosphere of persecution surrounding religion, that has braced up the tottering, and confirmed the indifferent. We hav reason to be very well satisfied; for the last few months there has been a constant increase in the number of our passengers for paradise; every day there is a demand for more cars. Small-pox has something to do with it, but the revival of faith has more. You can judge for yourself. Ah, seventeen. The express is due. Yes, we hav an express that comes right through from the earth. Do you hear the whistle? Here's the train. Our company is a large one, which issues shares by public subscription; the bonds are guaranteed by heaven. Our trunk lines are finished, but we are not yet in communication with all the planets. I want you to observe this incoming train. You see, we hav three classes of cars, first, second, and third; a baggage car, and a compartment for dogs. The passengers are alighting; watch them, and observe this: not many people in the second-class cars; we don't recruit much from among the lower middle class—restless, Voltairian, and Freethinking, the lower middle class. In the third-class cars we get crowds; the populace is wholly bad or wholly good; but generally speaking, good. The first-class cars are crowded, too. We must recognize that rich people are admirably facilitated for achieving salvation. Their time is their own, and even admitting that they giv Satan the best part of their existence, they always find an hour here and there, from time to time, to make up their religious negligences. God is not so severe as he is supposed to be. He is satisfied with very little, do you know? Only stay here two or three days, you will see half a hundred trains come in, and there cannot fail to be people that you know in some of them. You'll see how easy it is to win heaven."

St. Thomas is a communicativ saint. He chattered away, but for the last few moments of his discourse I was not listening. My St. Clotilde widow, Gaston's wife, Armand's wife, had come! I had seen her pretty head at the window of a parlor car; then, light and dashing, she sprang out of the car, showing her ankles a little—but then, they were very trim. She ran about in every direction, chirping, "Where's paradise? Where is it? I hav my ticket!"

I remembered seeing her just like that, one day, at the Compèigne station, leaving the special train that brought the empress's guests to the chateau. That day she showed her ankles, too, and that day, too, she fluttered along the embankment, chirping:

"My trunks! Don't let my trunks be forgotten! I hav fourteen."

An officer of the imperial household went to her at the Compèigne station, and said:

"Hav no feârs, madam la comtesse, I will take care of your trunks. I hav the trunks in charge."

And now St. Peter went to her at the paradise station, and said:

"Your ticket, madam? Will you be kind enough to show me your ticket?"

"Here it is, sir."

"Perfectly correct; you may go in. Here are the gates of paradise."

My little friend bowed prettily, and went in. An intense desire possessed me to follow her into paradise. Who could tell? Perhaps Armand was dead, and my widow would find herself confronted by her two husbands.

I asked St. Thomas if he could manage it so that I might go in.

"Easily," he replied.

"Only for an hour, you know," I hastened to add; "I sha'n't be detained—shall I be able to go away again? For you know, however delightful paradise may be, if I hav a few more good years to spend on earth I don't care to miss them. Life is only for a time, and paradise is for all eternity."

"Don't be afraid. They'll let you out. Come with me."

And he led me to St. Peter.

"Make a note of this gentleman," he said to him. "He is a visitor—he only wishes to go in and look about and come out again."

"Pass in, sir; pass in. I shall know you again."

There I was in paradise, and in the nick of time. Armand and Gaston, who had been scanning the passengers as they arrived, had already rushed to their wife.

Gaston had taken her right hand, and drew her on that side, saying:

"Jeanne, my dear Jeanne!"

Armand had taken her left hand, and drew her on that side, saying:

"Maud, my dear Maud!"

She had two Christian names, and it had seemed in better taste to her, in the intimacy of married life with her second husband, not to be called by the same name the first had made use of. She was an adorable being, replete with delicacy of feeling. Armand and Gaston meantime showed no intention of giving up.

"Jeanne!"

"Maud!"

"I am your first husband!"

"I am your second husband!"

"My rights are incontestable!"

"Sir, release this lady!"

"I hav nothing to say to you, sir. I do not know you!"

He didn't know him! Why, they were intimate friends on earth when they were alive, called each other by their first names, couldn't liv without each other. Armand, the second husband, almost lived at Gaston's house, so much so that gossips said—but where should we all be if what gossips say were believed?

The quarrel, meantime, was waxing hot between Armand and Gaston. Their voices rose. Existence is sweet in heaven, but slightly monotonous; so the smallest event attracts as much attention as a runaway in a country town. The blessed came trooping up from every direction. Some took sides with the first husband, and others with the second. Jeanne remained passiv; she had freed her hands, and said nothing to either Armand or Gaston.

St. Thomas had come within the gates of paradise when I did.

"This must often occur," I said to him; "a great many women on earth hav two husbands."

"Very true. The novelty is that the husbands should claim their wives. Generally, under these circumstances, the emulation is as to which husband shall not take her."

"How is it when things are reversed, and there are two wives to a husband?"

"Oh, then it's very different; the women always quarrel as to which shall keep the husband. Women are wild to be married, even in heaven. Still, we had rather an odd experience the day Napoleon I. arrived."

"Ah! You hav Napoleon in paradise?"

"Oh, yes! After a little purgatory, you know. Napoleon III. was so nice to Pius IX. that we couldn't, in common decency, leave his uncle in purgatory. Paradise was opened to him, and his first word was, 'How about my two wives?' He was asked if he had a preference. 'I hav, indeed. I want Josephine.' A cherub flew and told Josephine: 'Napoleon's there. He's asking for you.' 'I am exceedingly sorry,' said Josephine, dryly, 'but after what occurred in 1809, never!' We fell back upon Marie Louise, but she raised the roof. 'I go back to Napoleon! I, who am living so peacefully with the general! Don't talk to me about Napoleon. Let him take back Josephine!' Neither would change her mind, and there stood Napoleon, all alone, and rather put out, when Madam de Staël came by. 'Giv Napoleon to me,' she said, 'I'll take care of him.' And they got on famously."

Right here St. Thomas was interrupted by a loud cry that arose from the ranks of the blessed:

"St. Joseph! St. Joseph!"

It was in fact St. Joseph. He had been attracted by the noise, and came that way.

I must here caution the reader not to forget that all this was a dream.

St. Joseph was entirely the St. Joseph of the Italian school—brown drapery, gray hair and beard, a staff in his hand, and sandals on his feet, plus a very imposing aureole, and an air of prosperous, upper-middle-class benevolence.

He paused, asked what was the matter, and was told how things stood.

"Well," said St. Joseph, "it seems simple enough. The lady is here as a recompense for her religious conduct and Christian feeling. She has a right to happiness of the most peaceful character and largest scope. Let her pronounce, and choose between these gentlemen."

"But," said Gaston, "what is reserved for the one who comes in a bad second?"

Gaston had a very fine stable during his earthly pilgrimage, and his abominable slang slipped out even in the presence of St. Joseph.

"Never fear," said St. Joseph, "I will giv to him who is not chosen one of the unclaimed ladies who literally swarm in paradise. Do not let us lose time, madam. Make your decision. Choose, if you please."

Silent and motionless, Jeanne stood between her two husbands, and both Gaston and Armand alternated like characters in a Greek play, seeking the words that might touch their wife's heart.

"I was so proud of your beauty, Jeanne," said Gaston, "and of the sensation it made in society. Luxury for you was what I lived for. Your diamonds and lace, your carriages, your horses, your liveries. And then your room, Jeanne, your cherry satin room! And then boxes, boxes for all the first nights. Three hundred francs I paid for the first night of 'La Famille Benoiton.'"

"Boxes!" broke in Armand, "he talks of boxes! Even before I was the husband, I always paid for the boxes. The first night of 'Le Petit Faust' cost me four hundred francs, and I gave five hundred, in 1868, for Patti's benefit."

"Dates!" cried Gaston. "He remembers dates! Why, you dined at my table, sir, five days in the week, and you were always loafing in our box at the opera, you who make such an ado about three or four wretched theater-boxes sent to my wife."

"Two or three! Upon my word, such details are too petty."

"I quite agree with you," said St. Joseph, looking bored, and rearranging his aureole. "Be as brief as possible, if you please, gentlemen. Kindly express yourself in favor of one or the other, madam."

Jeanne would not speak, and the two husbands raved on.

"Remember, I gave up my career for you," said Gaston; "I resigned from the army because you didn't like living in a garrison."

"And I joined the Imperialists for you!" cried Armand. "This gentleman had accustomed you to the riot of Second Empire balls, and, rather than that you should giv them up, I scandalized my whole family by showing myself at the Tuileries. I, accepting the hospitality of a Napoleon!"

"No politics!" said St. Joseph firmly. "Above all, nothing derogatory to Napoleon III. Suppose he should withdraw his troops from Rome, what would become of the pope?"

"I shall obey you," said Gaston. "I hav stronger claims than mere political affiliations. Our love, Jeanne! Remember! I was the first, the first! Our walks, on your father's estate. Those shady little paths, when your head sometimes lay on my shoulder; our wedding-day, when we came to my home, our home, at midnight, that bitter cold weather. The ground was white with snow, do you remember? What a roaring big fire there was at the château to welcome us! How still the room was, how frightened we both were!"

"Sir," interrupted Armand, "your reminiscences are in execrable taste."

"Very possibly, sir, but I may certainly be allowed to recall my confidence. My confidence was simply unbounded. How many of my friends came to me perfidiously to say, 'Keep an eye on Armand'—meaning this gentleman. 'Keep a watchful eye on Armand. He is very fond of you, we all know that, but there's somebody he is fonder of, and that's your wife.' I disdained their gossip."

"I hav my own record on the grounds of confidence," said Armand proudly. "Later, sir, when in my turn I was the husband, little calumnies were buzzing about. It was Monsieur de Séricourt that they told me to watch, Séricourt, my best friend—how ridiculous!"

I observed that Jeanne could not control a little start when she heard the name of Monsieur de Séricourt. I observed it, but Armand observed nothing, and continued:

"And when Séricourt was killed in Mexico, and you, my dear wife, permitted the unchecked outburst of your natural and proper grief, I received an odious anonymous letter: 'Your wife,' it said, 'sheds more tears for the friend than she will ever giv the husband.' I never mentioned the letter to you. Suspect you! Suspect Séricourt!"

"Who is this Séricourt who has got mixed up with all this?" said St. Joseph. "Is Séricourt a third husband? I am very much perplexed."

"Just one word, St. Joseph, just one, but a clincher. The day I married this lady, a priest, an excellent priest, promised me at St. Clotilde's church that our temporary union on earth should be followed by an eternal union in heaven."

"But, St. Joseph," cried Gaston, "the day I was married, at the Madeleine, a bishop—see?—not a priest, a bishop—made me the self-same promis in the self-same terms."

"This is becoming very embarrassing," murmured St. Joseph, "very embarrassing indeed. Our representativs on earth sometimes act very inconsiderately. But come, madam, I revert to my first decision; it is for you to choose. You hav not spoken. Speak!"

Then the little widow, rosy, and much moved, said:

"If you are infinitly good, St. Joseph, you will permit me to rejoin Monsieur de Séricourt, who is over there in that little cloud on the left. He has been beckoning to me for the last quarter of an hour."

I turned my head, and perceived Séricourt, in fact, at the left, in his little cloud, expressing his affection and wishes in highly sentimental pantomime.

Séricourt! Another of my friends! This charming woman was, I repeat, destined to contribute, even to all eternity, in this world and the next, to the happiness of my friends.

"Why didn't you speak at once?" said St. Joseph; "this solves everything. Make your arrangements with Monsieur de Séricourt. What do I wish, myself, except that you may be happy in paradise, since you hav been a good Christian?"

. . . . . .

Whereupon I awoke with a start, this rejoinder struck me as so sprightly on the part of the excellent St. Joseph.

The Bible.

Joseph Parker, D.D., of London, says of the Bible: "Such a book, written under such circumstances, and issuing in and from such an age, has to be accounted for." It is conceded, I believe, that there were two such men as Moses and Jesus Christ, who lived in the world, and that the possible and probable facts in the Bible, those incidents that hav occurred and do occur to individuals and nations, may be true; for such incidents are subjects that require no other than human testimony to establish our belief. It is the divine claims of the Bible that are in dispute. It is claimed, in the Bible, that Moses was an inspired lawgiver of God, and that Jesus Christ was the son of God. These Bible facts are submitted to our reason by human testimony; and it is claimed that miracles were performed as proof of their divine mission.

However, it is thought by some that human testimony is not competent to prove a miracle. The reason for this is based on science and experience, in contrast with the probability that human witnesses may be deceived, or trying to deceive. The matter is parallel to the asking of the question: Could human witnesses convince me that there is a personal God, when I could never discover his existence in nature, science, or experience? If they could not, then how can human testimony convince me that a God, whom they can never prove to exist, worked miracles to prove Moses his lawgiver and Jesus Christ his son? It is a fact, also, that the credibility of human witnesses in regard to any fact grows weaker as time advances from the days of the living witnesses.

It is claimed, also, that the moral teaching of the Bible is no proof of its claims, from the fact that morals all lie in the field of discovery, science, and human experience.

It is also claimed that the Bible contains a history of God's dealings with individuals and nations, and approves usages and conduct that are contrary to every principle of justice, mercy, and the welfare, natural rights, and happiness of the human race.

But, in the further prosecution of the subject, we shall assume the existence of a personal God, who created all things; and that "his power and divinity" are developed in the "things that are made—that the heavens declare his glory and the firmament sheweth his handiwork; that day unto day and night unto night utter this evidence to the reason of mankind."

The question then comes, not, Has he revealed his will to man? but, Can he reveal his will to man outside of reason and human experience? If not, why? And if so, how?

He cannot impress his will on the human mind, because it would vitiate man's physical and mental constitution, his free agency and responsibility.

He can, only and alone, express his will to the perceptiv organs of man's body. Reason is the human province and duty. The expression must be in intelligible signs or symbols of ideas. Then the idea is complete. "Faith comes by hearing," and the thing expressed is the thing heard, and the thing heard is the "word of God."

A disembodied expression of words would be a miracle without the idea of its source, and the same would be outside of science, experience, and the common use of man's articulate organs. We presume to state that for God to speak by man, to man, for man, is the most natural and reasonable conclusion. Inspiration to speak is a physical, not a mental, operation, and the choice of adopting a system by the inspiration of witnesses can be compared to the idea of inspiring every man to talk to himself.

The final result of individual inspiration, we apprehend, would end in the idea of natural phenomena, to the destruction of divine control.

We now propose to suspend the pro and con of this subject on one miracle—that Christ either did or did not arise from the grave. The whole system of Bible theology stands or falls on the proof or disproof of this fact.

Let it be understood at the outset that the subject is not submitted as a scientific or moral problem, but above and beyond both. The process of reasoning in this case belongs to jurisprudence, logical reasoning on facts, and this is all suspended on the credibility of the witnesses and their testimony. It is unjust, unjudicial, and illogical to test a matter of fact, submitted to witnesses, by arguments about science and experience without first doing justice to the testimony, since, upon our assumption, that there is a personal God, a miracle might be thought improbable, but by no means impossible. Hence, the nature of a fact does not authorize unfair dealing with testimony. We admit the fact, in this case, is hard to believe, for some doubted with their eyes on Christ after he arose and while he was speaking to them, and Thomas declared he would hav to see and put his fingers in the nail-holes of his hands, and thrust his whole hand into his side, before he would believe it. And even some (we know not how many) of the Corinthian church said, "There is no resurrection of the dead;" and would seem to ask the questions: "How are the dead raised up, and with what [kind of] body do they come?" It is admitted that supernatural facts are the most difficult to be believed, because they contradict our "invariable experience, and, opposing the well-known laws of our corporeal nature, are in themselvs in the highest degree improbable, and require for their belief a testimony so ample and attended by such circumstances as would render its falsehood no less miraculous than the fact attested." This fact lies in the class having internal improbability, which must be overcome by an increased weight of testimony.

But we now notice what are generally conceded to be the qualifications of a credible witness: First, "Sufficient discernment, opportunity, and attention to obtain a clear knowledge of the fact attested. Secondly, Disinterestedness, which, in its full extent, implies the absence of all expectation of advantage or detriment arising from the testimony, either to the witness himself, or to his friends, sect, or party. Thirdly, Integrity. This affords the strongest assurance of a true testimony, inasmuch as it is absolutely inconsistent with any intention to deceive or prevaricate, as well as with a conscious ignorance of the fact attested."

The witnesses to the resurrection of Christ say that after he arose he was forty days with his disciples before he ascended; that they saw him, talked with him, and handled him, and that he showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs, speaking things pertaining to the kingdom of God, and that they saw him ascend in a cloud up into heaven, and that his last words were: "Ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth." The Jews, however, rejected their testimony, and to-day stand in opposition to the credibility of these witnesses. The witnesses claim, however, that when the chief priests heard the report of his resurrection, they called the elders and took council, and that they bribed the guard they placed at the grave with "large money" to say, "His disciples carried him away while we slept." It would seem that this bribed testimony was not very credible from men who were asleep when the body was taken; and it seems equally strange that all the guard were asleep under a penalty of death for being asleep. We could not expect better, however, from the history of the Jews. The chief priests and elders told the guard that, if they would take the money and tell the lie, if the bribery came to the governor's ear, "we will persuade him and secure you." The Jews, to-day, believe this lie. The witnesses say that an angel, whose countenance was like lightning and raiment as white as snow, rolled the stone back from the grave, while there was a great earthquake, and that the guard, for fear of the angel, "did shake and become as dead men." These are the two tales about how the body was taken from the grave, and both agree that the body was missing from the grave.

Now, as to the credibility of the witnesses to this fact, it will hav to be shown that they did not hav sufficient discernment to discover the fact; that their opportunity was not sufficient, and that they did not giv enough attention to obtain a clear knowledge of the fact; that they were too much interested for themselvs, their friends, sect, or party to giv true testimony, and that they had no integrity, and did try to deceive and prevaricate. If this cannot be proven, then they are, and should be, entitled to the full credibility of their testimony. It will not do to admit the witnesses credible, but say they were honestly deceived by false perceptions. This would impeach their physical senses without evidence, and introduce the philosophy of Malebranche, who taught that the visible world had no real existence; that the human senses were given to acquaint us with the power of preserving our animal existence, and not to enable us to discover the essence of things. This makes human perception a deception, and would destroy the credibility of all human testimony about any fact.

We here state that supernatural facts demand supernatural proof to our senses, and if there is any other conceivable way to introduce this proof than by miracles, we should like to learn it.

When the miracle of Christ's resurrection was demonstrated to the perceptiv senses of his witnesses by many infallible proofs, after he arose from the grave, he then taught and the witnesses taught that their testimony could establish the fact to "the uttermost part of the earth," without the continuation of miraculous proof. Christ upbraided the eleven with their unbelief and hardness of heart for not believing witnesses who reported his resurrection to them. Those who said, "There is no resurrection of the dead," were told by an apostle that the evidence of the witnesses was sufficient to prove the fact. Read 1 Cor. xv, where the denial is answered. The idea is that if he was seen by Cephus, James, all the apostles, and five hundred at one time, and, last of all, by Paul, after he arose from the grave, and that the testimony had been preached to them, they should believe the fact. In their denial that there is no resurrection of the dead, the idea is that Christ was not raised from the dead; and, if this be true, it made preaching vain, faith vain, and left them still in their sins. Yes, says the apostle, not only so, but "we are found false witnesses, because we hav testified of God that he raised up Christ, whom he raised not up, if so be the dead rise not."

But here, for the present, we let the curtain fall. We hav great confidence in the fact that the Liberal element is for truth on any subject, regardless of consequences, and that there is no dogmatic creed, sect, or party to confine their investigations. We shall ask at their hands a fair and logical investigation of the foregoing thoughts. We hav long since been of the opinion that the Jews and Christian sects hav no foundation or logical method to do justice to the Bible, and it must not be thought by Liberals that we designedly mean any egotism by asking them to do the Bible justice. Science is science, experience is experience, but theology is theology.

Balance of Trade.

The balance of trade theory is based on the idea that a community of individuals, or nation, is like a merchant who is selling his goods for cash. If the merchant givs out more goods then he receives back value in cash, he is getting poorer, and therefore it was imagined that if a nation sent out less goods and got back more of other goods it was running in debt; for the idea was that it bought the goods for cash, and must owe for them if their value exceeded the value of the exports. But this opinion was founded on ignorance of the ways of commerce. It will be very easily seen if we will just reflect for a moment. Ships are constantly going and coming with goods, and, although one man may sell his cargo for cash and come home with the money, still some other person loads the ship and leaves more or less money where he buys, and the result, so far as the whole trade is concerned, is a mere exchange of commodities, and not a buying and selling for cash. The surplus product of the nation is taken from its ports and traded for the surplus of other countries. Now, the surplus is utterly worthless at home; even when it happens to be a thing so useful as corn, if it can not be sold it is often burnt. We will suppose a cargo of corn to be carried to Liverpool from New York. It was almost worthless here in the Missouri valley—selling for five cents per bushel. Carried to New York, it stands at twenty cents. Now, when carried to Liverpool it stands, we will say, at thirty cents. All this extra price was put on it because of human labor, care, and risk—cost of carrying and handling, of insurance and commissions. At Liverpool it sells for thirty cents, and is there, in the process of trade, exchanged for a knife, which is carried to the port of New York, where it is worth, at wholesale, forty cents (under our tariff its price is raised to about eighty cents, say). Now, here was five cents increased by commerce to forty cents; here the account at the port of New York reads thus:

Exports, twenty cents; imports, forty cents.

In other words, the true balance of trade is in our favor, and it is clearly seen how absurdly false was the old theory, long ago, as Lord Brougham said in 1830, exploded, so that no man who prizes his reputation for intelligence dare affirm it. Even Henry Clay, in a speech on the compromise tariff made in 1832, says, though he had formerly a different opinion, and "was astonished to hear Webster say our imports should exceed our exports if we prosper:" "Yet, on reflection, I see that they must, at least, equal them." Now take the other view. Suppose a cargo of cotton is exported from New York, valued at $100,000; on the way it takes fire and is so badly damaged that it sells for only $25,000, and in exchange for it a cargo of silk worth that sum, and on the return voyage the silk is also damaged, so that when it reaches New York it is worth only $10,000. Now the account reads:

Exports—$100,000.
Imports—$10,000.
Loss—$90,000.

Yet, according to the ancient muddle-brained theory, we made money. According to that we had only to carry our cargo out and toss it into the sea and bring back nothing. We should then hav

Exports—all.
Imports—none.

McCulloch, a most able writer, early saw this humbug, and he declared boldly that a state grew rich exactly in proportion as her imports exceeded her exports; or as she received more and gave less.

Accordingly, what do the facts of commerce show? England used often to hav less imports than exports; but every year since 1848 her imports hav exceeded her exports by from two to eight hundred million dollars, and her wealth has increased in proportion.

Our exports, with our greater population and opportunities, are often not over one-third as much as England's. And our imports, even with sixty per cent put on by tariff, are less than our exports!

As nations make their own money by law, it would be amazing folly in us to trade what cost labor for what is made by the scratch of the legislativ pen. Greenbackers, of course, would be the very last to want to sell value for their ideal money. Strange to say, however, they often do so. HOLT.

Geology and Scripture.

Andrew White in Popular Science Monthly for March.

The most noted among efforts to keep geology well within the letter of scripture is of recent date. In the year 1885 Mr. Gladstone found time, amid all his labors and cares as the greatest Parliamentary leader in England, to take the field in the struggle for the letter of Genesis against geology.*

On the face of it his effort seemed Quixotic, for he confessed at the outset that in science he was "utterly destitute of that kind of knowledge which carries authority," and his argument soon showed that this confession was entirely true.

But he had some other qualities of which much might be expected—great skill in marshaling words, great shrewdness in adapting the meanings of single words to conflicting necessities in discussion, wonderful power in erecting showy structures of argument upon the smallest basis of fact, and a facility almost preternatural in "explaining away" troublesome realities. So striking was his power in this last respect that a humorous London chronicler once stated that a bigamist had been advised, as his only hope, to induce Mr. Gladstone to "explain away" one of his wives.

At the basis of this theologico-geological structure, Mr. Gladstone placed what he found in the text of Genesis: "A grand fourfold division" of animated nature "set forth in an orderly succession of times," and he arranged this order and succession of creation as follows: "First, the water population; secondly, the air population; thirdly, the land population of animals; fourthly, the land population consummated in man."

His next step was to slide in upon this basis the apparently harmless proposition that this division and sequence "is understood to hav been so affirmed in our time by natural science that it may be taken as a demonstrated conclusion and established fact."

Finally, upon these foundations he proceeded to build an argument out of the coincidences thus secured between the record in the Hebrew sacred books and the truths revealed by science as regards this order and sequence, and he easily arrived at the desired conclusion with which he crowned the whole structure, namely, as regards the writer of Genesis, that "his knowledge was divine."

Such was the skeleton of the structure; it was abundantly decorated with the rhetoric in which Mr. Gladstone is so skilful an artificer, and it towered above "the average man" as a structure beautiful and invincible—like some Chinese fortress in the nineteenth century, faced with porcelain and defended with bows and arrows.

But its strength was soon seen to be unreal. A single shot from a leader in the army of science wrecked it. In an essay admirable in its temper, overwhelming in its facts, and absolutely convincing in its argument, Professor Huxley, late president of the Royal Society, and doubtless the most eminent living authority on the scientific questions concerned, took up the matter.

Mr. Gladstone's first proposition, that the sacred writings giv us a great "fourfold division" created "in an orderly succession of times," Professor Huxley did not presume to gainsay.

But, as to Mr. Gladstone's second proposition, that "this great fourfold division . . . created in an orderly succession of times . . . has been so affirmed in our own time by natural science that it may be taken as a demonstrated conclusion and established fact," Professor Huxley showed that, as a matter of fact, no such "fourfold division" and "orderly succession" exist; that, so far from establishing Mr. Gladstone's assumption that the population of water, air, and land followed each other in the order given, "all the evidence we possess goes to prove that they did not;" that the distribution of fossils through the various strata proves that some land animals originated before sea animals; that there has been a mixing of sea, land, and air "population" utterly destructiv to the "great fourfold division" and the creation "in an orderly succession of times;" that so far is the view presented in the sacred text, as stated by Mr. Gladstone, from having been "so affirmed in our own time by natural science, that it may be taken as a demonstrated conclusion and established fact" that Mr. Gladstone's assertion is "directly contradictory to facts known to everyone who is acquainted with the elements of natural science;" that Mr. Gladstone's only geological authority, Cuvier, had died more than fifty years before, when geological science was in its infancy (and he might hav added, when it was necessary to make every possible concession to the church,) and, finally, he challenged Mr. Gladstone to produce any contemporary authority in geological science who would support his so-called scriptural view. And, when in a rejoinder Mr. Gladstone attempted to support his view on the authority of Professor Dana, Professor Huxley had no difficulty in showing from Professor Dana's works that Mr. Gladstone's inference was utterly unfounded.

Both the scientific and theological world remained silent; there was nothing more to be said.

This being the case, Mr. Gladstone's wonderful fabric of coincidences between the "great fourfold division" in Genesis and the facts ascertained by geology fell of themselvs. Professor Huxley's blow had shattered the central proposition—the key-stone of the supporting arch—and the last great fortress of the opponents of unfettered scientific investigation was in ruins.

To Robert G. Ingersoll.

From the World.

When thou wert born, the wanton winds sang low,
And Nature smiled upon her newest toy;
She gave to thee the frankness of a boy;
A great warm heart, a soul and brain aglow
With all the nobler passions that do blow
Great thoughts around the world; and then, in joy,
She gave thee Mirth, and said, "Thou shalt destroy
The weeds that in my children's gardens grow."

And what a faithful gardener thou art here,
The roses growing in our gardens tell;
We look for weeds, but look for them in vain.
The rose of Hope grows in the place of Fear—
The rose of Reason in the place of Hell—
In the wondrous gardens of the human brain!

Striking at Public Schools.

From the New York Times.

The bill recently introduced at Albany by Senator Ives to allow a number of charitable institutions, both Catholic and Protestant, to secure a share of the school moneys of the city of New York is attracting a great deal of attention. It has not yet become known whether or not the Protestant institutions hav asked for it. The friends of the Catholic Protectory (one of the beneficiaries) claim that the Protectory has been giving education as a gratuity, and that proper compensation has been unjustly withheld for years. Therefore the constantly reviving demand for a part of the school moneys. It is asserted that the Protectory is more desirous of having the state committed to the principle of admitting its right to the money than it is for a large appropriation at the present time. Once this is settled, the door will be opened for back appropriations.

In order to show more clearly whether the institution is sectarian or not it will be necessary to make several quotations from recent reports. The report for the year 1886 contains these statements:

> The proficiency of the children in Christian doctrin continues to be the first and most important care of the heads of both the male and the female departments. The religious instructions given . . . hav had the most satisfactory results, as shown by the large number of children acceptably prepared this year to receive the sacrament of confirmation, which was administered to 540 boys and girls at the chapel of the female department by the Most Rev. Archbishop Corrigan on June 16th last. . . . The urgent necessity of bringing the work of the New York Catholic Protectory nearer completion should make itself more generally felt, and should be more justly appreciated by the large Catholic population of this archdiocese. The supposition that because the Protectory receives, under state laws, a per capita allowance from the city of New York, the institution should need no other support, is entirely fallacious.

The report for 1887 has the following:

> The best care and most patient attention of both the Christian Brothers and of the Sisters of Charity continue to be given to the scholastic training of the children of both sexes under their course of instruction at the Protectory. The complete curriculum in use in the public schools in New York is also followed by our teachers, and with most certainly quite as good a result. . . . The scholastic teaching imparted to the 20,000 children who hav been cared for the last twenty-four years at the New York Catholic Protectory, and by which almost that entire number of subjects hav had the benefits of a good common-school course, and by which many thousand boys and girls hav been sent out on their life journey possessing the boon of proficiency in reading, writing, and arithmetic, together with the elementary knowledge of the other items of a common-school course, viz., history and geography—these, with a well-grounded understanding and a daily practice of Christian exercises, hav been all conferred on them without the aid of any part of the public funds yearly applied to the expense of instructing the children of this state or city. The managers of the Protectory hav long felt that children of this institution hav not, during all this time, been placed on an equality with the other children of the state as regards the expense of their schooling, and last year the managers made an effort to hav this inequality removed by asking, in their name, for the same annual per capita share of the educational fund as that applied each year to the expense of schooling of those children of the same class dwelling in other institutions which are of exactly the same legal status as the Catholic Protectory. Lack of time for the study of this claim of our children prevented its taking shape of law last year, but the president hopes that the committee of managers charged with the prosecuting of this important and most equitable claim on the legislature will use all diligence in its pursuit, and there can be no doubt that, on a perfect understanding of their claim to a share of the school moneys for the instruction of the children in the Catholic Protectory, it will be cheerfully recognized and provided for by both branches of the legislature and by the executiv of the state government.

Mr. Hoyt, superintendent of the poor in Westchester county, has endeavored to move from the care of the Protectory such poor children of that county as were committed to us, he having in view the finding of places of adoption for these Catholic children out West, through the ministry of the Children's Aid Society. This risk of proselytizing the poor children of Westchester was successfully avoided by the authorities of the Protectory, and the board of supervisors of that county hav since decided to permit all of the Catholic children in our charge to remain in this institution, and that future commitments be continued thereto, leaving it to our care to procure fitting homes for them.

The present bill by Senator Ives is the same old horse under a new blanket. There was a gap in the appropriations after Tweed's overthrow and down to 1877. The last appropriations for the Protectory, $50,000 in each instance, were signed by Governor Robinson in the supply bills of 1877, 1878, and in 1879. In 1880 an item was inserted in the supply bill, but it was finally removed to another bill which was not signed by Governor Cornell. In 1883 the appropriation of $50,000 for the Protectory appeared for the last time. It was in the supply bill, and Governor Cleveland vetoed the item.

The sectarian attacks upon the public schools of New York city began almost with the very year of their opening, 1842, but they were never successful. About the year 1842 assemblymen were nominated on the issue of sectarian appropriations, but the ticket polled less than three thousand votes. When the Tammany ring began to secure the control of the city more determined efforts were made to capture moneys for sectarian schools, and they were every year opposed with success. The board of education was then attacked by the ring. In 1869, when Tweed was a member of the state senate, he introduced a bill for the distribution of the school moneys to any school in which not less than two hundred children were taught gratuitously. The rate allowed was the same as in the public schools, $8 per head. A committee to further the interests of the bill confessed openly that the object was to take Catholic children from the public schools and to instruct them in the parochial schools. Indeed, one clergyman stated in private conversation that he was opposed to the public school system as then in existence. He further said that if the money could be distributed in the manner called for by the bill, thirty per cent of the children in the public schools would go to the parochial schools, because they were Catholics; that another thirty per cent of Protestants would leave them in order to attend their own church schools, which would be helped by a division of the moneys, and that, as to the remaining forty per cent, it would gradually learn that the public schools could not be sustained. It was conceded by the speaker that, if the bill passed, more than half of the school buildings would be idle, and that the whole of the system of public schools would in the end be destroyed. The bill was referred to the committee on education and not to the committee on charitable and religious institutions, but in spite of this reference the bill was defeated.

Then came a bill which legislated the board of education out of office and authorized the mayor, A. Oakey Hall, to appoint twelve school commissioners. The bill became a law, and a section provided for the tax levy of the city of New York so that an amount equal to twenty per cent of the excise moneys received in 1868 should be distributed by some one to be named by the new school commissioners. Of the twelve commissioners, nine held positions under the Tweed ring. The chairman was Bernard Smyth, and the clerk was William Hitchman. Both of these gentlemen were Catholics, as was also the commissioner who was appointed to distribute the fund, which proved to be $200,000. The first result was that the parochial schools increased, to the great injury of the public schools. For the eight years previous to 1869, the average annual increase in the attendance at the public schools had been about 5,000. The year ending December 31, 1870, showed a decrease of 4,000.

As soon as the facts were realized by the friends of the public schools they combined to strike out the twenty per cent clause and to abolish Mayor Hall's commissioners. A new bill was framed, providing that the board of apportionment should fix the amount that should be expended by the board of education. The board itself was again constituted very much as it had been before the Tweed bill passed. This reform bill became a law during Mayor Havemeyer's term—in April, 1873. He appointed the twenty-one members of the board, which met for the first time in June, 1873. The results of the two systems became apparent within a very few years. During the four years ending with December 31, 1872, there was, under the Tweed law, a falling off in the attendance at the public schools of over 4,000 pupils. There should hav been a gain of over 20,000 during that time. The net loss, therefore, to the public school system was about 24,000. As soon as the law of 1873 began to take effect, a marked increase was shown. This increase grew larger by a kind of arithmetical progression, so that by January, 1880, there were 30,000 more pupils in the public schools than there were seven years before, at the time when the Tweed law ceased to be operativ.

Nonsense About Sunday.

Dr. Felix L. Oswald, in his paper on "The Coming Civilization," wrote: "The workingmen of the future will most emphatically protest against medieval methods of government interference with legitimate rewards of industry; as, for instance, by the suppression of public recreation on the only day when about ninety-nine per cent of our laborers find their only chance of leisure." In the North American Review for March W. B. Steel takes up the cudgel for the Sabbatarians, and writes a great deal of nonsense. Holding up the example of Germany and France, in which countries he alleges that the secularization of Sunday has forced the workingmen and clerks to labor seven days each week, he says, "Surely in those countries is realized Dr. Oswald's ideal of the workingman's Sunday," and then asks:

"Now, does the American workman propose to follow the example of his French and German brother? It will be a sad day for himself and his country when he does so. Already is there a strong tendency here toward the secularization of the Sunday. Many of our railroad companies run their freight and passenger trains on Sunday, and if their employees refuse to work they are promptly discharged. Other corporations, and even private individuals, are following in the wake of the railroad companies. Nothing would please avaricious capital and grasping monopoly better than to see a complete secularization of the Sunday in the United States, and nothing would tend more toward the degradation and demoralization of our working classes, and through them of the whole country."

We hav heard this cry until its echoes are becoming tiresome. The statement is not true as to what Secularists, like Professor Oswald, require; it is not true as to Germany, nor as to France, and it is decidedly erroneous as to this country. Secularists desire as earnestly as the Christians, and much more honestly than they, to hav one day in seven on which the laborer can rest and amuse himself—that is, one day in each week which belongs to the individual, which he is not bound to giv to his employer, and which his employer cannot require from him. They desire the day to belong absolutely and wholly to the individual, to rest or play, to sing or pray, upon, as his inclination may lead him. Christians, on the other hand, demand the observance of the day because it is their holy day, their fetich, their St. Andrew's day, upon which they collect their tithes, or as nearly the tenth portion of a man's income as they can squeeze from his reluctant pocket. They demand its observance for their own uses, knowing that if the people hav the legal opportunity they will forsake the churches on Sunday, and that means also on other days, and the final result will be the destruction of Christianity and its power. That is why the Protestant churches are such strenuous upholders of the Sunday laws, and that is the reason why they will lie about plain matters of fact. The Catholic church, having a stronger grip upon its followers, has never been afraid to let the people enjoy themselvs on Sundays—after going to church!

Germany is a Protestant nation, with Infidelity in the colleges, and the spirit of Secularism developed in the cities. But the mass of Germans belong to one or the other of the wings of the Christian church, and any abuse of the laborers is not due to Secularism, but to Christian greed. In France the secularization of Sunday is improved by the people for secular enjoyment. Except the Catholics, they do not go to church, and that is the reason for the cry against Sunday as a secular holiday. The business of Paris on Sundays is largely done by the proprietors of small shops, catering to the usual trade of a holiday, and surely they may work when they choose without doing the laborers an injury. Of the Sunday trade of Berlin and other German cities the same statement may be truthfully made.

In this country many manufacturing and railroad interests require constant labor by some one; to provide amusements for the great mass of people many must work on Sunday. But it is almost, if not quite, an invariable rule that those who are on duty on Sunday shall hav a day off during the week. One-seventh of their time they hav to themselvs. Constant Sunday labor on railroads and by other corporations, instead of compelling men to work more constantly, simply givs employment to more people, and is therefore a blessing and not an abuse. The men who work on Sundays in this country are glad of the opportunity to do it.

The question with the Sabbatarians is not one of interest in the workingman at all, else they would pay more attention to facts. The question with them is whether they shall be allowed to control the leisure moments of the people; to force them to observe the day on which Christians hold their prayer-meetings, and to forbid all secular enjoyment that the churches may reap the benefit. Sunday is the round up day of the pious, the churches are their corrals, and the Sunday laws are useful in driving in the herds. Without the laws the preachers are as helpless as a cowboy afoot. Sunday laws are the expression of Christian despotism, evidences of its determination to rule the state, and at the same time a confession of weakness.

When the people possess the legitimate reward of industry in the opportunity to enjoy public recreation on the only day open to ninety-nine per cent of them, they will forsake the churches, and the preachers must earn an honest living. Hence the great interest the preachers manifest in the welfare of the mechanic.

A Peculiar Strike.

Mr. A. Tomlinson, of Carroll, Iowa, calls our attention to a strike now in progress at Des Moines, favorably affecting the religious welfare of the legislature and the pockets of the taxpayers of the state. It is nothing more nor less than a strike of the preachers of Des Moines against the "scab" labor of unorthodox divines, such as Unitarians, and fellows of that kind, who do not belong to the union.

The laws of Iowa provide for chaplains only for the penitentiaries and the militia, but it has long been the custom for the senate and legislature, as it is in other states, to invite preachers to open legislativ sessions daily with prayer, and to recompense them with a five-dollar bill. The expense for prayer for a term of the legislature has usually been about eight hundred dollars. This has been voted without shadow of legal warrant, and has been simply a steal for the benefit of the clergy. The ministers selected by the legislators hav been invariably of the evangelical sort, and the invasion of their prerogativ a few years ago by a "scab" preacher, Unitarian or Universalist, led the ministers of Des Moines to form the "Des Moines Ministerial Association," since which time they hav successfully monopolized the legislativ ear and plucked the plums from the state treasury. "Scab" preachers had no chance against this union.

During the present session, however, some legislators, with more love for fair play than religion, passed a resolution whereby to all preachers, scab and union, Catholics and Mormons, is extended the right to do what Mr. Tomlinson irreverently calls "the devotional act," by turns with the union members. This "ratting" of the legislature, as the printers say, did not meet with the approbation of the union, and the preachers were promptly ordered out. No member of the union is allowed to pray for a member of the legislature for any sum, and the employment of scab labor is resisted in all ways known to trades-unions. The legislature is under a boycott, and the members can all go to sheol for anything the union divines will do to prevent.

For many days, now, the spectacle of a divinely boycotted body of lawmakers has been before the people of Iowa. Not a single prayer has ascended from either senate or representativ chamber. The Lord is kept totally ignorant even of the existence of that body, and he has not been once instructed as to what he should do to merit the approbation of a legislativ chaplain, or on which side he should vote in pending legislation. The members hav been left to depend upon themselvs, and the supporting hand of Divine Providence wholly withdrawn.

The result, however, has been unexpected to the union preachers. The members are all alive, in good health, and the legislature has never been so harmonious, so free from jobbery, and the saving of the preachers' fees is an economy for which the taxpayers will giv them thanks. And when, too, they remember that there is no law providing for this payment, the tranquility given the members' consciences by the knowledge that they are not stealing from the state treasury will probably balance any fear they may hav entertained of displeasing the Lord by snubbing his self-elected agents.

It is a peculiar boycott—this of the preachers of Des Moines, and one which law-abiding citizens will approve. Moreover, it is unique in this, that Christians are not wont to allow any scruples of conscience to interfere with their peculations from public funds. In this state the evangelicals and the Catholics work harmoniously together in their burglarious operations, never stopping to ask if one is a member of the union or is a "scab" or "rat." All labor, so it opens to them the city, county, and state treasuries, is welcome. In our senate at Albany, it is true, the clergy fought over the chaplaincy, but the fight was personal and Prohibitional, not doctrinal.

We trust that both sides in this Iowa fight will stand firm. We would rather see every member of the Iowa legislature in sheol than to know he had helped to steal eight hundred dollars a session of the people's money; and we would rather a preacher never again stepped into the state house than hav his soul burdened with the sinful guilt of having received stolen money. We are fully in sympathy with the legislators in this case, and can heartily say Amen to the preachers. We applaud the sentiment of Mr. Tomlinson, "that there is no more sense in having the daily sessions of the Iowa state senate and house of representativs opened with prayer to God, even if there is a God, than there would be in the use of such a ceremony in opening the sessions of the courts of justice, or those of the boards of supervisors of the various counties; and it is to be hoped that we may be delivered from this abuse for the future."

Stand firm, legislators!
Stand firm, preachers!

Against Deathbed Robbery.

The Court of Appeals of this state has decided that a trust fund left to be expended for masses for the repose of a man's soul is not a valid bequest, the consideration for the cash being altogether too problematical. The case is briefly this: When Thomas Gunning, a resident of Brooklyn, shuffled off this mortal coil, he left a will by which he bequeathed about $20,000 to various relativs. The residue of his estate was left in trust, to be devoted to the purchase of masses for the soul of the testator, the souls of his relations, and the souls of all other persons in purgatory. One of the beneficiaries, residing in Brooklyn, brought an action in the Supreme Court to set aside the will on the ground that the trust for masses was invalid. The trustee interposed a demurrer, but Judge Pratt overruled it, and held that the plaintiff's cause of action was good. The general term of the Supreme Court reversed Judge Pratt's decision and sustained the demurrer, the court, in its opinion, holding that the trust was valid, and that a person could devote his estate to the purchase of masses for either himself or others. The Court of Appeals now reverses the decision of the general term, and sustains Judge Pratt.

This decision cuts off a source of considerable income to the Roman Catholic church, and forces the priests to get their "soul-scat" in advance of the death of the victim. It is a decision in the interests of deathbed decency.

Some Changes Transpiring.

When Dr. Parker, of London, who is a reverend for revenue only, was in this city, he told a friend that while he believed the Bible teaches a posthumous retribution, he did not think there was a single Congregational preacher in England who taught the doctrin of a conscious eternal suffering of the wicked. The Baptist Spurgeon, however, clings to the doctrin, but it is significant that he has had to expel a number of his Sunday-school teachers because they refused to instruct the children to believe in this horrible and infamous dogma.

In New England, as everybody knows, the doctrin of hell has been largely eliminated from the teaching of the Congregationalists, though not from their creed, and the "new theology"—which was invented practically to meet this changed condition of affairs—is rapidly replacing the old puritanism which sent everybody but the Presbyterians to hell. This new theology, which was at first but a path to heaven for the barbarian heathen, is fast becoming a broad highway for the civilized heathen who reject the cruel beliefs of their fathers. It is changing the religion of New England, and will end in making that section of the country a Unitarian, if not Universalist, stronghold.

In New York, indifferentism is the prevailing spirit in religion. In rural places in the state Christianity of various kinds still obtains, and the doctrin of hell for the wicked neighbor finds many advocates. In the cities, however, religion is not much considered. A very small proportion of the population attend church, and the great mass of worldly folks laugh, when they do not sneer, at the zealous Christian who diets weekly on brimstone and sees forks of sulphureous flames playing around the unregenerate. With these indifferentists "hell is now a grand old humbug," and heaven is but a shadowy realm which they hope to reach, but about which they possess the vaguest possible ideas. The farther west from Plymouth Rock one goes, the more heresy one finds; the more distinct and emphatic renunciation of old creeds, particularly the dogma of hell; and a religion broadening out till it becomes but a phantom, a shade, of the old Christianity, a belief without substance or power, an intellectual recreation, and the frail but sufficient bond to maintain churches simply as social organizations. This expansion and weakening is due to the loss of the central force of Christianity—the fear of hell, which has been in Christianity's career the hangman's whip to drive sinners to repentant knees.

This loss has been occasioned by the natural growth of men's minds, the infamous cruelty of the dogma itself, and its revolting results, as portrayed by theologians like Edwards, Ambrose, and others. The public expression of, and rejoicing at, the loss was made easy for the public by the labors of Colonel Ingersoll. It requires much less mental exertion for the average man to say, "I agree with Ingersoll," than to giv his reasons why he did not believe in hell. The greatest oratorical genius of this or any other century has been directed with irresistible force against this dogma of conscious endless suffering, the people were ready for the reform, and the fact is that in the hearts of the good, the gentle, the benevolent—the civilized—the fear of hell is extinct. It is owing to this fact, moreover, that the new theology is spreading in New England, and the eschatological absurdity of Andover finds so many supporters.

This is a great change to take place in the beliefs of a people in but little more than a decade. Reformations of this character are not usually brought about in the lifetime of a single man, though Voltaire lived to see the effect of his herculean work upon the mental status of France. Along with the dogma of hell has gone, too, a half-score or so other equally absurd though less cruel beliefs, which are in reality the pith and marrow of the Christian theological system. The denunciation by Beecher of the vicarious atonement scheme found response in thousands of minds. The dogma of the fall of man, and the responsibility of the present generation for the mythical Adam's beneficent sin, is now scouted as unworthy the thought of intelligence. Lutheranism and Calvinism, to say nothing of the present Christian church, hav scarcely one important dogma left which the great broad world accepts—we may say, in fact, not one. That is a great and hopeful revolution for less than a quarter of a century to accomplish, for when the intellect of the world leaves off spending its force on speculativ superstitions, the probability of the material improvement of the race is very greatly enhanced. If as much thought had been given to the accomplishment of justice on earth as to the evasion of a mythical hell, the squalor and wretchedness now among us might ere this hav been relieved.

Abram Bronson.

Abram Bronson, of San Diego, Cal., died in the early days of last month, at the age of eighty. The first part of his life was spent in Connecticut, where he was born. He removed to California in 1854. He was by profession a physician.

Mr. Bronson was a man of great individuality and force. He believed in liberty. In the antislavery days he was an apostle of freedom, and shared with other heroes the contumely and scorn of the Christian world. Like most of the survivors of that warfare, he became an Infidel. His attacks upon the church, upon secret societies, upon monopolies, and upon governmental oppressions were strong and rancorous. But he had a tender heart, and his efforts to relieve his neighborhood of mistakes and misery were not altogether on paper. Those who knew him say he was good and generous.

The funeral was Secular, as became the dead. H. L. Shaug, of Del Mar, a Freethinker, paid the last tribute to the deceased, and told his virtues to the world. Dr. Bronson's will leaves about $22 000 to build a hall in San Diego, dedicated to liberty, and to be called Freeman's Hall. It is to be managed by trustees.

Editorial Notes.

J. E. REMSBURG was obliged to leave Texas before his work was finished. He made a determined effort to fill his engagements, delivering thirty lectures in three weeks, the last eight with a broken jaw. He finally lost his power of speech, which compelled him to leave the field. He is regaining his health, and will make a tour East this spring.

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 11th we printed a very good article on Evolution, taken from the Home Journal. The credit for the article should hav been given to the Cornhill Magazine. Another remarkably clear exposition of the evolution theory—we may almost say science—is Robert C. Adams's "Summary of Evidence," a lecture delivered before the Montreal Pioneer Freethought Club some time ago, and of which a new edition is out, with price reduced to fifteen cents.

IN a work on Socialism published in Lovell's Library in 1884 is given a list of Socialistic and semi-Socialistic papers, in the latter of which we find THE TRUTH SEEKER. We should like to know the authors' reasons for thus classifying us. If it is because we print communications upon both sides of economic questions, why should we not be judged the other way as well as this way? If the classification is justified by anything that has appeared on the editorial pages—the only pages which reflect accurately the Editor's opinions—we should like to hav it pointed out.

PRINTED in large type and red ink on the cover of the North American Review for March is this announcement:

"The Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M.P., will contribute to an early number of the Review an article on the religious opinions of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll."

When this occurs, and the heavens remain as they are, we suspect that possibly Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll will contribute an article on the religious opinions of the Right Honorable William Evart Gladstone, member of Parliament, and ex-premier of England. And the first shall be last and the last first, in this discussion, to the end that the scriptures might be fulfilled, which was spoken. Mr. Gladstone is probably the ablest Christian controversialist living, and certainly Colonel Ingersoll is the ablest Infidel on top of the ground. Mr. Gladstone's article will be worth reading—and so will Colonel Ingersoll's.

AN Agnostic broker residing in Brooklyn last week wrote sarcastically to the Sun proposing that the Protestant churches should conform to the "spirit of the age" and organize a Religious Trust for the purpose of doing away with sectarian competition. The broker would hav the churches pool their issues so that religion might be furnished in a quantity determined by the directors of a trust, and of a quality in the greatest demand. His plan is to fix the number of churches on a basis of population, and leave to the people of each church district the decision of the question by a majority vote whether it should be a Baptist, an Episcopal, a Methodist, a Presbyterian, or some other kind of church. In carrying out this plan, the directors of the trust would, of course, shut up churches when they were too numerous for the population, under the basis established, and inferentially would regulate the supply of preachers, if not their compensation, the salary paid to a minister being according to the size of his congregation, or so much per head of his converts. This is a great scheme, but one which the daily paper printing it finds impracticable for the reason that the fanaticism of religion unfits its possessors for harmonious work. And for the same reason the Sun condemns, as useless, the plan proposed by the Evangelical Alliance in Brooklyn which contemplates the division of the community into districts and the sending out of a supervisor and twelve visitors to every hundred church-members to drum up attendance upon the evangelical churches, so called, without regard to sect, somewhat as children are driven into the schools by the board of education's truancy agents. People of such divergent views as the Christians, insinuates the Sun, can never be induced to forego their particular hobbies and labor for the numerical or spiritual benefit of their religious rivals. If this be so, and we cannot gainsay it, it furnishes a good reason for an unconverted person to stay out of all churches till they harmonize their essential doctrins and furnish some safe and sure plan of salvation. Supposing a man should join the wrong church!

ELLIOTT F. SHEPARD, of this town, is a rich, penurious, and pious old gentleman. He livs on Fifth avenue, owns some stock in the Fifth Avenue Stage Company, and has religious scruples against the stages running on Sunday. Last week he sought a legal injunction restraining them, and put in a batch of affidavits, setting forth that Fifth avenue is a street of churches and homes, whose quiet is disturbed by the rumble of the heavy vehicles; that the stages do not pay; and that to break the Sabbath is a sacrilege anyway. He forgot to say that other avenues shelter more families than does Fifth avenue; that they hav as good a right to undisturbed quiet as the rich Christians of Fifth avenue; that the private carriages on that avenue make as much noise as the stages, and that no fussy old survivals of Puritanic times hav any more rights than anybody else. But the stage-line managers said it in substance for him, and he has not yet obtained his injunction.

A NEWSPAPER published at Rogers City, Mich., calls upon the trustees of the Rogers school of that place to remove the teacher because he told the children that there is no hell. The teacher, it appears, is an Infidel, and the paper calls this teaching Infidelity, and says "the laws of the land, the school laws of the state, and public opinion will warrant, authorize, and say godspeed" to the trustees in removing the obnoxious instructor. Well! well! It does make a difference to these Christians whose ox is gored! The teacher might hav scared the life out of the children with his pictures of a burning hell, and there would hav been no criticism by the church folks; but let him make the minds of the children easy by assuring them that such bugaboos are but fiction, and the laws of the country are at once violated! If we supposed we could reach the understanding of the raving editor of the Presque Isle Advance, we would remind him that what is sauce for the goose is also a good dietetic preparation for her mate, and the way to settle this question is not, as he desires, by teaching Christianity in the school, but by teaching nothing that the teacher doesn't know While this will remove all religious instruction, it will also leave the children's minds free for common sense to work upon.

THE following is a fragment of a discussion between two journalists which took place in the editorial rooms of one of New York's "great" daily papers:

Mr. O.: Why, nearly all the greatest and most learned men that ever lived were Christians.

Mr. F.: Were they? Name one of them.

Mr. O.: Well, there's Washington.

Mr. F.: Washington, eh? Why, he wasn't a learned man. What works did he ever produce with his pen? None at all. He simply obtained a high rank which was thrust upon him by chance. As for him being a Christian, I deny it. He was a slaveholder—a dealer in human flesh—which is now held as a violation of the doctrins of the church. Consequently he was not a Christian, that is, he was not a Christian inwardly. For Beecher once said: "He is not a Christian who is one outwardly, but he is a Christian who is one inwardly." What is true of Christianity is also true of Americanism. He is, therefore, not an American who is one outwardly, but he is an American who is one inwardly. So you see that Washington was not a Christian nor a true American either. For, is not slavery against the principles of Americanism?

Mr. O.: But he professed to be a Christian.

Mr. F.: Well, to propose, and to be, are two different things. You admit, then, that he was not a Christian?

Mr. O.: No, I claim that he was a Christian, but not a perfect one.

Mr. F.: Very well, that will do for Washington. Now name another. But name a perfect one, not a slaveholder.

Mr. O.: What's the matter with Lincoln?

Mr. F.: Why, Lincoln was an Infidel.

Mr. O.: But I say he was not.

Mr. F.: I say he was. So were all the other great antislavery agitators. William Lloyd Garrison, Gerritt Smith, Wendell Phillips, Henry C. Wright, Parker Pillsbury, Elizur Wright, Stephen Foster, Stephen Pearl Andrews, Lucretia Mott, all were Infidels.

Mr. O.: Where do you leave Beecher, Channing, and Parker?

Mr. F.: They were men who were denounced by the church a thousand times as being Infidels and heretics. I see it is very difficult for you to giv me the names of great men who were Christians. Let me name you some great men who were Infidels: Humboldt, Voltaire, Victor Hugo, Kant, Spinoza, Darwin, Huxley, Haeckel, Tyndall, Paine, Sumner, Jefferson, Hume, Servetus, Bruno——

Mr. O. (furiously): Who's Bruno? I know a dog uptown by the name of Bruno!

Mr. F.: You've never studied history, hav you? Who's Tom Paine?

Mr. O.: He's the song-writer that wrote "Home, sweet Home," isn't it?

Mr. F.: You had better study the history of the United States and find out.

After reading the foregoing Freethinkers will not be surprised at the next ridiculous essay on Infidelity and Christianity which appears in some "great" and popular journal.

Letters from Friends.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., Jan. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Something that is amusing is the impudence of those claiming to be the real estate agents for heaven. Of course, everyone knows that no heaven or earth can exist without some kind of real estate in it, but no one but a fool is made to believe that a minister of a church is lawfully authorized by some one to dispose of that real estate in heaven, and that for the low price of keeping the Sabbath day and Bible holy. We should no longer permit a minister of a church under such a pretext to act and to be recognized as a man of God, a man of truth, or a person of much benefit to himself or others. He is bold enough to condemn all that is done on Sunday except preaching for a salary per annum; it is a glaring sin for other professional men to follow the example placed before them by the pastor.

AUGUST BUESING.

MONTROSE, IA., Jan. 16, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: My subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER expired on the first of this month, and as I am getting along in years, and not blessed with the amount of this world's goods God intended me to hav, and all my praying to him not answered, I had about made up my mind to let THE TRUTH SEEKER go by. But after taking a review of the past—the length of time I hav been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER (commencing with Vol. I), the benefit derived therefrom, and the satisfaction I hav received—I said to myself, Here goes for another year. I hav been traveling the road I am now on for over forty years, and hav no disposition to leave it and cross over to the narrow path that leads through a sandy desert where they breathe the air of superstition, on either side inhabited by ghosts and devils, and "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord," overhead. My Christian friends think those pictures are horrible. How can they expect anything else, when they represent horrible characters, deeds, and actions? The pictures are all right. A. CRANDALL.

ABILENE, KAN., Jan. 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago I inclosed $5 for books; and now I inclose $5.75 for two years' subscription to the truthful old TRUTH SEEKER, and one dozen of John Peck's (bushel it ought to be) "Miracles and Miracle-Workers," in pamphlet form.

I would also state that I am doing quite a missionary work in a quiet and effectiv way among those that hav been born and raised in religious superstition, the same as myself before I investigated the Bible and Christianity carefully for myself. And I am very thankful indeed, to the Truth Seeker Company and Liberal lecturers, that I got my intellectual eyes opened, and that I now can see clearly the folly of the Bible and Christianity.

I send my best regards and wishes to Heston for cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER, as they are good object-lessons, although the hypocrits say it hurts their feelings to look at them.

The Christian bigots tried hard last fall to defeat me—a poor, one-armed young man—in getting a school, but they did not succeed. As I am the only outspoken Infidel in the community, they tell me that if I do not stop expressing my honest opinion about the Bible and hypocrits, I will stand no chance whatever hereafter in getting a school.

J. BEETON WISE.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Feb. 20, 1888.

DEAR FRIENDS: I want to help raise funds for Lucifer's defense. I cannot collect any here, as there is not a Freethinker for miles around, so I pen a note to all Liberals, asking them to contribute to my ten-cent list. All ordering books of me, or sending letters of any kind, will please inclose ten cents for the defense fund. I commenced a roll of honor three weeks ago, and see but one name to it yet. This looks disheartening.

I now come where I hav never yet come in vain—to THE TRUTH SEEKER readers and friends. I want your names as standard-bearers of the flag of freedom, as well as the ten cents. Those who can will please collect ten cents of Liberals living near them, and send in registered letter.

To all who order of me "The Infidel School-teacher," "John's Way," "The Darwins," or "Little Lessons," before April 1st, will be credited ten cents on the defense fund (with name or not, as they see fit).

Please do not think I hav given nothing myself. I hav sent $5 in money to Dr. Foote, and given the Echoes Publishing Company all the copies of "The Infidel School-teacher" they can sell between now and the trial. I never appeal to others till I hav done my own level best.

I shall look for responses at once. I trust I'll not be disappointed, as the sums asked are so small, but "many littles make a mickle." ELMINA D. SLENKER.

SEWARD, NEB., Feb. 22, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Perhaps a few lines from this distant part of the vineyard may be of interest to you. There are here in this town and vicinity quite a number who do their own thinking and reasoning on the various theological questions of the day. On Wednesday and Thursday evenings, Feb. 15th and 16th, we were favored with lectures by Mrs. Mattie A. Freeman, of Chicago; the first lecture treating of "Orthodox Problems," and the second of "His Satanic Majesty." Mrs. Freeman handles her subject very forcibly and logically. She is an able speaker, and all who listened to her were impressed with her graceful manners and candid, earnest eloquence. Mrs. Freeman was greeted by a large audience on her first appearance, and with a packed house on the second evening. She is certainly deserving of the high encomiums that hav been bestowed upon her as a Liberal lecturer. Her lectures stirred up the reverends to no small degree. One of the most prominent, at the close of the last lecture, jumped upon a seat and announced that he would reply to Mrs. Freeman on the next Sunday evening. Although he was favored with a full house, and spoke for two and a half hours, he did not "get there." Failing to meet the arguments presented by Mrs. Freeman, he uncorked the demijohn of clerical vituperation, and poured the bitter gall of the wrath to come on all Liberals, from Voltaire and Paine down to the people of Seward town. In his oratorical flight he certainly let the tail feathers of his argument drag very low in the mud. We hope sincerely that the future may again send Mrs. Freeman to us. H. H. BOYES.

OTTUMWA, IA., Feb. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Having for a long time been a patron and warm admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the doctrins it so ably and zealously advocates, I take the liberty of dropping you a line as to my whereabouts. I hav temporarily left my home in Bradford, Penn., and am now sojourning in Ottumwa, Ia., where I hav the contract for sinking an artesian well for an association of citizens.

Fortunately, I find in this lively Western city very many congenial spirits, thinkers, who take no stock in atonements or bloody sacrifices whereby some think to shuffle off on innocent parties the results of their own misdeeds.

But pardon me—what I set out to write to you about was this: Last Sunday Mrs. Freeman, a winsome and brainy little lady, hailing from Chicago, gave the Liberals of this city two lectures. Her subjects were, "Orthodox Problems" and "His Satanic Majesty."

We learn that Mrs. Freeman is very nearly a beginner in the lecture field. If such is the case, she is one of the liveliest and most promising beginners we ever heard. Her lecture was a most elegant entertainment. She is a ready and fluent talker, pertinent, precise, and forcible in the use of language, and has evidently thoroughly posted herself on the subjects on which she expatiates. P. F. KEARNS.

SATSOP, WASH. TERR., Jan. 31, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I came to this place two years ago a Christian, believing every word of the Bible to be true, but having the good fortune to marry a Liberal for my second husband, and living between two Bible Christian families and reading THE TRUTH SEEKER and Ingersoll's lectures, I can for a truth say I go away a free woman; and truly wish that I could say that my two nearest neighboring women had good, true Infidel husbands, such as Ingersoll, that believe that women hav the same rights that men hav. I hav tried to impress on their minds that reading will do more toward their freedom than praying or mourning.

There was one of our Liberal agents this way canvassing for Liberal books, and he happened to stop at one of my near neighbors', and left one of the little pamphlets to show his good-will; and when the old man found, to his horror, it was an Infidel book, he jumped four ways at once, and as he owed me $1.50, borrowed money, I offered him that for the book, but he did not think Infidel books were legal tender for borrowed money—would rather die owing me than cheat me that way. This is the kind of religion they hav here.

Mr. Heston's illustration of Moses and his club was splendid, and we saw it plainly illustrated in our vicinity last week—one of the most low-down acts on record.

There are only a few outspoken Infidels in our vicinity. There would be more, but they are afraid of their Christian friends. I sometimes wish I conld be their all-wise God for a few days. I would relieve some of my own sex of some of their troubles; at least, force their husbands to love and protect instead of hate and abuse, and force the fathers to giv to their daughters liberty, especially on holidays, and not keep them at home and cause them to curse their parents.

MRS. G. T. MCLAIN.

LEXINGTON, KY., Jan. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I was much charmed by Colonel Ingersoll's late replies to the interviewer. How delightful are the words of men who speak for truth, and not for effect!

We know the fate of the Girondists, because they were too slow for the ardent haste of progressionists. Now hope deferred will create here a swifter party, whose utterances will giv birth to a new idea of freedom. The word "Benevolence" will be inscribed upon their banner. Millions will assemble under this; well-devised plans will lead them to the polls. How quickly the scale will turn! Then where will be the swinish monopolist? Great enthusiasm and an overwhelming vote will be all that can save this country.

Strength and virtue go together. In what place hav men a burning love for freedom? In palaces, surrounded by luxury and splendor? In the home of the sycophant, whose every word is uttered to please a sensual tyrant? No. The man who takes his life in his hand and vows never to sleep peacefully again until the human race are redeemed, he is worthy to be called a patriot. Even Hamilton did not understand the principles of a free government.

I just heard a clergyman remark that Thomas Jefferson was appointed by the Lord to perform a great work, but, not being fit to go to heaven, was left to perish in his sins. He seemed to think that our business in this world was to save our souls. But Leonidas and Washington only remarked, "How sweet for my country to die!" In the power of a tyrant, a hero exclaimed, "Strike, but hear me!" Here was no reference to a future state, no selfishness. Some persons direct human beings to act out nature to the full, that the organization may be perfected. This course would produce superb animals, but there is a more sublime method of salvation. Giv a man—a true man—a difficult task to perform; you know the result. The men who forget themselvs for the sake of the world constitute an aristocracy which is raising our race to a higher level. The individual intellect is lost, and something more godlike grows out of it. Men who generalize habitually are never superstitious, selfish, vulgar, or vain. The soul's health is its salvation; the saved soul is benevolent, just, and pure. Such a soul givs beauty and strength to the body.

I promised a Christian—the only one I hav any faith in—to review John Knox. The reform of the said Knox resembled that of a wild beast in a china store. It was without anything of a refined disintegration. He was secretly the pet tiger of a queen who hated foreign meddlers. ALHAZA.

ATOKEE, C. N., IND. TERR., Jan. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find postal note, for which please to send one ANNUAL, one "Christian Absurdities," and for the balance you may send anything that is good. In order that you may more thoroughly understand my condition, I will try and giv you an outline of the affairs of this place. Atokee is a place of about four hundred inhabitants, the Indians and whites forming about one-half, the balance black—rather mixed. Now the Indians and whites hav joss-houses as follows: one Methodist, one Baptist, one Presbyterian, one Catholic; the negroes, one Methodist and one Baptist. To cap the climax, the white Methodist Episcopals are having what they call a conference, which adds to the permanent ones eighteen or twenty more preachers, and they hav been here a week and, I think, are going to stay a week more. All chickens that hav not been eaten hav left or hid away, and the widow and fatherless hav a male protector in the house, as well as a spiritual adviser. And right here comes to my mind a thought. In traveling about, I hav occasion to change boarding-places, and finding a nice place recommended I apply for board and lodging, and very often I get this answer: "I would like very much to board you, but, as you see, it's impossible to giv you a bed, as I am a widow, and it won't do, as the people will talk." And along comes a thick-necked Methodist preacher and makes her house his home, and no one thinks anything of it. You will understand I don't wish to infer anything, but I cannot help thinking, for these chaps are so bold. You talk about a powwow! We hav got here now solid, double-distilled superstition and blood of the lamb to such an extent that I want you to send an antidote just as soon as you can. I hav tried to get you several subscribers, as there are several that borrow my paper, but as yet I hav not succeeded; but perhaps when I go away and they cannot borrow, they will send on. Respectfully, I. A. VAIL.

NEW CASTLE, WASH. TERR., Jan. 26, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been receiving and reading THE TRUTH SEEKER carefully for more than four months, and I can say that I am more than pleased with its contents. Watson Heston's illustrated chapters of orthodoxy are immense. I cannot express my appreciation of all the splendid writers and contributors who do their best through your valuable paper to uproot ignorance, bigotry, and superstition. I am fully convinced that ignorance is the cradle, the foundation, of superstition, and Freethought its most determined opponent. Scientists shall and will be the instructors of future generations. Parsons must cease to inoculate their obnoxious theological ideas into the brains of our learning and growing generations. Liberals, let us work to that effect with heart, hand, and—pocketbook.

Let us guard our public schools, that grand secular national institution, established for the purpose of making intelligent citizens. All religious sects, Roman Catholicism foremost, are strenuously working to undermine our public school system. Their encroachment is alarmingly successful, and ought to attract the attention of all liberty-loving citizens of this country. Catholics establish parochial schools, taking pupils away from public schools, and through deceit receive appropriations of public money intended and collected through equal taxation for the sustenance of public schools, thereby making the public support sectarian schools. Catholic rascality in Melrose, and Stearns county, Minnesota, as reported in THE TRUTH SEEKER some time ago, is a warning example to those Liberals who imagin that there are no dangers ahead. Protestants want to hav the Bible read in public schools. A persistent and threatening attempt is being made by Prohibition and religious fanatics to put God and the Bible into the Constitution of the United States. What will be next?

TRUTH SEEKER, keep us posted. I am for the emancipation of mental slavery and secular public schools.

Yours respectfully, RICHARD ROESIGER.

OPHIR, CAL., Jan. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I read a letter in the first column of "Letters from Friends" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 7, 1888, written by M. H. Sheppard, M.D., on female suffrage. His ideas are similar to those of myself, and a great many of my acquaintances also. I do not approve of female suffrage at present. I am not a woman-hater in the least. I prize them above all else. I am a married man with a Freethought wife, and we hav two bright and promising little daughters, and consequently happiness is our lot. I do not think that the female portion of the inhabitants of the United States are far enough advanced in the education peculiar to a Secular government and its principles to sustain the position of citizens and to do this country, themselvs, and their fellow-humans justice at present. There is too much religious tomfoolery and bigoted nonsense contained in the majority of women. They hav been slaves to religion too long to giv them their liberty at once; their minds are not far enough developed to appreciate or know how to use it. They must be educated and learned what liberty, freedom, means first, before they will know how to use or appreciate it. The Catholic portion of them are curbed down as slaves to their church by the priests, and are not allowed to read any literature of a Freethought or scientific nature whatsoever, and they dare not go to reason or they will surely be left, or even do their own thinking. A priest must do that for them,

In short, they must go entirely according to the dictates of these foul-mouthed vicegerents of God, the priests.

The question would naturally rise, What kind of citizens would they make?

My idea is that the Catholic women would be herded in to the polls by the thousands by the herders, the priests, and compelled to vote according to the dictates of said herders, without using their own judgment at all, under a threat of excommunication, and a curse by the God and all the saints and saintesses. And the majority of women of all other denominations are but a little farther advanced, if any, in intelligence. Their creeds keep them checkmated to a great extent, and are simply a stumbling-block to progress. There are exceptions among women, of course, but it is the majority that I am speaking about, and the majority rules. Where you find one like Susan H. Wixon, Miss Gardener, or Mrs. E. D. Slenker, you will find ten thousand duped and humbugged by religion. If the women—the majority of them, at least—were like the above-mentioned three, then I would be one for granting them equal rights at once, but as it is, it would not be safe or prudent to do so at present. They are not prepared or qualified for impartiality, consequently it would not be safe for this republic. Giv us more public schools, and more of a high grade, and schools of science—but not Bible science—and fewer parochial schools and convents. And teach the children, especially the female portion of them, and women, to do their own thinking, and that they own themselvs, and teach them the rudiments of universal mental liberty, and in course of time they will be better qualified for citizens than they are to-day. Female suffrage at present would surely bring back upon us the intolerable cruelty of the Inquisition and the old Blue laws. It is best to go slow in this matter, is my opinion also.

Yours for universal mental liberty, LEWIS KAISER.

OLD RIPLEY, ILL., Jan. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send the names of some who might take your paper on receipt of sample copies.

The idea that there is a personal God, who in his infinit wisdom created and controls everything, is contradicted in everything we behold, because if a being of infinit justice controled, there could be no such thing as evil; and will any hav the hardihood to say that there is not? True, the religionist affirms that all was cursed for man's sake, or because of man's sin; but would that be just, to punish the innocent for the guilty? The Atheist contends that everyone should suffer for his own misdeeds; that this is simply the course of nature. Though, in some instances, the offspring may suffer on account of the mistakes of parents, a high knowledge of justice condemns it; and in this way the Atheist is better prepared to sympathize with and relieve the unfortunate than those who believe in God, and that the ills and misfortunes of life are God's punishments.

But, aside from man, the fact of the whole of animal nature being susceptible of suffering not only, but doomed to suffering, without any possibility of escape or recompense, teaches us plainly that no being of justice has the supervision, for in what manner can the low orders of animals sin against God?

Again, if there is an infinit God, it is his own infinit duty to make his creatures infinitly happy. Is pain, sickness, sorrow, and death, with occasional rays of joy, infinit happiness?

Once more, if such infinit does exist, we know nothing as to his existence, and are not capable either of injuring or of benefiting him.

I am a Liberal because it is to me the only thing that secures justice to all; because any other course would violate my duties and obligations to others, for if I claim the right of private individual judgment, I feel morally bound to accord to all others the same; and because I find in all who are not Liberals the same spirit of persecution that lighted the fagots and built the Inquisition, and trampled on all the rights of man, filling the world with hatred, fear, bigotry, egotism, superstition, witch-belief, ignorance, and tyranny.

I am an Infidel to the church, because it has robbed Thomas Paine of the honors he so richly deserves; because it tries to claim such men as Jefferson, Franklin, Lincoln, and other like characters as its adherents; because it tries to bribe science to subscribe to its ignorant creeds; because in everything it lacks honesty.

I am an Atheist because the Bible claims to be God's word, and says God is an infinit creator and ruler, while the Bible and all nature contradict the claim, as the Bible is full of mistakes, absurdities, immoral commands, and infamous lies, while nature abounds in cruelties, which could not be the case if an infinit ruler presided.

EX-REV. J. N. MAXEY.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Feb. 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It may be interesting news to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to know that Friendship Liberal League, of this City of Brotherly Love, commemorated the 151st anniversary of the birth of the Author-hero, Thomas Paine, with appropriate exercises, consisting of short addresses and recitations, vocal and instrumental music, by the members. The principal speaker for the afternoon was J. W. Browne, who gave a splendid oration on the life and services of Paine to the whole world. In the evening Dr. W. H. Benson delivered a glowing eulogy on Paine as a religious reformer. Our hall was beautifully decorated for the occasion by some of the members, of whom, I am proud to say, Mrs. Harker and her daughter were very energetic in tastefully arranging the decorations. Without these two great workers, I really do not know what we should hav done. On the platform stood a huge archway decorated with flags and evergreens. Over the archway was the noble saying of Paine in large letters: "The world is my country; to do good my religion." Underneath hung a large portrait of Paine. Then, underneath stood a pyramid of flowers. Across the platform, in evergreen letters, hung the words: "The 151st anniversary of Thomas Paine." Some of the pictures that adorned the walls were those of Ingersoll, Bennett, Watts, Garfield, and Grant.

The Sunday following, Charles Watts delivered two lectures for the League, which were a treat indeed. The weather being fine, the large hall was packed to suffocation with eager listeners. I regret to say that the hall was not nearly large enough this time to accommodate the public, as many had to stand outside, standing-room being all taken up inside. The subjects of Mr. Watts's discourses were—afternoon, "Science and Freethought;" evening, "Confucius, Buddha, Mohammed, and Christ: Their Merits and Demerits." Judging from the frequent applause that Mr. Watts received, the lectures were highly appreciated, and the fact of the subscriptions and the collections being good was further proof that Mr. Watts was highly appreciated here. I hope it is so everywhere he goes, for he is without doubt the best exponent of Freethought in the Liberal field.

It is a pleasure also to state that THE TRUTH SEEKER and Secular Thought went off like hot cakes, so to speak, last Sunday, many of the back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER being taken as readily as new ones, notwithstanding my informing persons that they were old copies.

I would recommend the Liberals everywhere throughout the United States to giv Mr. Watts a hearing, and, my word for it, they will never regret it. GEO. LONGFORD, Sec.

PALMYRA, N. Y., Jan. 30, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: If I should try to make the believers in the Bible think that I believed that white was black, they would be apt to think that I was a fool. Now, what is the difference between that statement and the affirmation that God is good and merciful and yet the author of the sin and misery there are in this world? The difference is, one is a lie and the other a falsehood. Christians tell us that God created all things, and can do all things, and is just and perfect; yet he made man with all his imperfections, and punishes him for what he himself is to blame for. He made man in his own image. Now, why did he not create him perfect and keep him so? I hav never learned that there was anyone around at that interesting occasion to make suggestions, not even Mrs. God, so he must hav had things his own way, and picked out his mud himself.

The believers in the Bible tell us that we are afflicted by God for our own good. Now, as for me, I do not want to get good by having the small-pox, or being struck by lightning, or by other ills of life too numerous to mention. It would be apt to hav a contrary effect on me, and if I wanted a person to love me I should never giv him a licking or push him over a precipice to bring about that state of feeling. Now, if God is good and just, as is claimed, how could it be possible for him to allow so much suffering, and create a devil to make people bad and then punish them for doing what he himself made them do? If God is the author of all things and the Bible account of him is true, then he is a terrible monster, producing wars and telling one nation to destroy another, of his own children. If that is the case, I think more of the devil, for he was not to blame for being appointed superintendent of God's reformatory, called hell. He didn't make himself. I never heard that he was a jealous devil, but God says he is a jealous God. Now, what a delightful place heaven would be, governed by a jealous God! Ask some poor Christian woman that has a jealous husband how she likes a home governed by jealousy, and to be shut up with such a God forever. I want none of it, for supposing I put on a sanctimonious face, make myself miserable, wear out my clothes at the knees, and after a long struggle succeed in reaching heaven to reside permanently with a jealous God, what a fix I would be in if I should happen to pay a little attention to a lady angel!

And I should be liable to if I were a man Christian, for it is characteristic of the Bible-believers; they cannot help it, as it is taught them in the Bible, and God himself gave them a lesson in adultery with a married woman. What better can you expect of the children? It being very disagreeable to me to be around where there are jealous folks, I do not want to get to heaven. And as I should not like to be jealous myself, I would rather, if I were a married man, that my wife kept away from there, unless God has reformed.

It does not seem possible that people, if only possessed of common, ordinary intellect, can believe such absurdities; and I believe that they do not, but only pretend to, because it is the fashion, and they can hav a better standing in society. How they must despise themselvs, to know they hav to talk and act a lie for popularity! And the priests and ministers—if there is no hell, there ought to be one manufactured for their especial benefit, for teaching such foolish absurdities for their bread and butter, when common sense tells them better, if they hav any of that article. It is doubtful about their having any.

Christians tell us it is better to teach people the Bible even if it is a myth, for it will make them better through fear of after punishment; and now another absurdity, for in the same breath they tell them if they only acknowledge Christ and ask God to forgiv them their sins, no matter how bad they hav been, they will be forgiven, even in the eleventh hour. The bill is paid and Christ will wash all their sins away. He must hav a laundry on an immense scale if he does all the washing the believers expect him to do. Now, what a beautiful and accommodating religion that is for rogues! They can pray or giv the priests money and it settles all their bad behavior. That kind of religion was manufactured by designing knaves for their own especial benefit, and it is a heinous crime to teach such infamous doctrins to little, innocent children and fill their minds with terror and fear of their heartless and tyrannical God—send them to school five days in the week, and then crowd out what they hav learned during the week, or part of it, by overloading their heads with superstitious humbugs on Sunday. But one consolation is that heathenish religion is gradually passing away, with its worn-out creeds and superstition, in spite of priests and ministers with their long faces and corrupt hearts; and the light of reason shines brighter and brighter as science and education lead people out of the ruts of a past and dead generation. H. P. MARSH.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Jan. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Is it not strange that there is so much sympathy expressed by certain parties for the poor, deluded Anarchists who were hanged a few months since in Chicago? Why do people sympathize with such characters, men who are trying to break up the best government that is, or ever was in the known world? What is Anarchism? It is simply to do away with all law and government. When that is done, then what? Why, everyone for himself, and the devil take the hindmost. The fact is, we must hav a government; there must be a head to every nation, state, town, and city, yea, and to every family; and I will go further and say there must be a ruler or governor even in the building of a house, as I know, being an architect. For goodness's sake, what kind of a house would I build if every laborer and mechanic could hav his say about it? So we see this rule applies all through every branch of business. It is absolutely necessary that it should be so, or there could be no business done throughout the land. Knowing this to be so, it is very strange to my mind that anyone can hav any pity or sympathy for the deluded Anarchists, and the sooner they are put down the better it will be for them and the country at large. Mr. Editor, in my opinion, we hav enough to do to put down and cast one side the superstition and myths of the Christian religion without going after these side issues—then hav it thrown back to us that we are all a set of bad men, all Anarchists, robbers, murderers, thieves, and are doing all we can to break up the government. Mr. Editor, that is the way some of the people talk to me after reading some of the Anarchist letters published in THE TRUTH SEEKER not long since—some who had almost made up their mind to subscribe for the paper, but said if that is the kind of doctrin advocated in it, they did not want it. Even Mrs. Juliet H. Severance whines over the execution of the Chicago Anarchists and says there is no more free speech in this boasted free land of America, unless we are hanged for it. For goodness's sake, how free does she wish to be? Was there anything unsaid in her letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dec. 31, 1887, which she wished to say and did not? Could she hav abused the government and its officers any more than she did, if she had tried to? Yet she has not been molested so far as heard from. Why? Because this is a free government, and the people believe in free speech, when it is not abused. It is not free speech or common sense for anyone to get up in public and advise the crowd, or any one of them, to go out and murder, burn property, tear up railroads, and destroy manufactories, etc. There is nothing free or good about that; it is simply maliciousness and the worst kind of Anarchism, and everyone who does it ought to be arrested and put into a lunatic asylum for safe-keeping. Yet, strange as it may seem, there are some who allow themselvs to be led away by just such fanatics, who hav more gab then brains, who want to destroy all business and sinch all capitalists. They can't bear the idea of one man being richer than another, or themselvs, at least. Mr. Editor, I would like to ask how it can be expected that all will be equally rich, when we know there is only about one man in a thousand that has any capacity for business of any kind. Each of the other men can only do what he is told to do; of course, he never can become wealthy, but he can by economy become a good liver or perhaps even independent. No one can become wealthy unless he has a good business capacity, forethought and good judgment, and withal a strict attention to business, being prompt in all of his engagements. I will state here a little history that came under my own observation about twenty-five years ago. Five merchants of Sacramento, whose combined wealth at that time was probably less than $300,000, formed themselvs into an association, and undertook to build the great Central Pacific railroad over the Sierra Nevada mountains, with this small capital. They commenced and pushed forward that great enterprise to its completion. Where is the Anarchist that dare say that such men should be put down and their property destroyed simply because they made a success of that great undertaking, and are now worth probably ten or twenty millions each? Hav they not well earned every dollar they hav made? And we know that they hav employed and are still employing thousands and thousands of men of all grades, from the lawyer, doctor, mechanic, engineer, laborers of all kinds, all the way down to the grader and track-layer, all of whom get a fair compensation for their services. And still this same company is building roads all through this state; in fact, they hav by their enterprise really made the state what it is, one of the most prosperous in the Union. There may be, probably are, some corporations that are overbearing and want to make it all, but we must remember that these men take desperate chances. Take the company that I hav just spoken of, for instance, had they not succeeded in their undertaking they would hav lost everything and been poor men to-day, as many another has before them, therefore we should not blame corporations too much for being economical and prudent in their business. Many a one has gone to the wall for not being prudent and careful in his, or their, new enterprise.

But, Mr. Editor, I am making this letter too long, so will close here by wishing you and THE TRUTH SEEKER family good luck and prosperity. N. D. GOODELL.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Young Engineer's Soliloquy.

The engineer is in our eyes something more humanizing than the soldier; borne onward by the sublime energy of the thing of his creation; harnessing, so to speak, the very elements to his use, and checking and controling them, as might some magician of a fairy tale, he sweeps from place to place, distributing in his way all the gentler influences of civilization, and knitting more firmly together the family of man, by teaching them the strength, the value, and, what is more than all, the abounding peacefulness, of a wise union.—Douglass Jerrold.

Life looms up before me;
Fortune's flying o'er me;
Others may deplore me,
I hav no fears.
Though life looks wild with troubles,
Rough with rocks and doubles,
I think them only bubbles
To engineers.

Some say hope is seeming,
That I'm idly dreaming,
Shallow in my scheming
As young in years.
Good comes not by groping;
No name was made by moping;
I'm happy in my hoping—
Glad engineers!

Town to town I'll take me;
Steel railroads I'll make me;
Time shall not forsake me,
Spry as the spheres.
Where swift streams are tossing,
Bridges build I, crossing,
Genius's art engrossing—
Wise engineers!

When enlocked in ledges,
Using chisel, wedges,
Hammer, drill, and sledges,
A tunnel clears.
Diamond and dynamite
Will gouge walls of granit,
And the name imprimate
Of engineers.

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

Little Boy Blue.

The soft, woolly sheep are knee-deep in the meadow,
The clumsy old cow's in the corn,
The little lambs bleat,
As they list for your feet,
Boy Blue! Boy Blue!
As they wait for your step in the morn.

The little bird swings on a bough by the window
And chirps to her young in the nest,
And the butterfly's wings
Are the daintiest things,
Boy Blue! Boy Blue!
For he's dressed himself all in his best.

The little brown partridge, so brisk and so saucy,
Calls out to his neighbor, "Bob White,"
And his poor little mate,
Who is sleeping too late,
Boy Blue! Boy Blue!
Answers, "Peas are not ripe—no, not quite!"

Why, even the leaves in the sunlight are dancing,
And loud is the woodpecker's tap;
He shakes his small head
At the wee one in bed,
Boy Blue! Boy Blue!
At the lazy boy taking his nap.

The roses are waiting, the lilies are waiting,
So fresh from their bath in the dew;
Then open your eyes
To the light of the skies,
Boy Blue! Boy Blue!
For the whole world is waiting for you.

Biographical.

ASPASIA.

Aspasia was a beautiful and talented Greek, a nativ of Miletus, having been born in the fifth century B.C. She was wonderfully gifted by nature, and added to her accomplishments much learning and ability to grasp and discuss with great power all political, moral, and philosophical questions. She was one of ten thousand among women—an able, fearless advocate of the rights of humanity.

She witnessed with sorrow the servitude and dependence of her sex, and sought by precept and example to elevate their subordinate condition. She showed that woman was abundantly able to teach, and carried on a school of philosophy and ethics. Among her pupils were such men as Socrates and Pericles, besides many other cultivated and gifted Athenians, for she took up her residence in Athens about the middle of the century in which she was born. Plutarch says "she was a wonderful conversationalist," and all who heard her speak seemed to be charmed by her nativ eloquence and wit.

She was persecuted at one time by Hermippus on the charge of "impiety," but was acquitted, although she was far above the foolish superstitions of the time in which she lived.

She was greatly slandered and abused by the ignorant and unappreciativ, and was called unchaste and a bad woman. This was untrue. The feeling against her arose because of her being wedded to Pericles, who had been married to another woman, but from whom he had separated. The law of Athens would not allow of his legal marriage to Aspasia, she being foreign by birth, and Athens gave no rights to foreigners. But her union with Pericles was as near as the law allowed, and remained the same till death separated them. Barclay, the historian, says: "She was married to Pericles, but the laws of the city refused her as an alien the title of wife. The comedians of her time and since cast many aspersions upon her character, but they were without foundation."

Notwithstanding the malicious attacks of enemies upon her character, she was greatly respected and esteemed by those whose respect and esteem were worth having, and all the great statesmen and rulers in the government, the poets and philosophers, sought her society and her advice in political and philosophic matters. Her rare abilities and gifts of mind are justly celebrated in many of their works. The Athenians called Pericles the Olympian Zeus, and named Aspasia Hera, or Juno.

Aspasia had one son who grew up and became a great general, but he was put to death, together with five others, because they failed to win the battle of Arginusæ.

Aspasia was a wonderful woman, and her mind was the guiding star in the life and teachings of Pericles. It is said, no doubt with truth, that it was she who composed a part of the great funeral oration that Pericles pronounced over the Athenians who were killed in battle.

It is nothing new for ignorant people to attack the character of women who are mentally and morally superior to themselvs, even in our own day. Therefore, it is not to be wondered at that Aspasia, who lived in a less enlightened age, in some respects, should hav suffered at the hands of those calumniators, who had neither the mind nor heart to comprehend her rare mental endowments.

Among the antique busts there is one labeled "Aspasia," and it is said to be genuin. Whether it is or not no one at this day can tell, but it represents a very lovely and attractiv woman, as Aspasia is said to hav been, and she was as beautiful mentally as she was acknowledged to be physically.

Our Puzzle Box.

1.—SUBTRACTION.

From an agreement, contract, take
A "cavity in which to bake,"
A sing-song tone or slang it leaves,
The speech of Christians, gypsies, thieves.

OLD BOY.

2.—CHARADE AND SUBTRACTIONS.

A "whetstone" and "a pen for swine,"
As truth and probity, combine.
From this subtract the shortest street,
It leaves us something sweet to eat.
Behead the whole, in vain we try,
It puts such swelling in the eye,
To see, although we look again,
More than one solitary pen;
Yet here, fenced in on either side,
A bed for baby birds is spied.

UNCLE JAMES.

[The following riddles are from Blakeman's "Two Hundred Riddles."]

3.
Black through blue does often look
When reading in an open book.

4.
Round as a goblet, opaque to light,
Black as tar, or the dead of night.

5.
The harder you whip me the faster I go,
I stagger about when running quite slow;
Two ears I possess, but greatly I fear,
Although they are good I never can hear.

Six eyes I hav, but never see,
Pray tell me now just what I be.

7.
No head, no jaws, no teeth, no feet,
And yet the hardest steel I eat.

A THREE-YEAR-OLD girl accompanied her mother to witness a baptism; the next day, arranging her dolls along the edge of the bath-tub, she prepared one of them for immersion. Her mother advanced within listening distance, and heard the following address to the candidate: "I now baptize you in the name of the father, and the son, and into the hole you go."

Correspondence.

BOWLING GREEN, O., Feb. 13, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I read the Children's Corner every week, and I thought I would write you. I am a little girl eleven years old. I go to school in the country. My teacher's name is Simon Hoffman. I study arithmetic and geography, and read in the Fifth Reader. I hav the most head-marks in my class. I hav three brothers and one sister. This is my first letter, and I would like to see it in print. Yours truly,

Little Freethinker, PEARL ELLIOTT.

DILLON, MONT., Feb. 5, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I havn't seen any letters from this town, and so I thought I would write. I read the Children's Corner, and think it is very nice. I hav a little sister two years old; she will laugh at the people when they ask her why she doesn't go to Sunday-school, and say, "We hain't no Christan." Well, I must close. I hope to see my first letter in print.

Your true friend, ALLIE BLIVEN.

P.S.—This card is for you.—A. B.

[Thank you, dear, for the pretty card and your nice little letter.]

CAMERON, MO., Feb. 11, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER about nine years. I think the Children's Corner is splendid. I went to school, but it is out now. I studied language lessons, reading, geography, arithmetic, writing, and spelling. We had a kind of a big dinner on the last day all to us scholars and the teacher. My teacher's name is Lillie Holtzappey. I am nine years old. I would like it if some of the children about my age would write to me. I saw so many girls and boys writing to the Children's Corner I thought I would write. This is my first letter. Please excuse all mistakes.

Yours truly, MARY L. LIVENGOOD.

NORWEGIAN CONSULATE, SALONICA, TURKEY, Jan. 24, 1888.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: I was so plcased to get your kind letter! It was so very kind of you to write to a little girl like me. I was very pleased with that day's mail, as I made a new friend in you, and received such a nice present from dear Uncle Fish. He sent me $10, and as I am very fond of reading I am going to send part of it to England to get books. We had such a nice time at Christmas! We made a little Christmas tree and I went to town and bought everything myself and had great fun, and, as mamma was ill, I did it all myself. Charlie has been having holidays, but now he has begun his studies again. A few days ago a letter I wrote to Uncle Fish in July was returned from the Boston post-office. I wonder why! It was addressed all right. I love dear mother very much, and I know how sad you must feel now that your dear mother is gone, but although she cannot come to you you can go to her some day. I hav lost two sisters and one brother, but one day we shall meet again. Now I hav two brothers, Charlie and Henry.

We are looking for a new house, as this one is very cold in winter, but so nice in summer; all the floors are covered with tiles instead of planks. Salonica is a very funny place to liv in; one cannot go out alone anywhere, and there are no nice shops as there are in other countries. Next letter I will tell you all about Turkey. Now I think I hav told you all my news and must say good-bye. My best love to you, and hoping you will write to me soon,

Your affectionate little friend,

DAISY SUTER.

[We thank Daisy for her nice letter, and we shall look forward with much pleasure for her next letter describing the country she livs in.—ED. C. C.]

TALENT, ORE., Feb. 8, 288.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little boy eight years old, cannot write good enough to write to you, so my aunt is writing for me. I hav a red horse that I can ride. I hav two cats. One is black and I call it Nigger; the other one is like Joseph's coat, is of many colors; I call it Cotsin. I hav a pet hen; her name is Tommie. I hav an engin that I wind with a key. I made a stump-puller and I pull stumps with it. I go to an Infidel Sunday-school every Sunday. Our teacher is reading E. B. Foote's "Science in Story" to us now. We like to laugh at the monkey's tricks. I like to go there, for we hear something that we can understand, and nothing about Gods, devil, or other silly things. I hav never been to school yet; I hav a blackboard, slate, books, and paper, and am studying at home.

Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and I go to get it; I open it in the post-office and show Heston's pictures to all that are there. Mamma or auntie reads the Children's Corner to me. I like it very much. We also take Lucifer, New Thought, Liberty, Freethought, Foundation Principles, and Chicago Express. Papa has the picture of the five Anarchists; we are going to frame it and hang it in our parlor. We hav Spies's "Autobiography;" we are all Anarchists. I gave ten cents to the ten-cent Lucifer defense fund. I bought Ingersoll's "Lay Sermon" with my own money. We had an Infidel Chistmas tree; we all spoke pieces, and no God-talk either. I spoke "The New National Anthem" from THE TRUTH SEEKER of quite awhile ago. The next time we speak I am going to learn "Hell Played Out." With love from a little Infidel, HENRY W. BREESE.

PERRYSVILLE, PA., Feb. 10, 1888.

DEAR AUNT SUSIE: As I hav not written to you for more than two years, I thought I would write again.

We were all sorry to read of your mother's death; we think we could not liv without our mamma. I took my "Story Hour" to school and my teacher read it and wrote:

"Dear Effie:
"Bend thy influence to each effort
That shall raise our nature human.
Be not Fashion's gilded body;
Be a brave, whole-souled, true woman."

We hav old Noah's daughter teaching this winter, and she is a regular crank. One morning Harry and I were late and she was praying; Harry tried to get in and she pushed him out and locked the door. We are the only Freethinkers that go to this school. We get THE TRUTH SEEKER every week; we like to look and laugh at the pictures, and read the Children's Corner. Some time I will tell you about our pets. With love for all, I remain,

Your loving friend, EFFIE JANE PEARCE.

[Aged nine.]

[We are glad to hear from Effie once more after two long years. We hope she will not wait so long before she writes again.—ED. C. C.]

CARROLLTON, MO., Feb. 15. 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines for the Corner. It has been quite a while since I wrote before. You requested us to write and tell you what we hav been reading. I hav not read anything for a long time, but the last thing I read was "Proof That Shakspere Could Not Write." I hav also read "What Shall We do to Be Saved?" and Paine's "Age of Reason," Mr. Ingersoll's great speeches and his gems of thought. I think they all are very good books, but I like the gems of thought best. Well; I thought I would tell you of a man that stopped at our house this week; he was what I call a second-hand preacher. He and pa were sitting in the dining-room talking, and pa took Ingersoll's gems of thought, and, opening it, told him to "read that chapter." The man looked at the book and said, "What kind of a book is this?" Pa said, "That is one of the best books on earth; it's Ingersoll's gems of thought." The man laid the book on the table and said, "I don't want to hav anything to do with such books." Pa laughed, and asked him if he ever read any of Ingersoll's books. The man said No, and he did not want to. Pa said that was the way with these church people, they begin to kick against Ingersoll before they know what they are kicking. Of course, the man got mad. They sat there and talked a long time. I am afraid if I tell you more about the second-hand preacher and Ingersoll you would get tired, but Ingersoll always came out on top. I guess I will close for this time. I remain, Yours truly, BESSIE ISAACS.

The Origin of Natural Gas.

According to Professor Lesky, the buried bed of vegetation which has become what is now known and used as the Pittsburgh coal bed, twelve feet thick, must hav originally been as much as 150 feet in depth, it having been compressed to its present size, as the coal bed, by the action of heat and the pressure of the strata or layers of sand which were deposited upon it at different times after it was covered with water. As this coal bed is far above the oil sands, it is not thought that the bed of vegetation which it now presents furnished the oil and gas now being found, but that they hav been formed from other beds buried below the oil sands, and which may hav been of even greater depth or thickness than this one. Pressed down by the tremendous weight of the hundreds and thousands of feet of sand, gravel, etc., which now form the rock strata above them, and heated from below by the internal heat of the earth to a very high degree, these beds of vegetation would, as a result of such forces, be changed in part into oil and gas, which would escape upward to where it is now found, the parts not so changed remaining and being changed into beds of coal. It is supposed that in this way the gas has been produced from beds of vegetation buried below the oil sands, and that it has found its way, in company with oil, perhaps, up to the porous sand rocks or oil sands.

A LITTLE girl was sitting at a table opposit a gentleman with a waxed mustache. After gazing at him for awhile, she exclaimed, "My kitty has smellers, too."

"YOU were a nice, quiet little boy in Sunday-school this morning, Bobby," said the minister; "I was very much pleased." "Yes," replied Bobby, "pa said that if I'd behave myself in Sunday-school I needn't go to church."

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Literary Notices.

One of the most noticeable inventions of our time, and one which offers great possibilities for exerting a civilizing and fraternizing influence on the nations of the globe, is the new universal language Volapük. The idea of creating a language in common for the whole world, and thereby becoming independent of the diversity of tongues now existing, is not new. The German philosopher Leibnitz, about the year 1700, opened the question by discussing the advantages to be derived from its successful solution, and made some experiments toward its realization. The seemingly insuperable difficulties in the way, however, deterred him from proceeding with the undertaking before he had made any progress worth remembering. Since that time, in the various countries of Europe, over fifty attempts at supplying the deficiency hav been made and published, none of which deserve any special mention. Nearly two hundred years after the idea was first broached, the ceaseless aiming after improvements which characterizes our age has brought to light what appears to be a successful solution of the difficulty in the language constructed by Schleyer, and named by him Volapük (from vol, world; in the genitiv form, vola; and pük, language). It is claimed that in Europe five hundred thousand persons hav acquired it. Messrs. Cooper & Zahn, of Milwaukee, Wis., publish a book of instruction in the language at 50 cents, paper covers; 75 cents, cloth. This work, or any other book wanted, may be ordered through this office.

From a state of confusion into which we were thrown by endeavoring to decipher two mysterious books sent us, we are rescued by the following letter from Mr. N. S. Johnson, Sioux Falls, D. T.: "I hav just got ready for distribution my book, the title of which, translated, is, 'Is the Bible the Word of God?' It is, so far as I know, the only Freethought work written in the Norwegian Danish language. It is very much like Mrs. Slenker's 'Studying the Bible' and Cooper's 'Inquirer's Text-Book.' I also inclose the pamphlet 'Presteskabet,' a short translation from Geo. Chainey's lecture, 'The Clergy.' If THE TRUTH SEEKER and every other Liberal paper will assist me in spreading the books and pamphlets among the Scandinavians, it will hav an effect on the coming generation, if not on this. I hav also translated Ingersoll's Answer to Dr. Field. I consider it the masterpiece of all his works. I expect to publish it as soon as I can afford it. The book sells for $1, or five for $4; the pamphlet for 10 cents, three for 25, eighteen for $1, or one hundred for $5."

Ex-Senator Warren Smith, of Tennessee, has written a pamphlet entitled, "The Workingman's Destiny," which is sold at 15 cents. An idea of the contents may be gathered from an extract or two: "The sovereign people seem to hav forgotten the old war-cry of '76, that 'Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty,' and hav proved faithless to the precious boon of freedom which was confided to their care and keeping. I appeal to every citizen of the commonwealth if it is not a startling fact that our political campaigns hav become so corrupt that the holding of our elections is little better than an empty farce and a mockery. . . . Where are the royal sovereigns of America to-day in whose hands rests the destiny of our great nation and the hope of the world? Do they stand vigilant sentinels on the watch-towers of our republic, jealous of its safety and the perpetuity of its liberties, or are they asleep at their posts while thieves despoil the nation of its integrity? What a humiliating spectacle! From royal sovereigns to degenerate henchmen doing the unhallowed bidding of their political bosses—mercenary tools in the hands of the demagog who traffics in the people's liberty. . . . Politicians and a partisan press do not try to enlighten and educate the masses, but arouse their prejudice and confuse and blind their understanding by the use of falsehood, misrepresentation, and the meanest kind of sophistry; hence, fellow-citizens, for liberty's sake, call a halt under this mercenary leadership, examin and find out just what part of the woods you are in; look well to your bearings, and turn over a new leaf in your political history! It is a maneuver of this kind which alone can save you. Instead of improving and perfecting the government our fathers established, and thus securing still broader liberty for the individual, we hav relaxed our vigilance, placed the helm of government into mercenary hands, and are surely drifting into class legislation and class domination of the most positiv type. . . . Watch with jealous eye the tendency now being exerted to secure a union of church and state, and place the seal of popular condemnation on it."

Mesmerism, a mental phenomenon long neglected and left in the hands of discreditable exponents, has at length received proper scientific development at the hands of Prof. Gilles de la Tourette and Professor Charcot, who now describe "The Wonders of Animal Magnetism" in the February North American Review. In the same magazine Rev. Charles Hay, D.D., answering the question, "Why Am I a Lutheran?" says: "The question is not, Why did I become a Lutheran rather than a Presbyterian, Methodist, or some other kind of Protestant Christian? To that question most of us now in any one of these so-called 'orthodox evangelical denominations' would hav to answer, I was born and brought up there. Providential orderings usually hav most to do in fixing our lot religiously, as in other respects." And carrying this reasoning a little farther, and discovering that it is also merely because of the accident of his birthplace that he is a Christian at all and not a Mohammedan, Buddhist, or any other kind of a heathen, and that reason had nothing to do with his choice at all, we conclude that reason has nothing much to do with his article anyway, and will stop right here in it. "Serpent Myths" are strongly objected to in the next article, but in our heavy, unteachable sort of a way we cannot see why serpents are not about as good to worship as most other things that are used for that purpose. Next we learn how on "Sunday in Cherokee Land" the Indians, with "the pitiful pipe and gun and whisky laid aside, are held for one hour to personal responsibility and accountability to a supreme unseen power, to a tribunal of infinit justice and perfect righteousness, to an insight which no sin can escape, and an omniscience which no cunning can evade." Well, let us hope that the effects of said "holding" will differ from those that seem to be produced by it among the palefaces, and that after returning to their pipe and gun and whisky our red brothers will not hav to be "held for an hour to accountability" to a police justice so numerously as some of their white co-believers whom we know. This magazine sells at 50 cents.

The question whether happiness or unhappiness predominates in the world is one much discussed of late. The modern substitution of human happiness, instead of painful duty toward supernatural beings, as the end of life, has naturally contributed to giv the problem prominence. A favorit argument with the more scholarly defenders of faith is that life as Agnostics would make it, robbed of deep spiritual import, would not be worth living, but Freethinkers go right along living and evidently enjoying just the same, stubbornly inattentiv to the argument and absurdly happy. However, the pessimists, or believers in the predominance and permanent unavoidableness of pain, hav gained so considerable an influence of late as to call forth from Sir John Lubbock a reply setting forth "The Pleasures of Life." The work is now published in the Humboldt Science Library, price 15 cents. The author is one of our modern school of scientific thinkers who believe human pain to be not irremediable, but only an effect of ignorance that science is to remove. He quotes from Epictetus the thought that "time alone relieves the foolish from sorrow, but reason the wise," from La Bruyere the expression that "most men spend much of their lives in making the rest miserable," and from Marcus Aurelius the reflection: "We suffer much more from the anger and vexation which we allow acts to rouse in us than we do from the acts themselvs at which we are angry and vexed." "I must die," Epictetus is found to say, "but must I then die sorrowing? I must be put in chains. Must I then also lament? I must go into exile. Can I be prevented from going with cheerfulness and contentment? But I will put you in prison. Man, what are you saying? You can put my body in prison, but my mind not even Zeus himself can overpower." Another noble thought quoted by our well-read author that we must find room to reproduce is this of Emerson: "The great man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the serenity of solitude." And of Marcus Aurelius: "What, then, is that which is able to conduct a man? One thing and only one—philosophy." Finally in his enumeration of the pleasures of life, the author comes to that happiness which science holds ready to bestow on humanity, and concurs with the affirmation of John Stuart Mill: "A cultivated mind—I do not mean that of a philosopher, but any mind to which the fountains of knowledge hav been opened, and which has been taught in any tolerable degree to exercise its faculties—will find sources of inexhaustible interest in all that surrounds it; in the objects of nature, the achievements of art, the imaginations of poetry, the incidents of history, the ways of mankind past and present, and their prospects in the future. It is possible, indeed, to become indifferent to all this, and that, too, without having exhausted a thousandth part of it; but only when one has had from the beginning no moral or human interest in these things, and has sought in them only the gratification of curiosity." Bacon is adduced to testify that "no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage-ground of truth;" and Mr. Lubbock proceeds: "Those who hav not tried for themselvs can hardly imagin how much science adds to the interest and variety of life. . . . Occasionally, indeed, it may destroy some poetical myth of antiquity, such as the ancient Hindoo explanation of rivers, that 'Indra dug out their beds with his thunderbolts, and sent them forth by long continuous paths.' But the real causes of natural phenomena are far more striking, and contain more real poetry, than those which hav occurred to the untrained imagination of mankind. Mackay justly exclaims:

"'Blessings on Science! When the earth seemed old,
When faith grow doting, and our reason cold,
'Twas she discovered that the world was young,
And taught a language to its lisping tongue.'

. . . Gradually we may hope that the love of nature will become to more and more, as already it is to many, a 'faithful and sacred element of human feeling.' Science summons us

"'To that cathedral, boundless as our wonder,
Whose quenchless lamps the sun and moon supply;
Its choir the winds and waves, its organ thunder,
Its dome the sky.'

. . . That discoveries, innumerable, marvelous, and fruitful, await the successful explorers of nature no one can doubt. What would one not giv for a science primer of the next century? for, to paraphrase a well-known saying, even the boy at the plow will then know more of science than the wisest of our philosophers do now. Boyle entitled one of his essays, 'Of Man's great Ignorance of the Uses of Natural Things; or that there is no one thing in nature whereof the uses to human life are yet thoroughly understood'—a saying which is still as true now as when it was written. And, lest I should be supposed to be taking too sanguin a view, let me giv the authority of Sir John Herschel, who says: 'Since it cannot be but that innumerable and most important uses remain to be discovered among the materials and objects already known to us, as well as among those which the progress of science must hereafter disclose, we may hence conceive a well-grounded expectation, not only of constant increase in the physical resources of mankind, and the consequent improvement of their condition, but of continual accession to our power of penetrating into the arcana of nature and becoming acquainted with her highest laws.'"

CHRISTIAN ABSURDITIES. By John Peck.

John Peck is a good writer of the kind; that is, of the tearing-down-and-pulling-to-pieces kind; and those who never read anything making a general pitch into the thing called Christianity, and who like that kind of mental aliment, are advised to send 20 cents to the Truth Seeker Company and get "Christian Absurdities."

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC, 1888 (E. M. 288). With twenty-four portraits of distinguished American Freethinkers, scientists, and philosophers, and numerous other illustrations.

No Freethinker or Liberal can afford to be without the good things served up from year to year in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. Besides the calendar for 1888 and an immense amount of Liberal history such as is hard to find elsewhere condensed into every-day history, it contains a well-written article entitled, "Freethought in the United States," which shows the growth of Freethought sentiments as well as of the opposition. George E. Macdonald givs a series of humorous articles entitled, "Bible Studies." The ANNUAL contains 118 pages of quite as good matter as either of its predecessors.

From Watts's Literary Guide.

The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1888 (London: Watts & Co.; 117 pp., 1s., or by post, 1s. 3d.), issued at New York, is a very considerable improvement upon the last issue. A prominent feature is "Bible Studies," by George E. Macdonald, and illustrated by Watson Heston. The editor contributes a capital paper on "Freethought in the United States, 1887;" Capt. Robert C. Adams writes on "Theism and Atheism;" while Samuel Putnam, J. E. Remsburg, and L. K. Washburn—all well known to English readers—add their mite to the literary treat provided. In addition to twelve full-page cartoons by Watson Heston, there are twenty-four admirable portraits of distinguished American Freethinkers and numerous other illustrations. The get-up of the ANNUAL is, as usual, unexceptionable, and reflects the highest credit upon the indefatigable editor, Mr. E. M. Macdonald.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1888.

To say the great excellence of this publication is fully sustained by the issue for 1888, is indeed high encomium. But the many valuable articles and fund of valuable information it contains make its possession by every intelligent Liberal an absolute necessity. The article by E. M. Macdonald, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, entitled "How the Layman is Deceived," is really worth one hundred times the price of the ANNUAL. It is, beyond question, the best, most able, concise article on the canon and inspiration of the New Testament ever written. Its facts should be committed to memory by every Liberal; those who do so will be enabled to fearlessly meet, and readily confound, the most able, subtle, or scholarly bishop, priest, or parson. Every Liberal owes a duty to the cause, to become as thoroughly posted as possible, so that he can refute error and aid friends to a knowledge of the truth. No article I hav ever read approaches in excellence, or can be used by the most simple with such sure effect, in exposing the false claims of the New Testament to divine inspiration or authenticity: The price is only 25 cents. Those who procure it will, one hundred and twenty-five times within the year, hav good occasion to rejoice in the possession of the knowledge it imparts, and to be thankful to the writer for calling attention to "How the Layman is Deceived," and the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL of 1888.

Obituary.

DIED.—Jan. 10, 1888, Mr. Robert Phillips, of paralysis, aged 90 years and 7 months.

Robert Phillips was born in Berks county, Pa., June 1, 1797, of Quaker parentage, his mother being a preacher in the Quaker church. He was the last to go of a family of ten. He resigned his connection with the Quakers on account of their intolerance on the questions of temperance and slavery. He followed the occupation of miller in Pennsylvania. He married Naomi Garrison on March 3, 1831, who survives him. He came to Chicago in November, 1847, and to Algonquin, Ill., in April, 1848, where he followed the occupation of farming on the farm where he died. He had a family of six children—three sons and three daughters—four of whom survive him: Dr. E. H. Phillips, of Cape May, N. J.; Willett and Howard, of Algonquin, Ill., and Mrs. E. P. Sortor, of Salt Lake City, Utah. The deceased in his latter years was an earnest Freethinker and Spiritualist, and was ever ready for an argument in support of his belief. He was noted for his integrity, and was a kind and indulgent father, a faithful friend, and a good neighbor.

The funeral services were conducted by Hon. George Gage, of McHenry, Ill.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

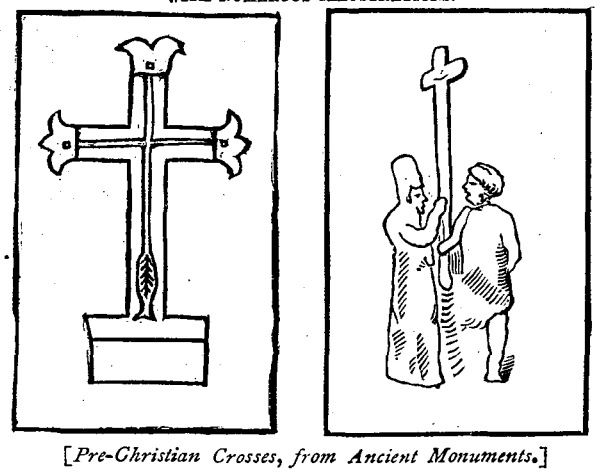
BIBLE MYTHS,



AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS:

BEING A

Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity,

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

[Pre-Christian Crosses, from Ancient Monuments.]

From the dawn of organized Paganism in the Eastern world, to the final establishment of Christianity in the West, the cross was one of the commonest and most sacred of symbolical monuments. Diversified forms of the symbol are delineated more or less artistically, according to the progress achieved in civilization at the period, on the ruined walls of temples and palaces, on natural rocks and sepulchral galleries, on the hoariest monoliths and the rudest statuary. Of the several varieties of the cross still in vogue, as national and ecclesiastical emblems, there is not one amongst them the existence of which may not be traced to the remotest antiquity. BIBLE MYTHS shows this.

THE COMING DARKNESS.

And the Lord said unto Moses, Stretch out thy hand toward heaven, that there may be darkness over the land of Egypt, even darkness which may be felt.—Ex. x, 21.

Odds and Ends.

CLERGYMAN: "Little boy, I'm sorry to see you with a fishing-pole on Sunday." Urchin: "Why, I'm jest a-goin' to get mammy some stuff to keep Lent on."

THE different kinds of laughs they hav: Dudes: Ha! ha! Farmers: Ho! ho! Teamsters: Haw! haw! Balloonists: Hi! hi! Feed-dealers: Hay! hay! Women: He! he!

LAYMAN (to revivalist): "I hear that several members of the church hav gone crazy over the subject of religion?" Revivalist: "Yes, sir, our revival gatherings are meeting with glorious success."

A GENTLEMAN who recently retired from business has succeeded in winding up all his affairs successfully, with the exception of his Waterbury watch. He is at work on that now, taking only twenty minutes for meals.

REV. DR. CHASUBLE (to only member present): "I am thankful that one member of the church is not afraid to come out in rain as well as in sunshine." Mrs. Pray: "Well, if it hadn't hav stormed, I couldn't hav come, for my new bonnet isn't ready."

OMAHA mamma: "There now, stop chattering and say your prayer." Little son: "Make sister shut up so I can. Say, mamma, can——" "I told you to stop talking." "I know. Can you——" "Say your prayers!" "Yes, I'm goin' to. Now I laymedowntosleep I prayth' Lordmy soultokeepif Ishoulddie before awakeIprayth'Lord me soulto take say, mamma, can you move your ears?"

"YES," said the principal of the young ladies' seminary to the proud parent, "you ought to be very happy, my dear sir, to be the father of so large a family, all the members of which appear to be so devoted to one another." "Large family! Devoted?" gasped the old gentleman, in amazement. "What on earth do you mean, ma'am?" "Why, yes, indeed," said the principal, beaming through her glasses; "no less than eleven of Gussie's brothers hav been here this winter to take her out sleigh-riding, and she tells me she expects the tall one with the blue eyes again to-morrow."

THE COLORED PARSON'S TROUBLE.

Dis yer meetin', fr'ens and bredren,
On dis bressed New-Y'ar night,
Am called for var'ous reasons,
Dat ain' plain at fuss sight.
I s'pose yo' sorter callate
Dat yo' know what I will say—
Dat I'll praise yo' an' de good Lawd,
An' shout loud fo' de day.

Dat I'll 'knowledge de great favors
Dat I've had in de pas' y'ar,
An' vow dat I am thankful,
'Til I'll almos' raise yo' ha'r.

If yo' do, yo' ain' got hoss sense,
For I'se gwine to state some fac's
Dat'll make de col' chills hussle
Up an' down yo' lazy backs.

I do dis yer, my bredren,
In a Chrischun sort of way,
'Kase I think de deed am better
Dat am done on a good day.
Now I've stood in dis yer pulpit
An' labored with yo' sins,
'Til ye was filled with sorrow,
Like as if yo'd skun yo' shins.

I hab tried to make yo' soldiers
In de army of de Lawd,
But I 'pine dat yo' deep 'ligion
Am a empty, howlin' fraud.
Whar am you Chrischun speerit?
Whar am yo' pious acks?
What yo' done for me an' Jesus?
Trot out yo' measly fac's.

Yo' ain' done nuffin, bredren,
An' sisteren, yo'm as bad.
Yo've kep' me nuff site poorer
Dan de las' run of June shad.
When I 'cepted dis yer pulpit,
I was sleek an' roun' an' fat.
Now I look like moths had eat me—
Like a mangy, poor church rat.

My coat am thin an' ragged,
My pants ain' pants no mo';
My toes am crunchin' grabbel—
Fru my hat de col' win's blo'.
I habn't had a squar' meal
Since early in de fall,
When the chillun killed de possum,
Down by Johnsing's ole stone wall.

Jus' one donation party
I's had since I's been heah;
Den I got a pair of oberhauls,
A lame duck, an' some beah.
My wife she takes in washin';
My chillun liv on air,
While I preach gospel precep's,
And wish dat I could sw'ar.

I am tired of dis yer foolin'.
You'm a low-down, stingy crowd.
Why! if God asked for a penny,
Dar ain' one would speak out loud.
Yo' would ruther skin de hen-roos'
Of yo' neighbor in de night
Dan git a ton of chickuns
By doin' what was right.

Yo' an' got anuff 'ligion
To save a single soul.
Yo'll all git swamped, my bredren,
Whar de waves of Jordan roll,
While I'll stan' with the angel band,
An' flop my wings an' crow;
"Yo'd all git into heaven,

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE.

Gems of Thought.

CHRISTIANITY not being a revelation, but a conception—the gospels not being either inspired or accurate, but fallible and imperfect human records—the practical conclusion from such premises must be obvious to all. Every doctrin and every proposition which the scriptures contain, whether or not we believe it to hav come to us unmutilated and unmarred from the mouth of Christ, is open and must be subjected to the scrutiny of reason. Some tenets we shall at once accept as the most perfect truth that can be received by the human intellect and heart; others we shall reject as contradicting our instincts and offending our understandings; others, again, of a more mixed nature, we shall analyze, that so we may extricate the seed of truth from the trash of error, and elicit, to use the words of Fichte, "the divine idea that lies at the bottom of appearance."—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

[NOTE.—According to Mr. Greg, then, and he is "auctor haud spernendus" (an author in nowise to be despised), there are in Christ's sayings, and generally in the scripture, three classes of doctrins or precepts: the first class are self-evidencing and to be joyfully accepted; the second are to be rejected and opposed, and the third are to be sifted, or, in the words of Bacon, are to be "weighed and considered." I shall giv a few specimens of each class—confining myself to the Sermon on the Mount: (1) "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them" (Matt. vii, 2). "Let your communication be, Yea, yea, or Nay, nay, for whatsoever is more cometh of evil" (Matt. v, 37). "Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire. Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them" (Matt vii, 19, 20). (2) "But I say unto you that ye resist not evil: for whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also; and if any man will sue thee at the law and take away thy coat, let him hav thy cloak also," etc. (Matt. v, 38-42). "Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat?" etc. (Matt. v, 28-32). (3) "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill" (Matt. v, 17-20). "Whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication," etc., etc. (Matt. v, 32, 33). "If ye forgiv not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly father forgiv your trespasses" (Matt. 5, 13, 14).]

IT is our privilege and duty to discard all that proves to be unreliable, all unworthy of our confidence, and to accept in its place that which proves true and better adapted to our present needs. When a system of religion is presented to us for acceptance that admits of no change, no advance, no improvement, we may safely conclude it is wrong, that it is not the religion the world needs.—Bennett.

WHY should I liv? Do I not know
The life of woman is full of woe?
Toiling on and on and on,
With breaking hearts and tearful eyes,
And silent lips, and in the soul
The secret longings that arise,
Which this world never satisfies!
Some more, some less, but of the whole,
Not one quite happy—no, not one!
—Longfellow's Golden Legend.

WHY died I not from the womb? Why did I not giv up the ghost when I came out of the belly? Why did the knees prevent me? or why the breasts that I should suck? For now I should hav lain still and been quiet; I should hav slept: then had I been at rest.—Job iii, 11-13.

THE cross of agony, on which the tears of countless devotees hav dropped, now sparkles in diamond mimicry upon careless fashion-leaders in ball-room revels. The pictured saints, whose devout faces painters toiled over in a solemn consecration of life, torn from their cathedral nooks, now exhibit themselvs, as if in a strange surprise, at the call of self satisfied art-collectors in gay drawing-rooms. Even the church music, born in great travail-pains of passion, which must find voice finer and more subtle than word of poem or sculpture or painting—even the church-music is carried from the temple to the public hall. And, instead of listening, on penitential knees, to the moving tragedy and triumph of the God-man of his professed worship, the Christian, no less than the outside barbarian, attends the "Passion music," or the "Messiah," opera-glass and score in hand, every critical faculty alert, and intent only on esthetic enjoyment.—Mrs. Anna Spencer.

SURELY every human being ought to attain to the dignity of the unit. Surely it is worth something to be one, and to feel that the census of the universe would be incomplete without counting you. Surely there is grandeur in knowing that in the realm of thought, at least, you are without a chain; that you hav the right to explore all hights and all depths; that there are no walls nor fences, nor prohibited places, nor sacred corners in all the vast expanse of thought; that your intellect owes no allegiance to any being, human or divine.—Ingersoll.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 15. No. 11. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY.} New York, Saturday, March 17, 1888. {28 LAFAYETTE PL.} $3.00 per year.

THE EFFECTS OF CHRISTIAN DOGMAS.—CONCLUDED FROM LAST WEEK.

Notes and Clippings.

JONATHAN M. ROBERTS, formerly editor and publisher of Mind and Matter, in Philadelphia, died at Burlington, N. J., on Tuesday, Feb. 28th. Mr. Roberts was in early life a lawyer, and later a manufacturer. He was best known, however, to the public through his journalistic work. The interment occurred in the family ground near Norristown, Pa., March 3d.

THE secretary of the treasury is advised of an organized movement for the emigration of German convicts to this country, and has taken steps to guard against the landing of all such passengers. Two persons of this class are now in custody at New York and will be sent back to Germany at the expense of the steamship which brought them over. Others said to be on their way to this country will not be allowed to land.

EX-JUDGE DALY told the American Geographical Society recently that the ancient cities of the Western territories contain the secrets of a civilization which probably antedates the Egyptian pyramids. He said that it is almost an established fact that what we call the New World was in reality the cradle of the human race, and the indications were that a vast civilization had been destroyed by some sudden convulsion of nature.

THE expulsion of Jews from St. Petersburg and Moscow, and particularly from Livonia and Esthonia, continues with ever-increasing vigor. In direct connection with these cruel proceedings stands the equally growing emigration of Jews from Russia to America, South Africa, and partially also to India. The emigrants, so writes the St. Petersburg correspondent, entertain no delusions as to their future in distant lands, but the expulsions, the exceptional laws, especially those directed against education, compel them to prefer the unknown future to the terrible present.

CREMATION must be quietly striding forward. At the first monthly meeting of the Church of England Burial, Funeral, and Mourning Reform Association, presided over by Canon Elwyn, the motion was agreed to: "That in the present condition of the public health it is imperativ that a combined effort should be made on the part of ministers of religion, members of the medical profession, and persons of influence generally, to put a stop to the repulsiv, dangerous, and utterly indefensible practice of storing up in the neighborhood of large populations vast accumulations of human remains in every stage of arrested and prolonged decay."

THE advantages accruing to Chinamen who cultivate the English tongue in Sunday-schools were illustrated in the court of general sessions by the discharge of Mr. Gee Wah, laundryman, accused of assaulting a policeman. Brother Wah's Sunday-school teachers testified to his good character, and that he never geed, so to speak, from the path of virtue. The Sun trusts, however, that it is no offense to Mr. Wah's character to point out the sad fact that certain of his countrymen resident in this town hav been detected playing fan-tan on Sunday nights with their Sunday-school books under their arms. All is not Sunday-school that goes to Sunday-school.

THE theological students in the Lexington, Ky., school, who were dealt with because they went to the theater, hav also attracted attention by publishing in their seminary paper the following description of the kind of girls they think they would condescend to marry: "The buxom, bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked, full-breasted, bouncing lass, who can darn a stocking, mend trousers, make her own frocks, command a regiment of pots and kettles, feed the pigs, chop wood, milk cows, wrestle with the boys, and be a lady withal in company is just the sort of girl for me, and for any worthy man, to marry."

PROCLAIMS the Banner of Light: "The liberties of the people are in danger. When Spiritualists cannot worship God in their own way, without self-appointed censors making raids upon them contrary to law, the same as the Quakers were assaulted in the olden time, and imprisoned, simply because they were Quakers; and when the ancient town of Beverly is attempted to be divided for the benefit of a few Boston financial aristocrats, who want the seashore of the town for their exclusiv use, is it not time for the people to protest with all the energy belonging to a liberty-loving race? We should say so. We fully agree with the Boston Journal to the effect that 'it will be a sorry day for the state when such a scheme receives the sanction of a Massachusetts legislature.'"

DOWN in Mississippi, says the Chicago Times, they believe innovations are dangerous, and they will not tolerate them. For years and years a citizen of one of the towns in that state has been running a gambling-room and filling a niche which without him would hav been an aching void. So long as he attended to the legitimate and highly reputable business of raking off for three of a kind and redeeming the remaining chips at their established value, he was in the midst of his friends. But there came an evil day when he fell a prey to Christian faith, and he closed his gambling-place and began holding meetings as an evangelist. This was too much for the sensitiv community, so the ever-dutiful officials pounced down on him and arrested him for preaching without a license. Mississippi has her laws and her customs, and she does not propose to sit calmly by and see them violated, not even by a man with a good, loyal past.

THE Rev. Dr. Dorchester, of Boston, recently preached for the Rev. Dr. Sunderland, pastor of the oldest Presbyterian church in Washington, at which place of worship President Cleveland and his wife statedly attend. In a letter to the Zion Herald he thus speaks of the president as a listener: "He is a very uniform attendant upon worship, and his entire bearing in the sanctuary is becoming, reverent, and attentiv. He is what we call a good listener. Nothing escapes his attention and his devotedness and dignity are of the quiet, unaffected cast. I felt very soon that he was in sympathy with my theme—that Christianity satisfies the deepest needs of our spiritual being. From the opening to the close of the discourse his attention, so far as I could judge, was not for a moment diverted. At the turning-point of the argument his countenance indicated that he was closely following; and under the appeal at the close to build all we can of ourselvs into the everlasting kingdom of God, he seemed like one who appreciated the truth."

Communications.

Bible Authority.

I observe that many of your correspondents are oblivious to or ignore the fact that the late revisers of the Bible, and especially of the New Testament part of it, hav settled the question of its unhistorical, its uninspired, and fallible character. Their scholarship, qualifications, and authority make their testimony far above and superior to that of any others who hav ever sat in judgment over the "divine word." Scientific study, philological criticism, and historical research hav furnished them in this age with a wealth of resources—the means and power of analysis to solve mysterious problems, to elucidate intricacies, to explain mysticisms, to simplify inexplicable difficulties and contradictions in the text, which heretofore scholarship, skill, and philosophy hav not been able to settle.

It is admitted by every biblical student, everyone at all conversant with the period of intellectual darkness, its great dearth of material and paucity of means, as well as of critical qualification, that Jerome, a crazy monk, a fierce fanatic, a self-immolated, if not insane, anchorite, who lived in the desert as a solitaire, starving and torturing himself in body and mind into intellectual idiocy, in the name of religion and for what he and the church said was for Christ's sake, was not at all capable to giv any reliable translation of the Bible. Yet we are told in church history that this poor, credulous, superstitious enthusiast and fanatic was the first translator or reviser of the Bible from the Hebrew and Greek into the Latin tongue. It was near the close of the fourth century.

Catholics and Protestants of all denominations refer to Jerome with reverent emotions and pious delight, with ejaculations of gratitude for his great work for God and the church, in furnishing the Christian world this Latin or Vulgate copy of the Bible.

It was translated by an infatuated bigot for an age enveloped in intellectual darkness, for a people groveling in pagan idolatry, mental hallucination, and an unbounded faith in miracles, ghosts, charms, and relics, whose supernatural powers they believed ruled the world.

This Bible was prepared, kept, and used by the Latin priests because they could not read Greek. The church did not adopt it as a standard for its faith till two hundred years afterward, at a period of darkness when it was prepared to believe anything.

The revisers of the New Testament speak in this frank and honest style of the authorized version which your correspondents quote, discuss, and criticise in such good earnest as though it was of some account as authority. At the time it was prepared "the ancient versions had not been examined; no careful investigation had been made into the testimony to the primitiv text borne by the fathers; textual criticism was still in its infancy; the materials for it had not been gathered; the principles of the science had not been studied, and the labors of Mill, Bentley, Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, and other great scholars, to secure the purity of the text of the New Testament, were as yet unheard of, and only to be put forth in the course of many future generations.

"In these circumstances can it be wondered at that a vast multitude of changes will be found in the revised English version owing to an amended text? . . . When we trace the parentage of our English Bible, and when we see on what a slender basis of authority it rests, when we confront with this the enormous wealth of materials for settling the Greek text which we possess at the present day, and the amount of labor which has been expended in applying them, we might well fear that the alterations requiring to be made in the Bible with which we hav all our days been familiar should be of the most revolutionary character."

This foregoing statement is made in the "Companion to the Revised New Testament," by the approbation and authority of the revising committee.

We must remember they spent ten years in finding and verifying these facts, and publish them to the world for our enlightenment. It is simply to notify us that we are not to depend on the book as at all reliable, or as authority.

The committee knew much of this before it engaged in the revision. The revisers were prompted to the task by this knowledge. They knew the reverence that was felt for the book, and the opposition openly avowed by the clergy and the people to all efforts that might destroy the general confidence placed in it as a divine revelation from an infallible inspiration. It was to save the book from the stigma with which science and intelligence were enveloping it, that they undertook to revise it—promising to correct only the gross mistakes, the glaring errors, and not to destroy or disturb the doctrinal teachings—but to gratify the believers, they would leave all these absurdities unchanged.

They hav admitted the book to be entirely unreliable as authority in its teachings, and that they hav not changed it so as "to, in the slightest degree, affect its doctrins." "The Bible remains, for all practical purposes, totally unaffected."

They say it was so defectiv, so inadequately translated, and so uncertain, that it needed a revision, and yet they left it substantially as they found it. Hav we any confidence in their capacity, or can we rely on their testimony? If they were capable of telling the truth, and honest enough to do it, then the authenticity and authority of the Bible, as a divine revelation—as a standard of faith—is denied, overthrown, and settled. If the pious believers admit it, and tell us so, are not the unbelievers willing to accept it also? Why need they be reviving this dead ghost, this phantom, and then spend so much energy, and waste so much logic, in trying to worry, wound, and annihilate it? Its friends hav virtually killed it; then cannot its enemies let it alone? Because it is not buried and out of sight, they seem bound to be mauling and mussing it, as though they wanted to make something important out of its carcass. Do any appreciable numbers of your readers take any interest in this continuous battle and warfare over dead issues? If they were ignorant, unconverted church-members, they might be interested and enlightened by the controversy. But as the latter do not and will not read such lessons, is it not a loss of space and time to fight these battles over and over eternally, merely as a kind of pugilistic entertainment for those given to pugnacity?

If these fighters of dead ghosts had an audience or readers to convert, or to appreciate their heroic efforts, we could all view with placid serenity their valor in this contention with a vanquished error.

Certainly your readers hav been long convinced of the utter untrustworthiness and puerility of the New Testament as a historical record, translated and interpreted as it is by orthodox believers. And now that this high ecclesiastical court of revisers agrees with them substantially, had we not better pass on to the other more practical and present issues? We can preach and practice a better morality and purer religion than the dogmas and doctrins of the church require, or than the priesthood advocate. As truth seekers, all our energies may be engaged in finding it, in teaching and living it, and thus exhibiting our sincerity as reformers.

The revisers hav very nearly sealed the fate of the New Testament. Save some of the practical, moral precepts found there, but very little of it is used in our science lessons or in our best or most popular literature. Modern theology is adapting itself to more advanced rational thought. Thinking people giv but feeble support to the theology of the church, but are using their influence as church-members to improve its morality and extend its enlightenment.

The old terrifying specters for saving souls, the drama and tragedy of the faith, drawn from visions and pictures of the infernal and supernal realms, are fading away among the lost arts. Theologic schools cannot, as they once could, inspire their students with a faith in these phantoms. Science and common sense hav interposed and spoiled that game.

The old fossils in theology feel their occupation is nearly gone. The younger weaklings who are defending it see that it is losing its charm. If we can get light into the mind, faith will take its flight. If we spend our forces in public or private talks with those who need the light and will not read, it is about the only way to make them think and excite an interest in inquiry and a willingness to know the truth.

We are too few and poor to waste our resources on dead issues, or in misdirecting or exhausting our strength in merely entertaining one another with our forensic skill and vigorous logic, or with caricature and sarcasm, in demolishing theories already about being abandoned as unimportant or worthless.

The more intelligent clergy know that even as a foundation for their old creeds and their theologies, the Bible has no longer much hold on the people.

Were it not for the strong and well-organized church organizations, and the great ecclesiastical hierarchy behind them, by which the vast army of the clergy are employed, honored, and supported as spiritual guides and religious leaders for the masses, they could not be kept up. The clergy know that it is only by fighting to keep them up that they can hold their occupations, and secure their pious bread and butter. The profession, to them, is one too holy and honorable to languish.

Faith is really of little consequence. It may die, but the offices and emoluments are too precious and important to be easily surrendered. It is the church property and revenues that mainly keep up the organization. Were it not for the treasures laid up on earth, there would be but very little laid up in heaven.

If a congregation is to liv, it must hav some real estate. Then, to hold it without paying taxes on it produces a pious feeling that keeps up a spiritual unity, a firm front and sternness of purpose against the inroads and assaults of Infidelity.

It is the precious associations that linger around the sacred temple, the house of God, which priestcraft, in its own interest, has developed, and not faith in creeds, that are the strongest bonds of church union. The Bible is valued more as a fetich, an inheritance from the past, than for the infallibility of its contents. It has been proved that it teaches anything and everything that is either good or bad.

It certainly is gratuitous and unwise for intelligent Freethinkers to any longer continue selecting absurd or offensiv texts to criticise and demolish, when the revisers hav exposed the holy secrets, and hav done so much to sweep the whole volume overboard.

When we hav anything to say about this old literature, to disparage it or to break its force as a holy or infallible record, this serious testimony of the reverend revisers will be far more effectiv than the caviling or scoffing of an Infidel. The believer is often sincere and honest in his faith, and should be treated accordingly, if it is our object to enlighten and disabuse his mind of the falsehood and fraud that hav been imposed upon it. Let us then, when we can, use the weapons of his fellow-believers, which are so efficient and formidable.

If the revised version has no appreciable value over the authorized copy, being "substantially the same," we are not sure that the motiv for the revision was not simply a pretext to furnish the committee a justification for issuing the "Companion," for the purpose of exposing to the uneducated public the pious secrets, the craft, the forgeries, the ecclesiastical machinery and mendacity, that hav furnished us our so-called Holy Bible. Knowing, as educated men, what a formidable barrier its supposed teachings hav been to all enlightened progress; how they hav prompted to persecution, to martyrdom, and desolating wars; and how they are still arrayed against science, holding the church and the people in the bonds of superstition, they believed this was the best method of breaking and divulging the secret. Whether meaning to or not, they hav done a good work.

Liberals could not do better than to treat their ill-Liberal friends with copies of this "Companion." Being from a high orthodox source, it will not be Infidel literature, nor objectionable as a text-book for discussions between believer and Infidel. What it reveals ought to be enough to destroy the faith of, if not to convert, the most ardent devotee of the church. When we learn from it that Jesus never performed a miracle; that he is neither a "Lord" nor a "savior," and that the word "Christ" was only a title bestowed on him by strangers, etc., and much more which simplifies his character as only a teacher and reformer, it spoils all the divinity and supernaturalism that hav given his name its despotic charm over the mind.

Another Landmark Gone.

On Monday, February 27th, I left my home to attend the funeral of Isaac Beadle, which occurred in the town of Galen, near the village of Clyde, in Wayne county, N. Y., on the 28th.

Mr. Beadle was eighty-one years old, and the second white child born in the town. Life's lamp went out within a half-mile of the place where he first saw the light.

His life was peaceful and quiet, and spent in the town in which he was born. He died in peace with all who knew him, a true reformer, having the welfare of his kind at heart.

He was naturally skeptical, but at the time of Mr. Bennett's arrest he felt the outrage to be so great that he openly denounced the whole proceeding, and as it was all done in the interest of the church he took a bold stand against the domineering spirit of the church and the priesthood, and took his position among the out-and-out, stand-up-and-be-counted Liberals.

He had no belief in a future state of existence, but believed that all the good which he could accomplish, and all that he could enjoy, must be accomplished and enjoyed in this life.

Nature was his god, and at her shrine he was a devout worshiper. If he had no hope of heaven, he escaped the fear and dread of hell. He viewed death as an endless, peaceful, quiet sleep.

He was too shrewd and practical a man to trade off the good and substantial things of this world for mere guesses about the skies.

He was a practical man, and believed to the fullest extent that all the plowing and sowing must be done on this earth, and that no harvests can be gathered in the skies.

He was not only charitable to those who differed from him in opinion, but he allowed none to want where his benevolent hand could reach. Wherever the poor were found suffering, he was present to help. Even those who had never befriended him he helped with a liberal hand, though never expecting anything in turn.

There is scarcely a man in the neighborhood who will not miss his wise counsels and his helping hand. He was a good farmer and a practical man, and was frequently consulted by his neighbors in regard to the best methods of managing their farms, and frequently helped young men both by his counsels and material aid to start in life.

He spent much time in the distribution of Liberal papers, tracts, and books. When he found a striking article in THE TRUTH SEEKER, he did not say, "I want you to read that article," but read the article himself, calling particular attention to the most convincing points in the article. A few such earnest workers in every community would soon revolutionize the country.

When the principles of Liberalism were being discussed in his neighborhood, and the orthodox people expressed the opinion that Infidelity had a tendency to lower the state of public morals and that it would lead to vice and crime, the answer was sure to be put in by some one: "Why, look at Mr. Beadle! He is an outspoken Infidel, and he is up to every good work; his code of morals is spotless; and every way he is as pure as the snow which falls from heaven. His word is as good as his bond."

I never saw so many great, big, noble specimens of humanity at a funeral as I saw on that occasion. It would seem that he had breathed a new breath of life into the very elements which surrounded him. Earth and atmosphere must hav partaken of his greatness to produce such noble-looking men.

The friends had taken heads of long, bearded wheat and stripped off the leaves, leaving the golden-yellow stalks, and bound them into a beautiful sheaf and laid it on the casket. Apropos, thought I, his life has been bountiful and he has gone down to the grave "like a shock of corn fully ripe." He was not kind and benevolent because he had been taught to be so, or because he considered it his duty, but it was the spontaneous outburst of a noble and generous nature.

In life he was a man, in death he was a hero.

Such are, mainly, the facts in regard to the life of the deceased, as I gathered them from friends and neighbors in my flying visit to the neighborhood where he had spent his life.

He was a child of nature, and in the arms of Mother Nature we leave him. He was born of the elements, and to the elements must return. Earth to earth and dust to dust.

He was a man, take him for all in all,
I shall not look upon his like again.

Blue Laws.

When Thomas Jefferson built his mansion near the skies, he made a billiard-room in it. But scarcely was the building completed before a law was passed by the general assembly forbidding billiard-playing, both public and private. The billiard-room was then converted into a ball-room.

In regard to the early laws of Connecticut this is what the historian Palfrey says:

The first code of law adopted in Connecticut, December, 1642, related only to capital offenses. Established a year later than the Massachusetts Body of Liberties, it is in great part a verbal copy of that instrument. Neither before nor for several years after the confederation of the colonies had New Haven any body of statutes. During this time the courts were guided in their decisions by what, in their apprehension, were the rules of equity and scripture. The popular story of the "Blue laws" of New Haven is without foundation in fact. It was a fabrication of a dishonest writer of the period of the war of Independence.

After the example of the mother country, orders were made in all the colonies for the regulation of prices of commodities and of labor. Experience proved the futility of such legislation, and in due time it was abandoned. The less objectionable enactments in restraint of extravagance in dress were also no inventions of New England or of Puritanism. They had precedent in the earlier history of England. Not only the support of the ministrations of religion, but of personal attendance upon them, was enforced by law. So it was in Virginia, and so it was in England. In all Christian countries it was understood to belong to the rightful province of law to control the individual, not only for his neighbor's protection, but for his own well-being and improvement. But if the New England founders had not received that theory, probably they would hav originated it.

The Connecticut code, says Palfrey, did not adopt the whole system of Massachusetts; it did not include among capital offenses the striking or reviling of parents or the breaking of the Sabbath. The English law of the time denounced capital punishment against more than thirty offenses. The Body of Liberties reduced the number to ten. As early as 1657, and before the first child born in New Haven had attained its majority, "it was propounded that the court would think of some way to further the setting up of schools for the education of youth." Still earlier the town had "provided that the schoolmaster should be maintained at the public charge, and Milford had made provision in a comfortable way." And imitation of the example, says Palfrey, was by order of the general court enforced on all the towns of the colony.

The fabricated "Blue laws" to which Palfrey refers, I suppose, are contained in a blue-covered pamphlet, recently republished in San Francisco, purporting to hav been first published in 1830, and entitled, "The Code of 1650, being a compilation of the earliest laws and orders of the General Court of Connecticut . . . to which is added some extracts from the laws and judicial proceedings of the New Haven Colony, commonly called Blue Laws." It has a frontispiece representing the arrest of a man for tobacco-chewing, witnessed by a woman with five children. One of the children says, "Mam, dad has catched a man chawing tobacco." The mother replies, "My child, he will hav his deserts." The constable and father, laying hold of the offender, says, "Chaw tobacco, will you?" The fellow arrested replies, "Say nothing; you shall hav some of the tea;" and he spurts the liquid from his mouth into the face of the constable. Below the picture is a reference to the prohibition of tobacco-chewing in the code of 1650.

There appears to be no law in this collection forbidding a man to kiss his wife, or a wife her husband, on the Lord's day, but in the report of trials on the "1st of 1st month, 1643," is the following:

Goodman Hunt and his wife, for keepeing the councells of the said William Harding, bakeing him a pastry and plum cakes, and keeping company with him on the Lord's day, and she suffering Harding to kisse her, they being onely admitted to sojourn in this Plantation upon their good behavior, was ordered to be sent out of this towne within one month after the date hereof; yea, in a shorter time, if any miscarriage be found in them.

The Lord's day was strictly kept in New England, beginning at sunset in conformity to the Levitical law, to wit: "From even to even shall ye celebrate your Sabbath." My father was born in Connecticut, but at the age of four years migrated with a colony to Kingsboro, N. Y. He never joined a church, but was always a rigid Calvinist and an observer of the Sabbath, beginning at sunset, while all the rest of the emigrants gave up the Saturday night observance. When I was twenty-two years of age, I spent six weeks in Meriden, Conn. On Saturday night there was expected a generally attended prayer meeting. And yet I was told by an aged Christian that the observance of Saturday evening was only a custom, it not being regarded as a part of the Sabbath. On Sunday evening there was no religious service—only sometimes a temperance meeting—and it was allowable to go a-courting and indulge in lively social intercourse interspersed with secular music. But when on a bright and balmy Sunday, after the second church service, I took a stroll through the woods and fields, I noticed that nobody else was out, and, on inquiry, I was told that it was unusual for anybody to be seen walking on Sunday except to and from church.

It is possible that the penalty for Sabbath-breaking in Massachusetts was death, as prescribed by the Mosaic law, but if so, it certainly was never enforced. And perhaps the law has never been repealed, just as laws against blasphemy still remain on the statute books of other states. In the District of Columbia, for example, under the old Maryland law, any person who shall deny the holy trinity, or shall utter any profane words against the Father, Son, or Holy Ghost, must, for the first offense, be bored through the tongue and fined twenty pounds sterling, or suffer six months' imprisonment; and, for the third offense, the penalty is death. W. H. BURR.

A Straw that Shows Which Way the Wind Blows.

Yesterday the body of Bartholomew Coggins, a soldier of the late Rebellion, and a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, was laid away in the Hollenback Cemetery, this city, by his former comrades, under the following circumstances:

A short time ago another G. A. R. member died, and was taken to the St. Mary's church to be buried by the priest, Father O'Harren. His coffin was wrapped in the American flag, and accompanied by his comrades, who wore the badges usual in such cases, to mourn for their departed friend. This man's name was Mundy; he was a faithful Catholic, and a lover of his country and the army post of which he was a member.

When the Grand Army men marched into the church, with the coffin draped in the flag of his country, as is their custom, this priest, Father O'Harren, became very angry and immediately tore the United States flag from the coffin and dashed it to the floor, and ordered the Grand Army men to remove their badges or leave the church. He acted with all the hatred and venom that an enraged tyrant would exhibit. To such an extent did he carry his priestly antics that the whole congregation was astonished at his insane conduct.

Among the audience was Mr. Coggins, who saw the disgraceful and disrespectful conduct of his pastor in the treatment he gave the flag of freedom and noticed the contempt shown by the manner he tore the old flag from the coffin—the flag under which he had marched and braved the bullets of the enemies of the Union for years. He was not only shocked at it, but pained and grieved to think that the church, to which he belonged, would act so contemptibly. His patriotism was aroused by it at once, and it asserted itself in a way not to be put down. He resolved that when he died no such disgraceful conduct should be enacted over his remains, and instructed his family, as soon as he got home, to that effect.

The poor comrade had not long to wait for the messenger of death, as he was the next one on the list to go, but he reiterated his request on his deathbed, and requested his son to see to it by stating to this priest that if he offered any objections whatever to the G. A. R. men, they should bury him without the priest's offices.

When the son so represented to this bigoted priest, he flatly refused to hav anything to do with him, and told him that his body could not be placed in consecrated ground; whereat the son told the priest that the flag which he despised had shielded and protected his church, and that without its protection it might not fare so well, and that the G. A. R. would bury his father without his offices; and he was buried.

There is no doubt but that the body of Bartholomew Coggins will rest as well in the soldier's grave as it would in that of the church to which it belonged. The burial services were beautiful, tender, and impressiv, and the family hav been highly commended by the general public for the noble stand they took to defend the American flag, and defy a priest who would dare to trample it in the dust. The service was honest, and much more serious, as well as satisfactory, than it possibly could hav been coming from a heart filled with the rancor of a traitor to America's flag.

Only a few years ago—1878—this same Father O'Harren was called on to offer a prayer, as part of a program to celebrate the massacre of Wyoming, and stood by the side of President R. B. Hayes and Hon. John Sherman in our city, where he uncovered his head in the presence of ten thousand people and asked God's blessings on the American flag and its people, and now, in so short a time, we find this non-citizen traitor tearing that same flag from the coffin of a poor soldier, and trampling it into the dust of his feet, casting it away as if it would desecrate the altar of his church, although that same altar would never hav been erected or consecrated without its protection.

Are we not justified, in view of his malicious and contemptuous conduct, in saying that he must be a traitor to that flag, and that all his former words of praise were but the words of hypocrisy?

He had an opportunity to show his respect for that flag and the government it represents, and how did he do it? He might hav shown respect for its defender, the poor soldier whom he was called on to bury, who was taken to the church for such consolations as his people believed he could giv, but instead, this man, who represents that machine in Rome, has the unprincipled audacity to dishonor both the soldier and the flag he so bravely fought under, as well as every one of the brave comrades who wanted to pay the last sad tribute to the departed worth of a dead brother soldier. The result is that the Grand Army can hav nothing less than a supreme contempt for the swaggering traitor who is sworn to be obedient to another and a foreign flag. And may the condemnation of every G. A. R. man rest upon his dishonored head, as it justly should.

We warn you, Father O'Harren, that the time is past when you can treat Americans, and the American flag, with your dirty conduct, and escape the censure of an indignant PUBLIC.

Astronomical.

H. M. PARKHURST, ESQ., Dear Sir: An astronomical question has recently been raised in this community, and it is desired that you settle it by an explanation of the whole matter in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It would seem that after the 21st of December, when the sun has touched the tropic of Capricorn, and commenced his return trip to Cancer, the days ought to be lengthened alike by the earlier rising and later setting of the sun, but we find, on looking into the almanac, that though the sun sets later immediately after the solstice, he rises later also for nearly two weeks, and adds nothing by his earlier rising to the day's length till the 9th of January. And while the later setting of the sun adds thirty-three minutes to the day's length in January, the earlier rising adds only twelve minutes. Why all this? The Astronomical writer in the Toledo Blade says the sun entered Aquarius on the 12th of January. We had thought it about the 21st that it entered it. How is it? Please explain, and oblige many truth-seeking friends. Yours truly, W. W. WALKER.

New Bedford, Pa.

REPLY.

In the statement in the Toledo Blade, there is evidently an accidental transposition of the figures, for it should hav been the 21st instead of the 12th. The other question needs explanation, not correction. The moment the sun commences the return trip northward from the tropic of Capricorn, the days begin to lengthen. If apparent time is used, they lengthen equally morning and evening. But one month before that time the sun is fourteen minutes fast, and one month after it is twelve minutes slow, making a difference of twenty-six minutes in the two months, which is called the equation of time. In the two months the sun moves four hours twenty-six minutes in right ascension, while mean or average solar time can only allow the average motion of four hours. When the sun is fourteen minutes fast, it rises fourteen minutes earlier, is south fourteen minutes earlier, and sets fourteen minutes earlier, making the forenoon so much longer and the afternoon so much shorter. That is the reason why the sun sets earliest, according to the clock, in the early part of December. When the sun is slow it rises late, is south late, and sets late, making the forenoon shorter, and that is the reason why the sun rises latest, according to the clock, in the early part of January.

Captured a Church.

SUCCESS OF THE CHICAGO SECULAR UNION.

In a former article I intimated that the Chicago Secular Union was about to rent, for its regular meetings, the Madison Street Theater, as its present quarters are becoming quite inadequate to the attendance. Well, we hav done better—vastly better—having paid six months' rent in advance and secured the lease for a year of the church formerly occupied by the Universalists, corner Sangamon street and Washington boulevard—the most celebrated drive on the West side. The building is a large frame structure, 50x100 feet, fronting on the boulevard; has recently been decorated and repaired inside, and possesses a fine organ which cost $3 000. The Chicago Union will hav exclusiv control, except one evening each week, and proposes to sublet it for concerts and meetings and thus replenish its treasury.

An office for the secretary of the American Secular Union is to be built in the building, and extensiv alterations made, besides painting the outside (which will probably cost $200), prior to our occupancy on Sunday, April 1st. It will be the largest building occupied by any branch of the American Secular Union, and is an evidence of what patient, earnest, persistent endeavor, coupled with considerable sacrifice of time and money, will eventually accomplish.

Seven years ago, when reorganizing the Liberal League, the writer and others passed this very church, when one of the party remarked: "Don't you wish we had a building like that?" I merely observed that "we would some day," although my experience even then had made me modest in my expectations. The Episcopal cathedral is on a similar corner, just one block below, and in a much poorer location. Though that is a stone structure and ours a frame building, ours is larger and higher and more imposing in appearance. To-day Drs. Henry and McLeod and myself closed the bargain, signed the lease, and concluded that we had accomplished enough for the glory of Secularism in one day, surely. Our motto is, "I X L," or, I should remark, that is the monogram of a club composed of part of our Young People's Society. They hav a social on Friday night. Dr. McLeod is going to giv some biological lectures under their auspices. The writer will furnish them some scientific text-books.

SUCCESS ONLY THROUGH LEAFLETS.

"If the Liberals of Colorado were thoroughly organized," says C. B. Reynolds, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 3d, "they would be a mighty power for good," etc. Then why does not this vice-president of the American Secular Union proceed to rouse their latent energies and demonstrate this "mighty power?" The benefits to be derived from organization are certainly not confined to Colorado, and Mr. Reynolds only takes this occasion to publicly attack those whom he has been urged to assist. But Reynolds's lamentation and excuse is, forsooth, that the American Secular Union has not prepared leaflets on "How to organize a local Secular Union and insure success." Am not aware that Mr. Reynolds has been able to insure the success of a single Secular Union himself. If he can accomplish that by merely writing a leaflet, I shall only be too happy to publish it, for it will far transcend in importance all the rest of our literature. But, if the experience of some years is worth anything, I can assure him that it will hav to be something different from the crudities he presented at the Cleveland Congress.

Liberals, on the question of organization, are as unlike any other portion of the community as it is possible to imagin. I hav found that it takes something besides leaflets to inspire, uphold, and maintain a successful Secular Union. The Chicago society has donated hundreds of dollars to the national treasury, besides keeping up a continuous agitation at home. Where can Mr. Reynolds point to a more successful organization of Liberals? This was not the result of leaflets. It was the result of work. The same work on the part of Mr. Reynolds or anyone else could dot this country with organizations all over.

We are also informed that, if we publish "How to inaugurate and conduct a science school successfully without a professor or experienced teacher," the American Secular Union would, according to Mr. Reynolds, "be doing something toward fulfilling its mission, and there would be little difficulty in forming local Unions, with science schools on Sundays, and social advantages that would insure their becoming a power for good, and as they grew in influence and numbers they would in turn help sustain the American Secular Union." In other words, the child must be born before the parent has matured. Mr. Reynolds should remember that there was but $5 in the treasury when I came into office, and scarcely a thing to work with. Another thing, it appears I hav been all along—even before Mr. Reynolds evoluted out of Adventism—laboring under the delusion that this movement was organized for the separation of church and state. Scientific schools, where possible, are very commendable, but are only remotely related to secularization, and are at least secondary to the practical work for which the American Secular Union was organized. Mr. Reynolds's articles in some of the Liberal papers are headed, "The Blasphemer's Peregrinations," as though the writer particularly courted that distinction. Now, if he is such a conserver of science, would it not be more in keeping with the dignity of his ideas to drop that sort of buffoonery about blasphemy and giv us a little more of science? However, that is his own business.

If Mr. Reynolds could look over my correspondence, he would conclude that the Liberal lecturers as a class were very hard to please. Here is a letter, written March 4th, from one who, in explanation of his dissatisfaction, forwards an eight-page epistle, from which I make this extract: "Anxiety on the part of others to become martyrs. . . . Disgraceful performances under a tent and a cause demoralized. . . . Liberalism fed to a mob of driveling ignorance, and another day some new ephemeralism is in order, and thus it goes on." Another, from a gentleman in Wisconsin who can see no moral obliquity in commissions, says: "Why can he [meaning Mr. Reynolds] not get out leaflets himself?" And a good deal more in a style that Mr. Reynolds would scarcely relish.

The "unkindest cut of all" is that Mr. Reynolds well knew when he penned that article that the secretary had been refused the authority by the board of directors to even draw from the fund held for his salary to print needed documents, as they did not feel authorized to incur additional expense; that he preferred having the printing done to drawing his salary. However, to get over the difficulty, he has drawn his salary and ordered the printing of sixty-five thousand leaflets, two thousand constitutions, and has aided in getting out his pamphlet on "God in the State" at his own risk, trusting that the majority of Liberals will do something more than throw cold-water criticism on the American Secular Union. The leaflets may not suit Mr. Reynolds, but they are what I consider essential to the work of the organization. Dr. Willis, of Koko, Mo., a life-member, is generously assisting in this work. I am having twenty electrotypes made—ten with the Nine Demands, five with Senator Crockett's speech, and five with Putnam's rally for organization. Each one thousand impressions on a large press will make twenty thousand leaflets, and if not ordered in large quantities they come extravagantly high. We can hav other plates made, but the first ten, the "Nine Demands," will always be good. Those will be out next week. Weeks ago I ordered the constitutions, but no sign of them yet. Treasurer Eckhard has got out one thousand "Christian Paradoxes," which will be mailed to contributors to the fund. The illogical part of Mr. Reynolds's criticism is, that the American Secular Union should first do all this, and then there would be no lack of funds. Can he find printers with such firm faith in our "futures" as to accept them in payment? When I took this office, I outlined in "A Word to Liberals Everywhere" what I thought was a practical plan. A portion of that scheme—the book business—I hav not attempted to carry out as yet. Probably I placed too much reliance on proffers and assurances of activ assistance from quarters which, up to the present moment, hav amounted to 0. But when I make and inaugurate a plan which enables me to see my way clearly, Mr. Reynolds rouses from his "masterly inactivity" for the American Secular Union, and screams, "Bribes, commissions." No one prevents Mr. Reynolds from donating all the time and service he will for the pure love of the cause, but some people hav other notions that what is worth doing well is worth paying for. The organizer of a society deserves to be paid as much as a talker, in my humble opinion. Secular Unions do not die of "discouragement" from lack of leaflets, Mr. Reynolds, but from being stabbed in the back by pretended friends.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

Is The Statement Correct?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In No. 8 of Freethought our indefatigable secretary, E. A. Stevens, makes this statement: "In the city of New York Trinity Episcopal church owns a block of land one-fourth of a mile wide by three-fourths of a mile long, valued at $25,000 000. Taxed equally with other property, it would yield $1,750,000 annually toward supporting the state; but, it being exempt, that amount remains in the church's coffers, and the people of New York, who are taxed the extra amount to make good this deficiency, positivly pay $2.000 per annum for the religious instruction of each attendant at Trinity church."

This startling statement has often been made in the past, and I think I hav seen it contradicted on what seemed to be quite good authority. By ascertaining and publishing the exact facts about this matter, I think you would confer a favor on many Liberals, as well as contribute to general enlightenment.

S. BREWER.

Ithaca, N. Y.

[We do not know upon what authority Mr. Stevens made the statement. Here in New York no one can find out anything about Trinity church property. Even the county officials cannot get the corporation to file maps and information. The corporation has for years been getting closer and closer, until now it is run by an autocratic ring of the church which givs the public and the other members of Trinity church as much information as it pleases, and no more. The legislature ought to investigate it.—ED. T. S.]

Notes From the Lecture Field.

I gave only one lecture in Pittsburgh, and it was a great treat to the speaker to address such a bright and enthusiastic audience. The Union there is strong, and keeps up a constant bombardment of the old fort Zion. It has done and is still doing a grand work. They want the next national Congress of the Secular Union held there, and I think they are entitled to it. Pittsburgh has some veterans in the cause of Freethought, such as Harry Hoover, Roman Staley, Mr. Barker, and others.

Miss Voltairine de Cleyre has done good service there, and is winning golden opinions wherever she goes.

I received no favorable notices from the city press. Several of the dailies reported me as attempting to take the name of God out of the national Constitution.

In this city—Sandusky, O.,—I am having a grand surprise in the good-will shown me by the daily papers, all of which are giving me handsome notices. I am the first here except Ingersoll to advocate Liberalism from the platform. Our principal workers are C. F. Wininger, Isaac Weiler, Chris. Kuebler, and M. Hommel. As it is such an unusual thing for the secular press to say a word in favor of Liberal lectures, I know the Editor will indulge me in appending a few notices given me here yesterday and to-day.

The Register said:

Professor Bell, the Liberal orator, of Chicago, lectured to a large and appreciativ audience at Fisher's Hall, last evening. His subject, "Liberty and Morality," is a gem of oratory and humor, as it embraces the fundamental principles of good government. The lecturer at once enlisted the attention of his hearers. The subject throughout was so ably handled and well received that we predict the same well-deserved patronage for his succeeding lectures.

The same paper said of my second lecture:

An intelligent and appreciativ audience again greeted Professor Bell on the occasion of his second lecture at Fisher's Hall, last evening, on "Common Sense vs. Superstition." Judging from the look of anxiety depicted upon the countenances of the people as they entered, it was evident that they came with "great expectations," and in this particular they were not disappointed, as the professor fully sustained the impression made by his previous lecture. True to its subject, Professor Bell's lecture was brimful of common sense as well as instructiv and entertaining; and the demoralizing influence of superstition was so vividly portrayed that, if but a single spark of it lingered among his auditors, the object of the lecture must hav been accomplished.

The Evening Journal said:

Sunday night's lecture at Fisher's Hall, by Prof. W. S. Bell, on "Liberty and Morality," was fairly attended by an appreciativ audience. The lecture was argumentativ and humorous, delivered in good taste, well illustrated with anecdotes, and adorned with allusions to the Bible and Shakspere as the two most marked and least understood works of this or any age. The professor is as sincere now as when he was preaching for the Methodist church, and affords a very interesting evening's sitting to his auditors.

The Democrat, a German paper, said:

The lecture of the Liberal speaker, Prof. W. S. Bell, of Chicago, Sunday evening, at Fisher's Hall, drew an audience largely composed of Germans. Mr. Bell, formerly a Methodist divine, is a splendid speaker, and forcibly reminds his hearers of R. G. Ingersoll. His words were listened to with closest attention.

W. S. BELL.

A Preacher Spoiled.

In writing the article, "Life in a Trappist Monastery," which appeared in the ANNUAL, my object was merely to describe the daily life of a monk in that order. As I related only what I actually saw, it appeared necessary for me to describe the circumstances attending my entrance. Having arrived at the death and burial of the unfortunate devotee, my task seemed to me to be ended. I find, however, from Mrs. Slenker's letter in your issue of the 3d instant, that she considers some account of my release a necessary supplement. It will afford me great pleasure to supply the desired information.

In all religious orders there is a novitiate which must be gone through before vows are taken. This is a time of trial on both sides. The novice may conclude that he has mistaken his vocation, his physical condition may disqualify him from keeping the rule, or he may be cured of a romantic love of solitude and ecstatic devotion, and desire to return to the world. In any of these cases he is perfectly free to go. He informs the abbot of his change of mind, receives back his former clothes, and any other property which he may hav had with him on entering, and departs. On the other hand, the abbot may decide that he is not a fit subject for a monk, and dismiss him. Should he persevere to the end of his novitiate, which in that order is one year from the date of his clothing, or if he be under twenty-two years of age at that time, when he shall hav attained that age the monks, assembled in chapter, decide by a majority of votes whether he shall be admitted to vows or not.

In my own case, I had passed through eight months of my novitiate without any intention of seceding from the order. In the mean time I had been ordered by the abbot to writ a commentary on the rule of St. Benedict. One or two of the other novices had received a similar command. Unfortunately for my future career as a monk, my composition pleased the reverend father better than the others. In addition to this I had, during my terms of office as reader at meals and in chapter, given some evidence of the possession of a rather powerful voice. It struck our esteemed superior that it was God's will that I should become a preacher. He told me that I could serve the church better in an activ than a cloistered order. He fancied that I could do more good by advocating Christianity from the pulpit than by chanting psalms in the night, and spreading manure on a Leicestershire farm by day. I had no choice in the matter, or I am afraid I should still be engaged in these latter interesting occupations. Poor holy man! Had he been possessed of the gift of prophecy I guess he would hav counseled otherwise. However, I was bound to obedience, and under obedience was transferred to another order.

Right here I begin to fear that I hav not yet furnished the supplement which was to make my article satisfactory. I hav endeavored to explain the particulars of my release from one religious house, and I hav only pictured myself as I stood almost thirty-three years ago on the threshold of another. Of one, too, where I stayed much longer, and where the life, if somewhat less like a romance of the past, had a closer bearing upon our interests as Liberal thinkers of the present. It was one of those institutions where the teachers of illiberal thought are taught. I cannot deal with this subject within the limits of a letter, but if there are any who think that some account of my experience there, and of my final escape from the trammels of religious rule, might be interesting or of any value, I will attempt, as soon as I can find time from present rather pressing business, to send you a little information concerning an order of so modern a date that its founder was still ruling it when I was numbered among its members.

New York, March 6, 1888. E. J. BOWTELL.

Rivalry in Crime.

From the Dublin, Ireland, Christian Advocate.

In a report by Father Nugent, Roman Catholic prison chaplain in Liverpool, it is stated that during the year 1875 13,683 prisoners had passed through the borough jail; of these 9,397 were Roman Catholics, and 4,286 were Protestants. But the Roman Catholics of Liverpool altogether numbered 150,000, whereas the Protestants were 600,000. According to the ratio of population there should hav been four times as many Protestants in jail as Catholics, whereas there were not half as many. The Catholic Times of April 17, 1885, tells its readers that of 21,324 committals to the borough prison, 13,676 were Roman Catholics, whereas the Protestants, although so many times more numerous in the population, furnished only 5,130. In other directions the indications are worse. Father Nugent is reported in the Catholic Times as having said, in the League Hall, on November 11, 1886, that "nine out of every ten girls which are seen at night along the London road, or Limo street, are Catholics. There is no use in hiding it. The Sisters of Notre Dame had 15,000 of these girls under their charge."

A Parliamentary return for Scotland in 1872 shows 34 182 persons in jail in that country. Of these, 10,748 were Roman Catholics, and 23,434 Protestants; that is, having regard to population, one of every 27 Roman Catholics was in jail, whereas only one in every 132 Protestants had been in prison. Sir Richard Cross, when home secretary, said in Parliament, on July 23, 1877, that "about one-third of all the prisoners in Scotland were Roman Catholics." Were the Romanists in Scotland not more criminal than Protestants, their numbers in prison would be only 2,920, whereas the actual number was 10,748. In England the showing is also damagingly bad for Rome. The Irish in England are not, of course, all Romanists, but those who belong to the criminal classes are nearly so. If the Irish residents in England furnished to the jails in the same ratio as the English, there would be only 3,000 Irish prisoners in England. As it is, there are 22,100. The Catholics of England are 4 3 per cent of the population, but the number of Roman Catholic criminals amounts to from 15 to 40 per cent of the criminals in the country.

In Ireland we hav the following sad facts. There were 5,939 Protestants committed to prison in 1884–5; but in the same year the number of Roman Catholics committed was 31.110. In juvenil reformatories there were, in 1885, 151 Protestant children; but of Roman Catholic children the number was 818. In industrial schools the Roman Catholic children numbered, in 1885, 5,555, whereas the Protestants were 810. But the equally instructiv fact remains to be told: that the total sum received from the treasury and rates in 1885 was 18 383 pounds sterling for Protestants, as compared with 116,212 pounds sterling for Roman Catholics.

If we go to Canada, the case is no better. The population of Ontario in 1881 was 1,923 228, of which 320,839, or 16 per cent, were Roman Catholics. The criminal convictions in the same year were 6,940, of which 3 844, or 59 2 per cent, were Roman Catholics. There were 8.118 commitments to the Central prison, Toronto, between 1873 and 1886, of which 2,802, or 34 66 per cent, were Roman Catholics, and the ratio in the Mercer Reformatory for women during the same period was 35 77 per cent. Thus where the Roman Catholics are only 16 per cent of the population, the proportion of criminals of that persuasion is from 30 to 60 per cent.

In England and Scotland, Roman Catholics number about one-fourteenth of the population; notwithstanding, of the boys and girls committed to reformatories, one-fifth are Roman Catholics. Reconvictions of those who had been in reformatories tell a like tale. Of boys recommitted from Protestant reformatories, the number amounts to 10 per cent, but the number reconvicted from Romanist reformatories amounts to 22 per cent. So in Scotland: the reconvicted boys from reformatories there number 12 per cent of Protestants, but from Romanist reformatories, the reconvicted boys tot up to 33 per cent. The lesson of all this is that the efficiency of reformatory work in Protestant institutions is much greater than in those under Roman Catholic management. Whether in church, school, or the open theater of life, Romanism is shown to be not a healthy system, as compared with that of Protestantism. And yet the aid of the pope is touted for to promote the weal of Ireland! What our rulers hav got to do is their duty in the fear of God. Let them govern firmly, tolerating no vacillation, and showing no partiality; let them stand by law, and enforce it with swift, sure steps; let them, at the same time, leave nothing undone to promote the true prosperity of the country, and trusting in God, leave the pontiff to enjoy its presents in the Vatican.

Editorial Notes.

OWING to the blizzard which struck New York last Monday, completely suspending all trucking business and railway service, this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER leaves the office one day late. How many days late it will be in reaching the subscribers only the all-merciful providence who sent the storm can tell. We trust that our Dakota and other Northwestern friends will restrain somewhat their inclination to advise emigration from New York as being an uninhabitable place, and remember that we hav never joined in the gibes at their region. We hav a profound respect for Dakota products, especially in the matter of climate.

ONE circumstance connected with the blizzard givs us a little joy. The Episcopalian See House across the street from our office was snowed in and up and under to a depth of ten feet or so, while THE TRUTH SEEKER escaped with only so much snow as a dollar and a half expended upon the pauper labor of Italy would remove. The Episcopalians had to pay at least four dollars. Some folks would see in this the large hand of omnipotence, but a close observer would attribute it to the fact that we were on the right side of the street.

IN response to an inquiry as to whether the Roman Catholic is a Christian church, the organ of Methodism in this city says: "The Roman Catholic church is a church. It is not Mohammedan, Jewish, nor pagan. It is classed by all the gazetteers and geographies of the world as a Christian church. It is great. Therefore, it is in that sense one of the great Christian churches of the age. But it is held by Protestants to be a corrupt form of Christianity, having vital errors which justify them in having no fellowship with it." That is to say, the organ can't deny it, but it won't admit it. The unity of the Christian brethren was once an argument for the truth of Christianity.

MRS. SUSAN B. MCKINNEY, of Deadwood, Dak., advertised in a morning paper that she had Chiniquy's "Fifty Years in the Church of Rome" for sale. The next day she received a letter from the Catholic priest of Lead City, Mr. Patrick Rosen, whose parish presumably includes Deadwood, desiring her to discontinue the sale. The priest said:

"The name, and title, and author are enough to be convinced that its contents are of the most slanderous character against the Catholic church. I deem it my duty to warn Catholics against the book. So to avoid any unpleasantness, you will be prudent to drop said book from your list. Our church, as the guardian of truth, has a right to dictate to her members what not to read."

As Mrs. McKinney refuses to giv up her agency of the book, the town of Deadwood is now wondering what unpleasant consequences will be visited upon her.

IT is said, with an occasional supporting instance, that the Lord takes care of his own. This, we take it, is why a fire which burnt a hole in the building in which is located the office of our San Francisco contemporary Freethought big enough to drop a load of hay through, did not damage the Infidel establishment a cent's worth. The proprietor of the building is a Christian who told our brother that he wished he could suppress his paper, but we fancy he would hardly set fire to his own building to do it. The Lord's hand is plainly seen in this business, and it looks as though he is more angry with Christians than with heretics.

FORTY thousand Grand Army men are said to hav petitioned for the appointment of the Rev. Mr. Lowell as chaplain of the New York senate. The Grand Army can easily find better business than this in which to engage.

THE cross has no healing power until it is taken up and carried. To the hand that seizes it there is warmth; to the soul that bears it there is strength.—Unity.

And there is just as much warmth and strength in the crescent as in the cross, and just as much in any other enthusiasm or fanaticism, of equal development.

Lectures and Meetings.

MR. CHARLES WATTS has just concluded a most successful lecturing tour in the lower provinces of Canada. During April he lectures in Pittsburgh, Kent, O, and adjacent towns, and in May he makes a trip to Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Kansas. Parties requiring lectures in those states from Mr. Watts should write him immediately at 282 Sumach street, Toronto, Canada.

THE following is C. B. Reynolds's list of lecture engagements so far as known:

Florence, Ariz.	March 13, 14, 15.
Tempe, Ariz.	18, 19, 20.
Phœnix, Ariz.	21, 22, 23.
San Bernardino, Cal.	26, 27, 28.
Riverside, Cal.	29.
San Jacinto, Cal.	30, 31. April 1.
Diamond Mines, Cal.	2, 3, 4.
San Diego, Cal.	6, 7, 8.
National City, Cal.	9, 11, 12.
Los Angeles, Cal.	14, 15.
Santa Ana, Cal	17, 18, 19.

California friends desiring lectures should write to Mr. Reynolds at any of the above places so letters will reach two days ahead of dates.

A Fable.

A PIG had been seen to be growing fat faster than ever was known before, and a lean pig asked the cause, also why he seemed subject to continual paroxysms of merriment. The fat pig, stopping in a burst of almost uncontrolable mirth, refused to divulge the secret power by which he was enabled so to laugh and grow fat; but the next day the farmer, who had long surveyed with eager eye his growing flesh, selected him for the knife, and as the victim was being led away he exclaimed: "Alas that I did not share my advanced thought with my fellows, that we might hav fattened abreast, and I not hav fallen into the fate of the first in the paths of progress in all ages! Know, then, brother, that hid under my trough is a copy of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1888, in which you will find the awfully funny pictures of Watson Heston and delicious humorous writings of George Macdonald that hav proved my ruin." Then he was led away, while his shocked brothers commenced forging appropriate accounts of his Infidel deathbed.

MORAL: Pigs being raised for eating, like humans in Boonton, should refrain from laughing at sacred things. Or (2): Buy the ANNUAL AND FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC, price 25 cents.

The Christians and the Gas.

Wabash, Ind., is just outside the natural gas belt, but the gas is to be conveyed there by pipes, the city council having given a company permission to lay pipes, "providing that said company shall furnish gas free of charge to every church in the city." The ministers evidently hav a strong grip on Wabash.

Some of the Christians of the town hold very intelligent views concerning this gas supply. Two ladies were overheard discussing it the other day.

1st Lady.—"I don't believe it is right to be boring for so much gas."

2d Lady.—"Why?"

1st Lady.—"Well, don't you know God is going to burn up all the wicked? and I believe that the gas is what he is going to do it with, and therefore I think it wrong to use up all the gas, for then he won't hav any left to do it with."

Another equally intelligent resident of the town finds proof in this gas output of the authenticity of the Bible. The man was a lawyer, and he was talking to Arthur C. Everett.

Lawyer.—"Don't you believe in the authenticity of the Bible?"

Mr. Everett.—"Most decidedly not."

Lawyer.—"Why, a gentleman just gave me incontrovertible proof. He says this gas is the grease coming from the animal world that was drowned at the time of the flood."

Faith in Prayer.

Bill Nye, in the World.

I will close this letter with a little incident, the story of which may not be so startling, but it is true. It is a story of child faith. Johnny Quinlan, of Evanston, has the most wonderful confidence in the efficacy of prayer, but he thinks that prayer does not succeed unless it is accompanied with considerable physical strength. He believes that adult prayer is a good thing, but doubts the efficacy of juvenil prayer.

He has wanted a Jersey cow for a good while, and tried prayer, but it didn't seem to get to the central office. Last week he went to a neighbor who is a Christian and believer in the efficacy of prayer, also the owner of a Jersey cow.

"Do you believe that prayer will bring me a yaller Jersey cow?" said Johnny.

"Why, yes, of course. Prayer will remove mountains. It will do anything."

"Well, then, suppose you giv me the cow you've got and pray for another one."

Communications.

Miscellaneous Cavils at the All-Wise.

The Bible teaches the existence of a personal God; having the form of which the image is borne by the man whom he made (Gen. i, 27). For proof of this proposition read Gen. iii, 9, 10, where he talked with Adam; Ex. xxiv, 9, 10, 11, where more than seventy people saw him; Ex. xxxii, 30, 31, where Moses went to him; and Ex. xxxiii, 11, 20, 23, where Moses spoke with him face to face, and saw his back parts; and as it teaches that Jesus Christ was God, the proof seems incontrovertible.

It teaches that he is unlimited in power, present in all places at the same time, having knowledge of all things past, present, and future, perfect and infallible. How a personal, individual God or any other being can occupy more than one place at a time is not easy to comprehend.

As to his origin, he had none.

About six thousand years ago he created the heavens and earth out of nothing. Now, he being all-wise, the thought occurs: Why was this not done sooner, if it was a wise conceit?

How things could be created without material is not explained.

In Gen. i, 2, we are informed that "the earth was without form and void." The statement is unintelligible. It affords no information. The idea is unthinkable. Even the clouds hav form. And the word void is defined: unsubstantial, empty space, etc.

Before the creation God was all alone. All was blank space (if even space existed), impenetrable darkness. Then surely he was not a social being, and he must hav loved darkness, or he would hav had light. After the creation of heaven and earth God said, "Let there be light," and there was light (Gen. i, 3). Here is an example in magic, O ye magicians! In verse 4 he says the light was good, and yet we find the darkness was not yet dispelled, for he had to divide the light from the darkness. Where there is good light one might suppose there would be no darkness. On the fourth day he set lights in the heaven "to divide the day from the night . . . and to giv light upon the earth." (See chap. i, 14, 15, 17.) But verse 3 informs us it was already light, and good light, too. Strange these lights were made so much larger than the object to be illuminated, and so many which can scarcely be seen. Would a man build a lamp larger than his house? Science teaches there are stars so distant that it has required millions of years for their light to reach this earth. If this be true, Bible chronology is false.

Verse 17 is a repetition of verse 15 in regard to these lights being made for the purpose of lighting the earth. One might suppose a single statement of a fact by God ought to be sufficient. Other repetitions may be found in this book. The 36th chapter of Genesis from the 31st verse to the end is repeated in 1 Chron. i, 43 to the end.

After all the other things were made, inspected, and found very good, God said, "Let us make man in our image; after our likeness" (Gen. i, 26). We are not told to whom he was speaking, and thus inviting to take part with him in this important work. The other things, it seems, he created without assistance. If he was not speaking to one of his own creatures, is it not evidence of the existence of at least one other who was probably co-etaneous and co-eternal with God? If he was speaking to any of his creatures, it must hav been to some of the animal creation, for man was not yet in existence.

No particularized account of God's personal appearance or apparel is given us. But, if man bears his likeness, he must resemble him very much. In Gen. v, 3, we are told that "Adam begat a son in his own likeness, after his own image, and called his name Seth." Here we find the same language employed to express the resemblance between Adam and his son as was used in Gen. i, 26, to show the resemblance between God and Adam. Then hav we not a right to expect as close resemblance in one case as in the other?

Well, man was created not without material, for there is plenty of it now, although it may not seem clear to all how so much dust collected in so short a time after the separation of the land and water, for the dry land appeared not until the third day, and man was created out of dust on the sixth. And although man and woman were made out of different material, there is no perceptible difference in their flesh, blood, or bone. We are not informed of the material out of which other creatures were made.

The man was pronounced good and blessed. And yet, strange to say, he lacked the qualities necessary to protect himself from imposition, else he would not hav yielded to the first temptation. By providing him with sufficient discernment, could not the fall hav been prevented?

Colossians i, 16, shows that God created everything that was created. Does not this include the devil and angels—good and bad? If they were not created, they may be co-eternal with God. They are not any of them particularly mentioned in the story of creation, unless the serpent of Gen. iii, 1, 26, was really the devil, as we are informed in Rev. xx, 2, and xii, 9. If so, does that same serpent exist? If not, is the devil dead? If not dead, is he still traveling on his belly and breakfasting on the dust as directed by God in Gen. iii, 14?

Some Christians tell us that the devil only assumed the form of the serpent in order to deceive the woman, but they never tell us where they obtain their information. If the serpent was impelled, against its will, by the power of the devil, to deceive the woman, why was not the devil called and cursed instead of the serpent? There is no evidence of the devil being cursed at all if that serpent was not the devil.

Rev. iv, 11, shows that all things were created by God for his pleasure. In Gen, vi, 6, we read, "And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart." Then there was not so much pleasure in the creation as he anticipated.

In Isaiah xlv, 7, we learn that God created evil. Then why should he grieve at the effect of the evil? Did he not know what the result would be? In Gen. i, 31, we read, "And God saw everything that he had made, and behold it was very good." Did not this include the evil and the devil?

He gave to the man a command, which, knowing all things beforehand, he of course knew would not be observed. "For known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world" (Acts xv, 18); see also John xvi, 30. The very hairs of our heads are numbered (Matt. x, 30). Not a sparrow falls without his notice (Matt. x, 29). Then was this a mere trap set for the man? Why was the command given?

There appears no evidence of the command being given to Eve. The man in his innocence and inexperience transgressed the command, for which he knew not the reason, and of the penalty for which, death, he was of course ignorant, no death having yet occurred. There was no evil in his heart when he ate the apple, for his knowledge was so limited that he knew not good from evil. For this seemingly slight offense, when no principle of right or wrong is at stake, nothing more than disobedience to an arbitrary command of a superior, God pronounces the awful, merciless curse upon the man, the woman, and all their posterity throughout all generations, and extends it to the animal creation, and even to the earth itself. No discrimination made between guilty and innocent. And so we find this almighty, all-wise God of justice and love cursing his own work immediately after it is done. This may be an exhibition of power, but what about the wisdom and justice?

In Gen. iii, 1, we are told that the serpent who beguiled the woman was given more wisdom than any beast of the field. Strange this particular serpent should be endowed with wisdom which was denied to man. That this was so is proved by the information imparted by the serpent to Eve in regard to the result of the eating of the apple (Gen. iii, 4, 5). Had this same amount of knowledge been given to man, the fall might hav been averted.

We are not informed how the man and woman and the serpent acquired the knowledge and skilful use of language at this early period of life; nor as to the serpent's means of locomotion before the fall; nor that its wisdom was in any way lessened by the curse, or that he was deprived of the power of speech.

Gen. iii, 8, reads, "And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day." This is the first instance on record of a voice walking. If it was intended to say that God walked, then we would say that we hav a right to expect more accuracy in a divinely inspired book.

Now, if God had all power in heaven and earth, he could hav prevented the fall of man. He did not. To say he could not is to deny his omnipotence. And if he would not, having the power, where lies the fault? Why blame the man? He might hav prevented the progress of evil at this point. He did not. Why? His subsequent attempt to do it by flood proved a failure. Would not this hav seemed a more fitting time for the flood? The drowning of Adam, Eve, and the serpent, or, better still, the uprooting of the fatal tree which was allowed to remain in the midst of the garden, might hav accomplished it, and another trial at man-making might hav been attended with better results—provided the evil which God created be suppressed.

Theologians hav told us it was necessary that man should fall in order that he might know good from evil. If this be true, God knew it before they did. Then why should he curse him for what must be? Why forbid the eating of the fruit?

When God made man he expressed his satisfaction and delight in his work by pronouncing him good, very good, and blessing him as he did all the rest of creation (Gen. i, 31). Now, if man was so good without this knowledge, why was the knowledge necessary? Was it to make him bad?

Gen. i, 29, reads: "And God said, Behold, I hav given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat." The tree of knowledge is not excepted. In Gen. ii, 17, man is forbidden to eat of the tree of knowledge. Did God change his mind? In Mal. iii, 6, we are informed that God is unchangeable.

God told Adam that on the day he ate of the forbidden fruit he would die. The serpent contradicted this (Gen. iii, 4). This has been called the devil's first lie, but when compared with God's statement it does not prove unfavorable to the devil.

Up to this time there had been no sin; then where did the serpent learn the consequences of sin? It told Eve that when they ate of the fruit their eyes should be opened, and they would be as gods, knowing good and evil (Gen. iii, 4). Did man really become as a god, and that through sin?

Well, Adam ate of the forbidden fruit. Did he die on that day, as God said he would? No. If he had, how would the world hav been peopled? God drove him from the garden that day. To die? Oh, no! We are told that he lived nine hundred and thirty years before he died (Gen. v, 5).

We are not informed whether the animal creation were banished from the garden. Was it a waste of labor when God prepared the garden for man? and was it intended that man should remain forever within the limits of that garden?

In Gen. iii, 22, we learn that if man could hav access to the tree of life standing in the garden, he might liv forever. There is no evidence that the tree has ever been destroyed. Now, if men really believed this story, what could prevent a precipitate scramble for this tree? True, we are told of a flaming sword guarding the way of the tree of life (Gen. iv, 24). But if men will face the cannon's mouth for conquest of the fleeting things of this life, what would they not risk for eternal life and health? Access to that tree would be escape from disease and death. And what can we say of the love and kindness of the God, the father, who thus deliberately bars the way of his creatures to life and health?

In Gen. ii, 11, 12, we are told there are gold and precious stones in the land of Havilah, and that the gold is good. There is no flaming sword to guard the treasure. Where are the gold-hunters? Do not they believe this story?

When God pronounced the curse upon the woman, he said: "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee" (Gen. iii, 16). Thus appointing the husband the master, the wife the slave. This passage, to those believing it to be of divine origin, should be a final squelcher upon the doctrin of woman's rights. This same sentiment against the rights of woman is expressed by the writers of the New Testament. See Eph. v, 22–24, where the wives are told to be subject to their husbands in everything. Read Col. iii, 18; 1 Cor. xiv, 35.

In Gen. i, 28, God said to the man and woman, "Be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth;" and in the next chapter, verse 8, he puts them in the garden of Eden. How they were expected to replenish the earth, being confined within the limits of this spot, is not explained.

Notwithstanding the last above-quoted words of God, Paul, his spokesman, in the New Testament advises us not to marry.

Many theories hav been advanced by Bible students in the vain effort to reconcile Genesis with truth and known facts. They hav endeavored to show that a day meant a long period of time, some say a year, others a thousand years, others much more. They never come to an agreement. And yet this book is called God's revelation to man, his guide through life to heaven beyond. If this be true, it ought to be so plain a child could understand it, every chapter so clear there would be no excuse for mistake. A revelation not clear to the understanding is no revelation at all. In Gen. i, 4, we are told that God divided the light from the darkness. Verse 5 says, "He called the light day, and the darkness he called night. And the evening and the morning were the first day." Verse 14 reads, "And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven, to divide the day from the night. And let them be for signs and for seasons and for days and years." If a day here means a year, one thousand years, or more, what does the year mean, and what of the seasons? Imagin a long continuous night of a thousand years' duration or more. Verse 16 says, "And God made two great lights [sun and moon], the greater light to rule the day and the lesser light to rule the night." If a day meant a long period of time, hav we the correct account of Adam's age in Gen. v, 5? Upon what method was the computation based? If upon the day=year method, he ought to hav been 339,450 years old in such days and years as we now hav. And if a day meant 1,000 years or more, he would hav been at least 339,450,000 years old when he died.

By forbidding man to eat of the fruit of knowledge, it would seem that God intended him to liv forever in ignorance. Is ignorance more desirable than wisdom? In Eccl. i, 18, we read, "For in much wisdom is much grief, and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow." If this be true, then down with the school-houses. Away with the pleasures of thought. Let us descend as quickly as possible to the level of the beast.

But we find many passages encouraging and enjoining wisdom. Which should be our guide?

If God designed the fall of man, and made him subject to sin, why should he curse him for sinning? If he did not plan the fall, he lacked wisdom to foresee and power to prevent it. If man was made to sin, the fault was not his own, surely. Then why should he be put in disgrace for it? Was it not impossible for him to do otherwise than as God willed he should do? How could Adam sin, or justly be held accountable, not knowing what sin was? Would not justice demand that he be made fully to understand the consequences of his act before he could be held accountable? And how could he understand this in his ignorance of good and evil? A man so ignorant as to be unable to distinguish good from evil would seem to be little, if any, above the brute. Under the law of our land such a man could not be convicted of any crime.

But suppose Adam to hav known good from evil, why should all creatures, both guilty and innocent, alike suffer for the act of one? Does justice seem to demand this? The principle is repugnant to reason and to law. Then are human laws less unjust than the divine?

Has a just God created a creature faulty and then cursed him for that fault? Or has he cursed him without a real fault, or for a fault not his own? Must the creature answer for the fault of his creator? Did not God do his best when he created the man, the earth, the evil, and the devil?

When he cursed everything here, did he curse the heavens also? We learn in Rev. xii, 7, of war in heaven. What? War in heaven, in the very presence of God? Is it possible that this mighty God, who can speak worlds into existence like magic, suffers war to be waged against his authority?

If the story of the fall of man and of angels in heaven be true, what surety has the Christian that the plan of redemption is reliable, or that heaven is a safe place, or that a second devil will never appear, even should the present one be destroyed?

How quickly the controversy between Theism and Atheism might be settled by the personal appearing of God to all! If he appeared to Moses and others, why deny us that favor? We read in the New Testament, in 1 Tim. i, 17; Col. i, 15, and 1 Tim. vi, 16, that God is invisible; that no man has seen or can see him. These are flat contradictions of the statements in the Old Testament above quoted.

Men hav for centuries tried hard and honestly to make the Bible and reason agree, but it is impossible. Sound reason and truth will not disagree. Our sense of justice and of right and wrong, and the law of the land, are all based upon reason, not upon the Bible. For the law itself declares that "what is not reason is not law." L. J. POTTS.

Foundationless.

Some Liberal-minded people think that very many of the claims of modern Christianity are so unreasonable and inconsistent as to be altogether unworthy the attention of intelligent persons. But when we bear in mind the fact that it has a vast power and influence in the world, that it controls to a great extent the civil governments of Europe and America, that it imposes wherever and whenever it can disabilities upon people who cannot conscientiously comply with its requirements, no opportunity should be lost to expose its errors and inconsistencies.

Christianity boldly asserts that it is the only system of religion that will save the human race from a life of endless misery, and giv a life of everlasting joy and happiness to all who accept its doctrins and obey its teachings. In fact, it claims to be of divine origin. But it may be said, I think, without fear of successful contradiction, that Christianity is only one form of religion among many to be found in the world claiming to hav a divine origin; consequently, unless it can prove beyond the possibility of a doubt that it was founded by a being or power superior to man, its claims to divinity must fall to the ground.

The teachers of Christianity base the claim for the divine origin of their religion on the alleged relationship that existed between Christ and the Holy Ghost, or what they call the doctrin of the immaculate conception, by which they allege the divinity of Christ is clearly and conclusivly established. But right here the question arises, Is that doctrin true? Let us examin for a moment the evidence upon which it is founded. St. Matthew, the supposed author of the first gospel, records a dream which he says Joseph, the husband of Mary, dreamed in relation to the divinity of Christ; and St. Luke, the alleged author of the third gospel, records an interview which Mary, the mother of Jesus, had with an angel upon the same subject; but how and where those so-called inspired writers obtained their information we are not told. Matthew and Luke knew nothing about the divinity of Christ until they were converted under his teaching; consequently they could hav no personal knowledge of the subject upon which they were speaking or writing. The events which they relate or write of must hav occurred, if they occurred at all, thirty or thirty-five years, at least, prior to the time they were related or written of by them. Now, is it not marvelously strange how Matthew knew what Joseph had dreamed concerning Christ at such a distance of time, and that Luke could relate or write the message of the angel to Mary at a period of time equally distant? If Matthew and Luke were testifying in a court of justice, and the case involved a money consideration only, they certainly would be required to explain to the entire satisfaction of the court all the facts and circumstances in connection with the case before judgment could be rendered, or a correct decision arrived at. Yet modern theologians tell us we must believe, under pain of eternal torment, a very improbable story upon evidence that would not establish a claim to a dollar's worth of property in any part of the civilized world.

The doctrin of Christ's divinity is not only opposed to human reason and observation, but it antagonizes all the operations of nature with which we are acquainted.

And the doctrin of the atonement is so abhorrent to the feelings that nothing but the grossest superstition can support it; reason revolts at the idea of a just and merciful being—which we are told God is—resorting to such a horrible device for the so-called redemption of the world. Where is the justice in punishing the innocent instead of the guilty? Justice, in all cases, demands the punishment of the guilty, and the protection of the innocent. Therefore, if Christ was innocent and put to death for the sins of others, it was a crime of the greatest magnitude against natural justice and morality, because no power or government, however highly exalted, can, with any degree of justice, accept a substitute for a criminal. By so doing, another crime would be added to the one already committed.

Theologians tell us that God is a personal being, that he is everywhere present at the same instant, infinitly extended throughout the realms of boundless space, upholding and sustaining everything that exists. Can the human mind conceive of a being about the size and form of a man existing somewhere in space and controling the boundless universe? If such a being exists, is it not more reasonable to suppose that he, in common with other matter, forms a part of the universe, and must, of necessity, be subject to its laws?

The various churches form creeds and articles of religion which they require their members to believe under pain of excommunication, but we all know that belief does not depend upon the will for its existence, but upon evidence. Evidence will force on the mind conviction which cannot be resisted, and one is therefore compelled to believe. It is utterly inconsistent with the progressiv spirit of the age to confine the inquiring mind of man or woman within the narrow circle of a creed, because when truth not in harmony with such creed has been discovered the mind must either do violence to itself by rejecting the truth thus discovered or do violence to the creed by receiving a truth not contained within the limits of its bounds. Unlike the theologian, the Freethinker attaches very little merit to belief or demerit to unbelief; he considers it no sin to doubt or deny the truth of a statement or proposition when the evidence is insufficient to produce conviction, or to suspend judgment until additional proof is forthcoming either to establish or overthrow the proposition under consideration. But the theologian declares that to doubt is to be damned.

Protestant Christianity is not only divided and subdivided, but is literally broken into fragments by dissensions and strife within its own ranks, each sect upholding and sustaining opposing creeds, while the Catholic church remains united on every point of doctrin, thereby gaining an advantage over her divided and contending rivals. If the churches were what they profess to be, divine institutions, and the expounders of their principles divinely inspired, we would naturally expect that they would be of a kind and gentle disposition, exercising charity and forbearance toward all who could not conscientiously concur in their dogmas and creeds, but, unfortunately for the churches, the sacred pages of history inform us that with cruel hands they hav tortured and put to death in the most horrible manner imaginable the sincere, truth-loving heretic for no other offense than being true to the convictions of his own mind.

The highest ambition of the average Christian is to liv so that, after death, he may obtain a heavenly crown or a golden harp, and escape the awful penalties of hell; but take away heaven with its rewards, and hell with its terrors, and he will tell you that he has no inducement to do good, and nothing to fear for doing evil, consequently such people expect to be rewarded for every good deed done, and are only restrained from wickedness through fear of the punishment that would follow their wicked actions. Burns says:

> The fear of hell's a hangman's whip
> To hold the wretch in order;
> But where ye find your honor grip,
> Let that aye be your border.

A moral person upholds morality for its own sake alone, and not with a view of being rewarded or escaping any justly deserved punishment. We cannot entertain a very exalted opinion of persons that nothing but the penalties of the law will keep in restraint. Besides, it cannot be said that morality is a peculiar feature of Christianity. Our best authors inform us that the highest standard of morals, and the sublimest precepts, were taught by heathen and pagan sages, hundreds of years before Christianity was born. Burns said:

> Ye'll get the best of moral works
> 'Mang black Gentoos and pagan Turks;
> Or hunters wild on Ponotaxi,
> Wha never heard of orthodoxy.

Christianity may whine and lament over the rapid growth of what it calls Infidelity, but it may as well think to dip the ocean dry with a spoon as to stay the advancing tide of Freethought. Freethought appeals to the reasoning powers of man, and hails with delight the discovery of every new truth; but Christianity binds the mind to a creed and appeals to fears and superstitions only.

Matters and Things.

The publishers of the Open Court call our attention to that journal's change of purpose, which now is the conciliation of religion and science.—Freethought, San Francisco, Cal.

If we knew what religion is meant, we could probably form an idea as to the practicability of the journalistic venture. When religion is mentioned by writers in our country, we understand that the dominant form that now afflicts the people is meant. If it is the design of the Open Court to harmonize the Old and New Testaments with science, we hav reason to believe that the effort must fail, as we hav sixty or seventy thousand men who are engaged at good pay to make the "conciliation" plain and beautiful, and, so far, there has been a sickening failure in every case. Then there must be a change in the religion—science cannot be moved. If we are to hav a new religion, we must hav a new revelation. We hav a new one out in Utah. Why not adopt it? It takes a long time to get a new revelation on top—they all take fire, sword, persecution, expatriation, banishment, confiscation of property, and murder to giv them a boost, and we cannot expect to get along with less work now than was given to boom superstition a few hundred years ago. When a religion gets old in the eyes of one age, the thing to do is to get up something new. Then what shall it be? The sensible thing would be to get up a religion that would quadrate with science at the start, and there would be no "conciliation" needed. The religion of a pure morality and humanity ought to be a drawing card, and if science opens her mysteries and givs her divine light upon the world, all "revealed" religions will wane and sicken in the glorious effulgence—men will try to help each other to bodily liberty and mental freedom. Hail, happy day!

In reading Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," p. 554, we find these words:

> In the long period of twelve hundred years which elapsed between the reign of Constantine and the Reformation of Luther, the worship of saints and relics corrupted the pure and perfect simplicity of the Christian model; and some symptoms of degeneracy may be observed even in the first generations which adopted and cherished this pernicious innovation.
> The satisfactory experience that the relics of saints were more valuable than gold or precious stones stimulated the clergy to multiply the treasures of the church. Without much regard for truth or probability, they invented names for skeletons, and actions for names. The fame of the apostles, and of the holy men who had imitated their virtues, was darkened by religious fiction. To the invincible band of genuin and primitiv martyrs they added myriads of imaginary heroes, who had never existed except in the fancy of crafty or credulous legendaries; and there is reason to suspect that Tours might not be the only diocese in which the bones of a malefactor were adored instead of those of a saint. A superstitious practice, which tended to increase the temptations of fraud and credulity, insensibly extinguished the light of history and of reason in the Christian world.

Let Phineas T. Barnum, and all the catering, pandering hosts of humbug, witchery, deceit, and tomfoolery, avaunt! Stand aside, and let the king of all the arts and powers of deception, cupidity, and avaricious mendacity appear! These are some of the words spoken by Gibbon which so enraged the church that his work was viscerated in several editions, causing him to publish a "Vindication." Not one word did he "take back." He reaffirmed the truthfulness of his history, and fortified his proofs. And yet there are sensible people who do not see what a disreputable origin the church had in coming out of paganism! Read the words above of Gibbon again—ponder them—they are rich in food for thought. We would like to write more, but we can not afford to tire the kind and gentle reader. There are so many good things in this grand history that we could write a book on them.

Mr. Moses as An Author.

The Rev. George Samson, of the Berean Bible College, ought to hav been buried when he died, instead of being allowed to roam around frightening folks with ghostly reminiscences of what the church believed when he was alive.

We are led to make this remark by the receipt of the following letter:

"NEW YORK, Feb. 27, 1888.

"E. M. MACDONALD, EDITOR, Dear Sir: I hav before me the substance of a lecture, delivered by the Rev. Dr. George Samson, of the Berean Bible College, to which a reply from you would undoubtedly interest a number of your readers.

"The object of his lecture is an attempted answer to Kuenen's assault upon the authority, accuracy, and inspiration of the Old Testament, especially the so-called five books of Moses. Speaking of the Pentateuch, he says that the generally received historical account was that Moses wrote the first four books of the Bible at Mount Sinai in the space of a year, and the fifth book, Deuteronomy, or the Second Law, forty years after, in the valley of the Jordan; which is recognized in all the other books of the Old Testament, and by Christ, who quoted from all the works of Moses; that his authority was also recognized in Grecian and Roman history, particularly by Pliny.

"He says that modern doubts as to the genuinness of the books attributed to Moses only began in the sixteenth century with the criticisms of Spinoza. In regard to the supposition that Moses wrote in Phoenician characters, and Ezra at Babylon copied his writing in Chaldee, he claims that it was nothing more than writing German or Roman in English letters. Moses, in Ex. vi, 3, says that the name Jehovah was not known to Abraham; hence, it is argued that Ezra must hav inserted it in Genesis. His explanation of this is that the word 'know' is peculiar in Hebrew as well as in Greek, and, like the passage in John, where Christ said, 'Ye do not know me,' means comprehend.

"To the assertion that the laws of Exodus were so different from those of Deuteronomy that Moses could not hav written both, he contends that the code in Exodus was written for a pastoral people, while that of Deuteronomy was given forty years later for a settled people, and that Christ quoted from both as the works of Moses he considers sufficient evidence to substantiate the fact that such was the early belief.

"In conclusion, he says that it has been said that Leviticus was a code also written by Ezra for exiles in captivity, to be used by the Levites when they had no civil offices. He says this is absurd, because the captivity began about three hundred years before Ezra wrote a word, and so, as Christ has mentioned Leviticus as having been written by Moses, he thinks he has a pretty good case. What sayest thou?

"Yours very truly, JAMES W. DARE."

The generally received account of the authorship of the Pentateuch is the account which no Christian scholar nowadays accepts, and not the least of those things which provoke the hostility of intelligent men toward the church, says Keeler, is that the clergy will not tell their congregations that this "generally received account" is false in almost every particular. There is absolutely no affirmativ evidence worth a pin that Moses, and Joshua, and Samuel, and David, and Job, and the other Bible heroes wrote the books ascribed to them, while the negativ evidence very readily and conclusivly shows that they did not write them. Especially is this true of Moses and the Pentateuch. Kuenen's position is that tradition alone is responsible for the ascription to Moses of the authorship of the books composing the Pentateuch. In this he has the support of his colleagues and dozens of German and English scholars. One fact alone is sufficient to disprove Mr. Samson's statement that Moses wrote four books in a year, namely, that the Hebrews did not possess the knowledge of manufacturing writing material. Allowing, what some biblical apologists claim on the strength of Herodotus's works, that papyrus, parchment, etc., were known in the Mosaic age, there is little difficulty in showing that the Jews had not sufficiently progressed from nomadic barbarity to avail themselvs of the knowledge. Kuenen shows that in all manners, social, governmental, religious, the Jews of those days were undeveloped barbarians, with a religion as debasing as that of a tribe of African savages. "They worshiped gods whose character is most clearly expressed by the symbol of consuming fire. Bloody sacrifices, too, were the chief part of their worship, circumcision was practiced, and even human sacrifices were not unusual." To say that the chief of a people of this character could find time and material to write four voluminous books in a year is ridiculous. If Moses could write books so readily, and possessed the materials, why did he and the Lord spend forty days writing the Commandments upon stone? Besides, anyone can see that these books were not composed by one author. Ewald finds distinct traces of seven different authors in the Pentateuch. Eichhorn and his followers assert that Genesis alone was composed by several people, and certainly no one can maintain that the two accounts of creation were composed by one author unless that author was crazy. In Genesis, too, reference is made to incidents which did not happen till hundreds of years after Moses. For instance, in Gen. xiv, 14, it says that Abraham pursued his brother's captors "unto Dan"—yet the city of Dan did not exist until Moses had been in his unknown sepulcher some three hundred and thirty years. Gilgal, mentioned in Deut. xi, 30, was not given as the name of that place till after the entrance into Canaan. In Gen. xxxvi, 31, the beginning of the reign of the kings is spoken of historically, an event which did not occur before the time of Samuel. The writer of the Pentateuch either wrote after these occurrences or possessed a remarkable gift of foresight. There are many other kindred instances of impossible chronology, proving conclusivly that Moses did not write the accounts. And so far from Deuteronomy having been written forty years later, the evidences, as compiled by Von Bohlen, Vatke, George, and other recent critics, show, from its prophetic character, that, whenever the Pentateuch was put together, Deuteronomy was the oldest of the books collected.

It is true that Christ referred to the Pentateuch, and Howard Crosby, D.D., once wailed agonizingly that the general abandonment of the claims for Moses was an abandonment also of the divinity of Christ. For how, he asked, could a God quote false authors, or fail to know who wrote the books of the Old Testament? But in these days of biblical criticism we may, we hope, be pardoned for suggesting that the authenticity of the New Testament itself is not so indisputable that it overwhelms the criticisms made upon the Old. It does not help the first lie to hav a second told to support it.

The criticism of the Pentateuch began as early as the eleventh century, chiefly among the learned Jews. The Christians were too ignorant to grapple the subject. Heathen authors, like Celsus and Julian, represented the Pentateuch as mythical, and paralleled its stories with pagan mythology. In this respect they were the forerunners of the Christian school of Kuenen, who parallels "the legend of paradise" with a Persian myth, and symbolizes the conquest of Christianity over "heathenism" by the legend of the Drachenfels. After the Reformation Spinoza attacked the origin and date of the Pentateuch, followed by Simon, Le Clerc, and Van Dale. Since then, and especially in this century, innumerable critics hav appeared, notably the Germans, Vater, De Wette, who says the Elohim portions of the books ascribed to Moses were written in the age of Samuel and Saul, the Jehovah portions about the same time, but contradicts other critics and places Deuteronomy later than either; Schumann, who makes Ezra the author of the law; Hartmann, who holds that the books were of slow growth and not at once a completed code; Ammon, who surmises that the Pentateuch may hav been planned by Moses, was gradually continued down to the time of Solomon, entirely forgotten during the period of idolatry, rediscovered in the reign of Josiah, and then rewritten and edited under the name of Moses. Von Bohlen asserts also that the Pentateuch was gradually developed, but not brought to a conclusion till the age of Christ. Coinciding with these and other modern German critics in denying to Moses the honor given him are the biblical scholars of England—Colenso, Robertson, Smith, Davidson, and others. George Smith, of the British Museum, has contributed to our knowledge of this mythological record by showing that the story of the creation and fall was known to the Babylonians at least four thousand years ago. And Draper corroborates this by asserting that these legends became known to the Jews during their Babylonian captivity.

But whatever may hav been the original language of the Pentateuch, supposing any original to hav ever existed in written form, in any age, before the time of Ezra, which is more than doubtful, to this last-named scribe must be given the credit of the work. Dr. Samson cannot impeach Colenso's statements that the books of the Pentateuch are never ascribed to Moses in the inscriptions of Hebrew manuscript, or in printed copies of the Hebrew Bible; and that they are not called the books of Moses in the Septuagint or Vulgate—the old Greek and Latin versions of the Old Testament. Neither do any of Dr. Samson's assertions deprive of a jot of truth Kuenen's statement that strict and impartial investigation has shown that the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch must be given up, that Moses gave us nothing of the law but the Ten Commandments—and even these not in the form in which we find them now—but that if we still call these books by his name, it is only because the Israelites always thought of him as their first and greatest law-giver, and the actual authors grouped all their narrativs and laws around his figure, and associated them with his name. Like the authors of the New Testament, who put into the mouth of Christ words and sentiments which they knew he never could hav uttered or held, so these writers fathered upon Moses laws which he never delivered to the Israelites. They were the work of we know not how many people, but the fact that Deuteronomy was first proclaimed authoritativ in the time of Josiah is sufficient to show that it was not written by the same hand that gave us the laws in Exodus. The first Pentateuchal writer, he who gave us the creation account, was saturated with Persian legends, and we find the explanation of Genesis being a duplicate of a Persian myth in a circumstance which also places the writing at a much later date than Moses. About 725 B.C. the Israelites were conquered by the Assyrians, and many of them carried away captivs. Their places were supplied by Assyrians from Babylon, Persia, and other places, from whom the Pentateuchal writer learned of the creation myth, which he wove into his story, as he and other writers did many other Persian legends. Another book of law appeared about a hundred years later, and this, when made authoritativ by Josiah, was woven into the Pentateuchal writer's story. The second Pentateuchal writer was probably Hilkiah, as it is certain that the third was Ezra, whose writings were published 444 B.C. Dr. Knappert says: "Before the Babylonish captivity Israel had no sacred writings. There were certain laws, prophetic writings, and a few historical books, but no one had ever thought of ascribing binding and divine authority to these documents. Ezra brought the priestly law with him from Babylon, altering it and amalgamating it with the narrativs and laws already in existence, and thus produced the Pentateuch in pretty much the same form (though not quite) as we still hav it." This explains the statement in 2 Esdras that he wrote a history of "all that hath been done in the world since the beginning." The essential stories, such as the creation, deluge, etc., we thus see were borrowed by the Jews; their laws are the handiwork of various writers, and to Ezra belongs the credit of shaping them into the incoherent form in which we now hav them. It is no objection to Ezra's authorship of Leviticus to say that Christ quoted from it, and, therefore, it must hav been written before Ezra's time, for it must be remembered that the New Testament was written many hundreds of years later, which easily explains the matter. The men who wrote and edited the New Testament had a purpose in view; there were no stenographers in the days of Jesus; that individual never put his ideas on paper; and we know no more of what his exact words were than we do of the form of George Washington's prayer when he went into the bushes at Valley Forge. And even Ezra's work is not as he left it. Nehemiah, and later amenders of the Hebrew canon, changed it freely. They did not consider it inspired, and, says Davidson, seeing what Ezra did, "would naturally follow his example, and would not scruple to revise the text in substance as well as form. They did not refrain from changing what had been written, or inserting fresh matter." Thus books which the "generally received accounts" credit to Moses are the work of a great many irresponsible and uninspired authors, who knew not that they were tampering with holy writ, but simply fixed the law up to suit their times. The work was ascribed to Moses only because he was their great man, the people reverenced him, and his words carried weight. As a negro in this country bows to the name of Lincoln, so the Israelites prostrated themselvs before the name of Moses; and as the scribes and politicians of our time take advantage of the fame of Lincoln, so did the kings and scribes of yore derive from the name of Moses all the value it possessed.

Mr. Samson has a difficult task before him if he proposes to rehabilitate the fame of Moses as an author, and not the least discouragement to such an attempt is the hard, cold fact that when he proves his hero to hav written the Pentateuch, he would only prove that in doing so Moses wrote himself, or the source of his inspiration, down as a stupendous idiot. There is no honor in being shown to be the author of statements that are not true.

Colonel Ingersoll's Religious Opinions.

The comments of the ordinary run of newspapers upon the announcement that the Right Hon. Wm. E. Gladstone will shortly review the religious opinions of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll are very amusing, and well show the fear and bigotry of the average journalist. One paper says it is killing a musketo with a cannon ball; another that Colonel Ingersoll is not very widely known, anyway, and wonders how Gladstone ever heard of him; another laments that the "grand old man" will giv factitious importance to Infidelity by answering its chief exponent, and so on through the scale of excuses and apologies for Christianity. But, however the Christian sympathizers disguise their sentiments, the fear underlying their expressions is that when Colonel Ingersoll comes to consider Mr. Gladstone's considerations the outcome will be as bad for their pet superstition as the result of his discussion with Dr. Field—which result is the inspiring cause of Mr. Gladstone's chivalric interposition. They evidently remember the fabulist's warning to "those who in quarrels interpose," and desire to save England's chief controversialist from the fate probably in store for him.

Moreover, the derogatory estimates of Colonel Ingersoll are evidently the thought of which the wish is the sterner progenitor, and not the deliberate utterance of the impartial journalist who weighs current history in evenly balanced scales, and sets down naught in malice. For it cannot be denied that upon the theology of the present, no other man, however eminent a theologian, has had so great an influence—wholly for good—as Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll. The only one who approaches him is Charles Darwin. No preacher has been listened to by so many people, no writer has had so many readers, no orator and author has left so deep an impression upon the minds of his audiences and students as the champion of civilization against mediëvalism. Thousands upon thousands hav gladly paid to hear the eloquent denunciations of orthodox barbarity, and millions of copies of these lectures hav been sold to eager crowds. The book pirates of this and other countries could, if they would open their ledgers, tell how richly they hav profited by the desire of the people to read in poetic periods the sentiments they desired to hear, and were waiting for some one to voice. Since Martin Luther there has been no man who in a theological dispute had so many unknown disciples and intellectual partners as Mr. Ingersoll. Great artists, says the colonel, hold the mirror up to nature, and the words and works of men of genius throb in unison with the great ebb and flow of things. This is why his deep damnation of theological monstrosities has been echoed back from so many hearts. Let the theologians say what they will of innate and total depravity, there is in every bosom some little love for justice, some small abhorrence of cruelty, finite and infinit, and a few seeds of benevolence, which force their possessor to recoil from the Calvinistic religion. And in his warfare upon this religion, Colonel Ingersoll has "touched the universal," like the great poets and artists, and all men of real genius. Shakspere holds the place he does because of this. His reader is touched to tears and raised to supreme hights of indignation; he is moved to mirth, forced to reason, and to deplore human barbarity—all emotions are aroused. Shakspere touched the universal. "He has the inspiration of nature itself. He represents life." So does Colonel Ingersoll, and because he does is he the power he is. No man's name is oftener in men's mouths. And this, not because he is an errand boy in Congress or a weather-vane in the presidential chair, or has schemed and obtained a seat in some legislature, but because his genius has raised him to an elevation where he is seen of all men. He is a city set on a hill. When you think of Ingersoll, the mind involuntarily pictures justice, square dealing, absolute honor, generosity, courage, goodness, liberty. He is an epoch in himself—the historical period when the world grew better. He is as universal as Shakspere—except that he cannot portray meanness. Over his hearers he has the same influence that Shakspere has upon his readers. The description of the sufferings of the uncrowned king, the tender affection of Cordelia, the loyalty of the antic who had not wit enough to desert his master, the selfishness of eager aspirants for a throne—"the greatest tragedy in human speech"—is not more quick to penetrate the human heart than Colonel Ingersoll's plea for liberty, equality, and love for men and women and children. There is not a man worthy of the name who can read "Lear" and not hate injustice. There is not one who could listen to Colonel Ingersoll's lecture on Liberty and go home and speak harshly to his wife, or repulse the child climbing upon his lap. It is this power over the human heart, probably, that makes it seem necessary to Mr. Gladstone that he should review the religious opinions of its possessor. A man who can stand before five thousand people and set them to crying at the barbarity of their race; who can laugh an opinion, crusted with centuries of sacredness, out of their minds; who can rouse them to anger at the cruelty of irresponsible Omnipotence—such a man's religious opinions are worth considering; and the theologians realize it, if those journalists who never go to church do not.

There can be no dodging it—Colonel Ingersoll is a power, felt everywhere. In England millions hav read his works. There is scarcely a language—not one of civilization—not enriched with the expression of his thought. In India, even, the missionaries find it difficult to explain the beauties of the scheme of endless punishment to the heathen, because they hav read, in their own spider-track print, the lectures of Colonel Ingersoll. Everybody, including the people of New Jersey and Delaware, reads Ingersoll. Perhaps they are shocked—most of them say they are—perhaps they hang back with finger in mouth like a child around the jar of jam—but they finally read him. And to read Ingersoll is an education in itself. Paine picked up the threads of Christianity and broke each one separately. Ingersoll explodes the whole absurd scheme. Hearing him broadens the mind, expands the reasoning power, and exalts men from servil slaves to self-controling sovereigns. Read him and you are at once out in the free air; you are filled with a feeling of your relationship with all there is in the universe of the beautiful and the sublime; the mountain becomes your brother, the sea your friend, and Nature a guiding mother. Under the magic spell of his words every mental shackle breaks, the brain steps forth from bondage—the human race becomes a part of the Infinit. This is genius.

We met a man once at a lecture by Colonel Ingersoll. He was a venerable, prosperous-looking gentleman, and listened intently, applauding very much oftener than did the writer, who agreed with almost every word. One splendid sentiment proved too much for the man. The pressure of appreciation exceeded the strength of his bump of reticence. He had to take somebody into his confidence or burst, and he pitched upon us. "I can't help it," he said; "I admire that man. I hear him every time he lectures in the same state that I am in. I hav traveled two or three hundred miles many times to hear him"—and then, as if he had said too much to a stranger, he added, "Not that I agree with him, but I must hear him." It is the same spirit that at every Sunday night reception crowds Ingersoll's large house with the brains of New York. Authors, artists, actors, judges, statesmen, business men, and some clergymen, in short, everybody whose acquaintance is sufficient to justify a pull at his door-bell, go up there. Why is this? Is it because of his wealth?—he is not so rich as tens of thousands here in New York. Is it because of his power in politics?—he wouldn't accept the presidency. He has no favors to bestow but his presence, no gifts but his genius with which to bribe. And if his fame is so factitious and limited, what we want to know is, why these things are thus, and we shall feel obliged to any journal which givs a reasonable answer.

The real fact is, however, that the heresy of this hind quarter of the nineteenth century is typified by a man of gigantic proportions from whatever point of view you look at him. And we are glad of it—proud of it, and mean to never cease informing the church that in Colonel Ingersoll she has a knightly opponent in whose armor she cannot find a crevice, whose lance she cannot resist, and whose character she cannot assail.

Politic and Pious John Sherman.

The Senate of the United States is struggling with the chaplain-in-the-army problem. Senator Henderson has tried his hand at its solution, and so has John Sherman, in whose bonnet the presidential bee is musically buzzing. The latter's bill ought to insure him the support of the churches and the contempt of those who hold the Constitution to be something better than waste paper. It provides that chaplains shall be recommended by "some official body of the church of which the applicant is a member." Section 2 provides:

"That a chaplain in the army shall perform the religious services at the military post where he is stationed; he shall preach at least one sermon each week, superintend a Sunday-school, visit the sick, and bury the dead. He shall superintend the post-schools, post-library, and reading-room, sit on courts-martial and boards of survey, and shall be a member of the council of administration."

If this is not establishing religion, which Congress is expressly prohibited from doing, then the English language needs revision as badly as did the scriptures. By this section Congress is contracting for and ordering religious services, is establishing Sunday-schools, which are solely for the promotion of religion, and paying for sectarian sermons out of the public treasury. There could be no more flagrant violation of the first amendment to our Constitution, which amendment is certainly binding upon Congress if not upon the legislatures of the states.

John Sherman is too pious to be president.

A Denial of Civil Rights in Missouri.

The Cottage Organ Company, of Chicago, sued Mary E. Willis, of Hannibal, Mo., for fifty-eight dollars, alleged to be due for an instrument. J. Harrison, justice of the peace, presided at the trial, which resulted in a verdict for Mrs. Willis.

One of the witnesses for the defense was Miss Irene D. Willis, who, A. R. Ayres, of the town, assures us, is a lady of spotless character, superior education, and culture as a teacher of music and painting. Miss Willis repudiates the cruel belief in a hell, and the justice, for this, decided that she was incompetent to testify in court. This decision was given in the face of Section 5 of Article 2 of the Missouri constitution, which declares "that no person can, on account of his religious opinions, be rendered ineligible to any office of trust or profit in this state, nor be disqualified from testifying, or from serving as a juror; that no human authority can control or interfere with the rights of conscience; that no person ought, by any law, to be molested in his person or estate on account of his religious persuasion or profession."

Truly, it makes little difference to Christians clothed with a little brief authority what the laws are when a heretic is concerned. Their conduct has ever shown that in their eyes an Infidel has no civil rights, and scarcely the right to liv. The Missouri constitution speaks very plainly, the Revised Statutes contain a section expressly devised for those who will not take a superstitious vow, yet both are overruled by a little justice of the peace who has just brains enough to be a Christian, but not enough to comprehend the constitution of his state.

Letters from Friends.

MARIONVILLE, PA., Jan. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry to inform you that Isaac Watson, one of our most respected citizens, died here on December 23d last, at the age of ninety years. He was a great reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and waited anxiously each week for its coming. GEO. G. CRESSEY.

BOSTON, Feb. 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send an anecdote on testing the old precept. A minister who lost his coat at a revival meeting advertised for the assumed owner to come and receive the present of the "cloak also." The man did not accept the bribe—the promised reward for stealing. He lacked faith in Christian integrity. A history written in fraud, blood, and treachery stood in the way of the experiment. JAMES ANDERSON.

ELMO, ARK., Feb. 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: You need not stop my paper unless I get too delinquent, whatever may be the difference of our opinions in regard to the Anarchists notwithstanding. If the courts did deviate from their codes of laws, and rules of justice, they only executed the Anarchists by the mode which they themselvs advocated. By all means let us hav the cartoons. I consider it no more harm to illustrate on paper than on the imagination. On paper we hav the illustrations in the light; in the imagination, we hav them in darkness. We choose light rather than darkness. JOHN HINDMAN.

GLEN CITY, PA., Feb. 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I feel as if I should nominate two honest men for 1888. I think the time has come to lay aside all party spirit, and see that the best men we hav in the United States be nominated this fall; and besides, a Secular candidate should by all means be nominated. So I will name the best man in this world. If he accepts, I am sure he will be elected:

For President,
ROBERT G. INGERSOLL;
For Vice-President,
ROBERT LINCOLN.

G. P. DREISBACH.

CORINTH, ILL., Feb. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In reading "Letters from Friends," I hav failed to see any from this place, so I thought I would tell you something about this part of the moral vineyard. There are several around here who are Liberals in principle really, but hav had no opportunity to develop themselvs, for we hav had no lecturer through here to enlighten the minds of the people in the way of Freethought and reform, and those who are Liberally inclined hav become so in spite of the hell-fire doctrin they were taught to believe. As to myself, I was raised too much of my time on my knees to enjoy my young days, as I was taught to be continually in fear. But I hav outgrown the teachings of the past, and now do my own thinking. I hav been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER but a short time. I like it the best of any paper I ever read. Keep Heston at work; his pictures are splendid.

ISAAC C. ODLE.

AYER, MASS., Feb. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to get my last year's volume of THE TRUTH SEEKER bound, and find I am short of three numbers, viz., October 10th and the last two of December. Please hav the kindness to send them to me—price inclosed. I wish to hav the volume complete. Among the choice literature of to-day, there is not a book that contains such quantity, quality, and variety of intellectual food as does THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would that there were a volume in every library and on every center-table in our land. That "no such book in the world" (and I agree with them, and want no more like it) would soon seek oblivion, and its adherents would say it didn't mean thus and so. But "now that light, reason, is come into the world," the cloak is gone. The patent copyright at the end of the Bible is run out, and the priests and clergy manipulate the Bible with the same nonchalance with which the boys said: "Now bring on your bears." ELIJAH MYRICK.

NORTH LAKE, WIS., Feb. 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose, besides subscription, money for the 1888 ANNUAL and Colonel Ingersoll's Argument in the Reynolds case.

I was in hope that some one besides myself would fall in with me and help to swell the list of subscribers, but so far all hopes hav failed. THE TRUTH SEEKER will hav to be contented with one single one from this corner of the world. The people here are not literate enough. Many like to see and enjoy the pictures. For my part, I hav always thought that to keep on was solely my own benefit.

Knowledge is what we need, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great educator. It is independent and paddle-its-own-canoe in principle. It does not place itself as a bait for priests and popes and political game-hunters, or as a tool for capitalistic monopolization. It holds its own special flag, the banner for the liberation of all mental slaves.

It advocates impartial justice, which was made strikingly manifest in the great labor movement, so fresh in memory, which resulted in the bloody tragedy the 11th of November last. I sympathize with THE TRUTH SEEKER in its view that the Anarchists were unjustly prosecuted. Not that I favor Anarchism, or think there is any need of force. Neither is it the proper remedy to accomplish any satisfactory result.

The privilege of liberty is like a plant; if we do not know the proper way to treat it, it will soon die out. We must understand our duty before we can enjoy freedom as it was meant to be by Jefferson and Paine.

The eight-hour labor scale is an honest claim, but are the masses prepared to receive from two to four hours more recreation per day? Are they? Then it is good for them. But are they not? Then they are no better than dogs; the longer the chain the more they will rattle. I fear the bulk of the people are yet ignorant, dependent on priest and sacrament to substitute their sacred enjoyment for a good library and replace by their prayer and hymn book the "Age of Reason." Yours truly, AMBROSE LORENSON.

NEW ERA, ORE., Jan. 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find thirty cents, for which please send your ANNUAL ALMANAC for 1888, also "Ingersoll Catechised." We get THE TRUTH SEEKER every week, also S. P. Putnam's Freethought, which is splendid. All of my family are Liberals from the backbone, and cannot help it, for they surely inherit from their parents. My father was an Infidel, but he passed away when I was a child five years old. My mother was a Baptist, so I was raised under the sound of the preacher's voice. I hav three brothers. Two are church-members; one is on my side. I never write to the Christian brothers that I do not giv them a good blessing on the faith of their belief. They do not like it one little bit. I intend not to let them alone as long as I can write to them. They liv in Missouri.

We Liberals think of organizing soon. We want to be in working order against Mr. Putnam comes with us again. We badly need some one to lecture for us here. There are quite a number of Liberals here around. All they need is waking up. Yours truly, MRS. W. W. JESSE.

CHANDLER'S VALLEY, PA., Feb. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Well, the Lord has come again among the people of this place, and is threatening unrepentant sinners and cold-hearted Christians with a bath of burning sulphur, heated seven times hotter than ever before, if they do not get right down to the work of praising and paying his divine subjects, priests, that speak by the mouth of God, telling man that he is totally depraved, with no soundness or goodness in him (what a poor mechanic the maker was!), and that man is cursed by the mouth of the prophets for the poor job God made in his creation of the highest animal.

What a small number in liberty's ranks are on the battle-field defending the flag of human rights as an ensign to mental freedom and moral culture!

Mr. S. P. Putnam is doing a noble work in his Western labor. Mr. C. B. Reynolds and all of the workers are the battering-rams that demolish the walls of superstition. I trust scores of workers will be added monthly to do battle against error. Yours for truth, MRS. E. J. STOUGHTON.

ROCKPORT, MO., Feb. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: A few days ago I had a controversy with a couple of orthodox gentlemen, and they assured me that I was going to hell. I asked them where it was located. I quoted Luke xiv, 26, and the verse where Christ told the young man to sell what he had and giv to the poor, and also where it says it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. I asked them if they ever knew a Christian that hated all his relativs, and his own life also, in order to be a disciple of Christ. I asked them if they ever knew of a man or Christian that sold all he had and gave to the poor in order to be saved. I asked them if they ever knew a rich Christian to unload on account of the rich-man-and-camel business. All these queries are as yet unanswered, but they assured me that I was going straight to hell, and that I had better quit taking and writing for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I told them that the old orthodox institution they were trying to scare me with had no terrors for me, and that I should talk for universal mental liberty as long and much as I could. The fact is, the old dogmas of the Christian religion are played out, and their arguments are threats, nothing less and nothing more.

Yours for the right, G. G. BECK.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y., Feb. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Last year I obtained a club of four besides myself and sent you the $10 required. Whether I can get the same four to do the same this year, or any other four, I am unable to say. Of one thing you are probably aware, and that is, the growing sentiment against the liquor traffic and the need of its suppression by law, and one other thing you ought to understand, if you do not, and that is, that the Liberals, or Freethinkers, are in favor of some law for the suppression of this curse of curses, and it will not do, in my opinion, for any association or body of people that desire to hav any doctrin or principle followed to a successful issue to at the same time close their eyes against this growing sentiment; or, which is still worse, treat its promoters with contempt. Your utter contempt of the clergy, as a body, I fully justify you in, as they represent the church, that would, as in the past, I fully believe, persecute, even me, unto death, if clothed with power, and hence I am so jealous of the God-in-the-Constitution party, and of the clerical element in the Prohibition party, that I will not vote, or rather, I never hav voted, for it, and, not being willing to not exercise the franchise, voted the Democratic ticket in 1884 and since, with some exceptions by splitting, as we call it. And now matters are in this shape—no political party dares be honest in the suppression of the rum traffic, except so far as the Prohibition party may be, and I believe they as a body are, except the clergy, and with them it is secondary. Their God is first. I believe in the principle of the Prohibition by law of the sale of alcohol in any form except as other poisons are sold, and so labeled. I like your paper, and shall continue to take it and pay for it, because in the main I fully concur with all the sentiments of the editorials. As for contributors, you accord all generally a hearing through your paper. Do not understand me as dictating, but it seems to me that we as Liberals cannot afford to be indifferent upon this all-important subject, and if we find no other way to express ourselvs, we should form ourselvs into a party with one plank, at least, in favor of the greatest good to humanity, viz., the total Prohibition of the sale of the vile stuff, except as a poison as above suggested. I will try and see if I can get up a club again. The Freethinkers' Magazine, edited by H. L. Green, at Buffalo, is taken by some parties who take your paper, and that has taken quite a Liberal view of this subject; and as there are many of our great family uncivilized, we must work and wait for good results. R. BAKER.

FORT WORTH, TEX., Feb. 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I look through "Letters from Friends" every week with the hope of finding the names of some Liberals here, but they seem to be afraid, or hav not the time to write. I heard to-day that an Infidel lecturer would be here soon. We hav three Bible-pounders, one male and two females, who do their decorativ mind-painting from the lofty summit of a dry goods box rolled out in the street, and claim that the Infidel preachers will send more people to hell than the devil can attend to; and then the way they tear up hell and scatter it over the town, one is afraid to go out after dark for fear of being scorched by a little hell. They hav piled hell-fire, brimstone, melted metals, and burning souls up four stories high all over town; but it seems that the heat from the poor Christian's hell does not affect the mud any, nor does it save wood for the Infidels, as I hav a lively fire, and am not overheated either. Perhaps the devil has not learned the secret of penetrating the fireproof coating on an Infidel. He will probably wait till the Christians get through with me; and they hav nearly done this by not giving me their work. I would like to hear from some Liberal where a No. 1 painter is in demand. I can emigrate, but cannot believe ghost-stories; and I never miss a chance to argue with God's agents, as they term themselvs, and when Remsburg comes here, or anyone else, if I cannot help them along with money, I will find a rough meal for them should they desire it, and do what I can to advertise them.

I hav about $14 worth of books, pamphlets, and TRUTH SEEKERS loaned out to the soft-shells. No advice to offer, only keep Heston at work. C. E. ILLSEN.

WARRENSBURG, MO., Feb. 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: As I see nothing from this part of the country, I will try and keep you posted as to what is going on here. I am not a subscriber to your paper, but I hav been getting it through the newsdealer for a year and a half. My father and I had Mr. Reynolds come here and deliver four lectures. We engaged him for three the first time, but the good Christians beat us out of one, so we postponed it until Mr. Reynolds came back, when he gave us two more. The audiences were not large, but gave good attention. The good seed has been sown, and I think the harvest will be good. I will do all I can to keep the ball rolling.

There has been a good deal said pro and con in regard to the Chicago seven. I admire your good sense in taking the unprejudiced view that you did. There are too many men who call themselvs Freethinkers who are as bigoted as the most rabid orthodox. The fact is, they hav only lost their Bible God and are now worshiping at the feet of Mammon. The man who talks about this being a free country is either ignorant of what is going on or is interested in deceiving the people. That the liberties of the people are being undermined, any man can see that is not blind with prejudice. Brother Swan says he does not envy one who has been more fortunate than he has. Neither do I, if he got it honestly; that is, if he does not enjoy at my expense. When a man takes advantage of his fellow-man for his self-aggrandizement, then he is dishonest. Or in other words, if I hav more brains then you hav and I use them to your detriment or to beat you out of what you hav got, then I am at fault. Of course, I do not expect this idea would meet with popular approval, but it does seem to me that a man should use his superiority of intellect to the uplifting of his fellow-man instead of to his degradation.

I hope some one will take Mr. Denslow in hand. He is an able ally of the money power.

I think Watson Heston deserves great credit for showing up the Bible in its true light. G. C. BOLTON.

BELLEVUE, IDA., Feb. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In "Letters from Friends" in your issue of Feb. 11th was one from Harriet and Wm. Thorpe. I had not previously noticed the one from "Ohio," to which they allude. If so be the religion of humanity, the belief held by those who advocate love to man more than love to God, is to ignore the Golden Rule of life, then it is time that we look about us and see where we are drifting.

If the intellect, like a glittering iceberg, is to blind the eyes of pity, and congeal the warm currents of charity, let us turn our thoughts and feelings into the more vital and refreshing streams of the emotional nature, whose warm impulses never turn away from the needy and suffering. For my part, the few kind letters I hav received hav helped me to bear my burdens of life more cheerfully, and hav given me the opportunity of expressing my thanks and good-will to those kind, though stranger, friends; and, if I never meet them, they will liv in my memory forever.

I hav had it thrown up to me that the so-called Liberals were the most il-liberal of people; citing the case of Father Hacker, saying that "the whole of the Liberal Leagues could not support one poor old man." I felt chagrined at the seeming truth of this statement, but was loth to lay the charge to their lack of generosity; but if there are a majority of the friends who think, with "Ohio," that we should not speak to one another of our trials in life, in order that we may hav our burdens made lighter by the kindly assistance of others, then all our ethics and charitable teachings are wrong, and it would be far better to steel the heart against the suffering and unfortunate, and to pass them by as the Levite did the wounded man in the story of the good Samaritan, than to let go out the grandest impulses of the heart—to lift up and comfort the fallen and unhappy victims of misfortune, a fate that no one is exempt from who livs on this earth, so full of unforeseen changes.

Well has it been symboled that the tree of life is guarded by a flaming sword, and all who approach it are in danger of being wounded by it, though desiring only the good of life and love. I hav been rich in this world's goods, and I can bear its poverty without complaining, if only I can feel and know there are kind hearts beating responsiv to my own, with the universal love of the whole human family, of which we are brothers and sisters—and we should be so, not only in name, but in all this implies. LUNA HUTCHINSON.

GOODWYNSVILLE, VA., Jan. 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Brother Peck's "Open Letter to the Proscriptionists" is the most proscriptiv I hav seen at all. He has outproscribed the most rabid proscriptionists. Our complaining brother may be a good shoemaker, but I do not like the style of shoe he makes. Then I shall stop buying that shoe, or complain to the maker to change the style. If he does not change, then must one keep on wearing the shoe that pinches? Does not Mr. Peck see that he is the proscription master-general? And how about all this foolishness about "capitalists" and "bread-winners?" Are not all of us bread-winners? Are not all of us trying to be capitalists? Is not Gould a bread-winner? Suppose, Mr. Editor, you print a TRUTH SEEKER with all, or nearly all, of its pages filled with Talmage's sermons, and the balance with reports of missions, how long would it take Mr. Peck to write, "Stop?" Now, I would rather pay $10 per year for THE TRUTH SEEKER than not hav it at all, but I came very near stoping my paper while the "Reformer" was giving her "Reminiscences." I should hav taken the paper again after the "Reminiscences" had stopped. If some reformer wants to free all the dogs in Virginia I hav no objection, but I insist on being excused when that reformer wishes to force me to eat and drink with the dogs. We cannot all agree. So let us agree to let each other disagree. What right has Peck to peck at the shoemaker and still make him pay for being pecked at? I hav spent many a happy evening reading Brother Peck's attacks on the Bible, and there he is a barrel instead of a peck; but he ought not to object to any man's not paying for what he does not want. GEO. W. BARNES.

MURRAY, IDA., Feb. 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I now write to inform you that sickness has caused me to fail in remitting you as per agreement. In the latter part of August my faithful wife and loving companion was taken ill, and during October and November I despaired of her ever getting well. It seemed as though death was trying to claim her a victim, and take her hence to the unknown world of eternal sleep or endless happiness. But, thanks to medical skill in removing disease, once more she is permitted to sing a lullaby to her only child, a darling little boy. Our babe is eighteen months old, and was named, in honor of two of the great and noble thinkers of the nineteenth century, Volney Ingersoll. Oh, how can I command words to express my thoughts about that model husband and loving father; the hater of superstition and hypocrisy; the lover of liberty, justice, and truth; that illustrious orator and honored champion of Freethought, whose words of wisdom fire our hearts with freedom, with love, and liberty? O Liberty! Liberty! where wouldst thou be at roll-call without such men as R. G. Ingersoll?

We are surrounded by some of God's saints, who hav slandered and persecuted us on account of our having named our baby after those two ("horrible," God's saints call them) men. They used all their combined efforts to persecute me when my wife was lying on a bed of pain. For several years my health has been in a very poor condition, and it has been all I could do to support my little family, but as long as I liv I shall fight superstition, although poverty stares me in the face. With all my heart I detest, loathe, and abhor all enemies of love, truth, and justice.

Myself and wife dearly love the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, cartoons and all, but I fear that after our time expires we will hav to stop taking it for a while, but it would be very sad and lonely for us to part with the dear old TRUTH SEEKER after having taken it almost three years. But before that time arrives I hope some good angel in human form will smile on us. JOHN W. SMITH.

DAMASCUS, O., Jan. 18, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I like the name of your paper, "THE TRUTH SEEKER." More than fifty years ago, when engaged in teaching, I one day incidentally observed to the class in natural philosophy that nature was always true, and while we were following her laws we need not fear going far astray. A young man, an excellent member of the class, who had recently been "converted," in a very gentlemanly manner took exception to the views advanced, and argued that it was not so taught in the scriptures, etc. He was reminded of the fact that comparativly but a few years ago, the zealous advocates of the Bible put men to death for teaching the truth as it is in nature, but which they, by their interpretation of the Bible, believed to be condemned. Now this, under the advancing light of science, is accepted as the truth of God.

This state of things among mankind has been continually met with by the writer through the whole of his busy life. I hav all along met with good, thinking men, Liberal-minded, disposed to enter the vanguard in the battlefield of reformation and improvements, and yet so wedded to old habits of thought and action that they could not be induced to giv up an old error and tolerate a newly discovered truth. For truth is eternal, and only progressivly discovered.

I herewith send you a copy of a little work on the English language, in which is used, or proposed, a new alphabet, in which there is used a distinct letter for every distinct sound in the language—thirty-nine, upon a careful analysis. These letters always represent the same sounds. I claim it is an untruth to teach a child that ce spells k or that go spells go, since c and s in the alphabet hav the same identical sound, and should therefore hav the same power in spelling, and g and j represent the same sound in the alphabet, but no one would think that jo would spell go. Aitch-o cannot rationally be forced to spell ho, nor can doubleyou-o spell wo. And so on through the absurd chapter.

And then, the silent letters so frequently used in spelling are an outrage on truth, time, labor, and reason—e. g., tough, though, slough, sight, wright, severally pronounced tuf, tho, sluf, site, rite. No word on any account should hav more letters in its composition than it contains elementary sounds. We say "hate;" in this the final e is redundant, and should be dropped. "Laugh" no one could imagin should be pronounced laf, had not some arbitrary or priestish power imposed it on the laity, who implicitly submit to the imposition.

I hav taken this freedom with you because you profess to be truth seekers, and also I noticed occasionally that these "dead-beats," the silent letters, had been left off in your print. J. P. GRUWELL.

MR. EDITOR: This is a communication—or excommunication—I received from my sister in Troy, through her Jesuitic son William O'Leary, 89 Short 6th st., Troy. They paid me a visit or two. I used them well. They could see by the pictures and books round the house I was removed from their way of thinking. I served twenty-three years in the British army in India, amongst the gods Rama, Juggernaut, etc. I got weaned from perpetual adoration of a bit of bread. I am taking your paper since D. M. Bennett's trial. I remain, Yours, etc., MICHAEL BLAKE.

89 SHORT 6TH ST. TROY, N. Y. Jan. 22.

My dear Mr. Blake: Your communication of the 16th at hand, and am pleased to learn to know that all is prosperous you.

Without a doubt you hav often wondered why we hav'nt written, but when you would giv it a second thought you allways knew. As is our custom we communicated with all our friends and exchanged greetings previous to the holidays. But could not longer see the sence of wishing a Merry Christmas to one, who would not know its meaning and could not feel its joy, Mother has for some time wanted to write to you and giv you a most rigerous tongue lashing, but I hav caused her to put it off, from time to time, lest you should think I, the recipient of your hospitality, was most ungratefull. But when-ever I think of you, it is in thoughts of the deepest sorrow too think that you, my uncle in such an advanced age, should be in such a miserable, wreatched spiritual condition. Better for you, had you never been born than liv to see the day, when you would hav the audacity, to stand up in a so called enlightened council and deny the existance of the living God. Better for Sodom and Gommarsh than for such as you. You, who was born in the isle of saints, given a good Catholic rearing, should denounce the faith of your parents and and ancestors when you became enlightened.

Your only sister who always loved and cherished you, has been in peace of mind, fataly wounded. Her highest ambition for years, was to embrace her only brother from whom she had been seperated for so many years. And to secure herself this most gratifying pleasure, she at a good round age undertook a most tedious journey of 400 miles. There to behold a living monsterous infidel of her own flesh and blood, and she has never since been in the better of the shock.

She says you are no longer her brother, she severs all bands of relationship, to remain so as long as you continue in your present condition. But when you will consent to change your abominal creed, for the one you hav purjured, then and not untill than will you be reinstated in your former relation-ship Well do you know the esteem in which the Blakes were held, in their section of the old country, but little do you comprehend the shame and disgrace you hav brought upon that esteemable name.

Why when I (Norah) think that my brother would not allow his own children to say a prayer or bless their Creator and Redeemer I think I must be mad or dreaming, but it is too true too true But I shall hope that their good mother shall hav influense enough with them in after years to bring them to the true light.

I hav stood numerous insults for my religion, but that I should liv to see my brother deny his God and the blessed Virgin is too much.

Living in hope I bid you farewell. Fare the well:

NORAH, by her son William.

GIDEON, KAN., Feb., 288.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of your paper several years, and I think you are doing a grand work in freeing the mind of man from old, defunct superstitions. We are blessed—or cursed—in this county with the church, having two Presbyterian, one Congregational, one Catholic, three Methodist, two Baptist, one United Brethren, and other denominations too numerous to mention, all in the city of Lawrence, a town of twelve thousand inhabitants. Lawrence, as you perhaps already know, has revived some of the old Connecticut Blue laws. Last spring the citizens of this "historic" city elected a full Republican ticket, councilmen and all full-fledged. You know we hav municipal suffrage for women in this state, and the Republicans, to elect all their ticket, had every colored woman in the town register and vote. Well, as soon as these goody-goody officers took control, backed by the Women's Christian Temperance Union, they began to pass Blue-law ordinances, until it has become so strict that a person cannot buy candy, a cigar, or a newspaper, or get his boots blacked on Sunday. One young Comstock of the West, belonging to the Young Men's Christian Association, bought five cents' worth of candy from one of our confectioners and had him arrested and fined for selling it on Sunday. What is our great American republic coming to, when a man cannot sell a nickel's worth of candy without some lynx-eyed Comstock having him arrested and fined? Business men are leaving the town, and after a while we shall hav only preachers and cranks left.

Prohibition is another curse to the state. Liquor is shipped into Kansas by the car-load from "poor old Missouri," and of the worst and vilest kind. Christianity, backed by women's influence, is the cause of this condition. Giv woman the ballot and the Liberals of this country will soon be placed behind bars and free speech completely snuffed out. But the sooner the better, for come it will and must. Woman has been kept in ignorance as to the ballot, and the only way out is to giv her complete freedom of speech, press, and the ballot. The outcome will be grand. Man has failed in purifying politics. Woman will purify them in the end, but in her ignorant state at the start will make it worse.

I was raised a Christian, and was taught to believe there was a sheol for nine-tenths of the people born. I hav long since ceased to believe such nonsense just because it was in an old Jew book, written in an age of ignorance and superstition, and am glad to see thousands of my fellow-men coming to the same conclusion.

I sometimes hav hot arguments with some Christian friends, but they never hav time, or are not posted, or something else, for they invariably fly the track and leave the Infidel in peace.

I hav heard a great deal about Spiritualism, but hav failed to see any manifestations from the dead. I hav seen a great many Spiritualists, and they all look queer—hav a far-away look in their eyes. And I think their ism as big a humbug as Christianity, and that they are mentally diseased. What does a sound, healthy man need of a ghost? Let the ghosts and Gods leave this world for man alone, to build up a religion grander than all others, the religion of humanity.

J. W. WATKINS.

PITTSVILLE, WIS., Jan. 28, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $2.75, for which please send me the ANNUAL for 1888, and credit me on subscription for the balance.

Keep up those "horrid pictures," though some of your subscribers do think they hurt the feelings of their Christian neighbors. It is true that some of the pictures on the last page of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav been a little rude, but those on the first page hav been a lecture in themselvs, and the artistic work is constantly improving. How any sensible Liberal can complain about the pictures on the ground that they wound the feelings of their Christian neighbors is difficult to understand. Suppose my Christian neighbor takes a religious journal that has illustrations that are offensiv to me, how foolish it would be in him to cry: "Stop my paper! I am ashamed to show it to my Infidel friends!" We would think him a very unsubstantial Christian, to say the least. You probably hav not Christian subscribers enough that you need consult the wishes of the orthodox how you shall conduct your paper.

Then, there are some who are either very dull of comprehension, or are willfully trying to misrepresent your position in regard to the Chicago Anarchists. When you hav again and again said you did not sympathize with the principles of Anarchy, but were only pleading for a fair trial, it seems as though your patience would be well-nigh exhausted. But in spite of all you hav said in regard to your position in this sad affair, you are still an advocate of "misrule," and some of your subscribers "love their country" so much they can no longer support you. It seems to me as though no fair-minded man could treat you in that manner, as you hav printed letters and arguments against the Anarchists as well as in their favor. I would suggest that you offer some of these chronic kickers space in THE TRUTH SEEKER to prove that the men executed in Chicago, November 11th, had a fair trial. That is something I would like to see proven, and if these grumblers will read understandingly they will see that is the point at issue. Let them either do this or forever hold their peace.

There are some, too, who are very sensitiv on the subject of iconoclasm. They think you are not using the right method in propagating Freethought; that you are destroying more than you build. Now, in mathematics, we say that a proposition is proved true when we prove its contrary to be false. While this cannot strictly apply in polemics or science, yet all rhetoricians agree in stating that when the orator or writer has to deal with ignorance and prejudice that is the most effectiv method of argument. Every one of us who has been engaged in Liberal work knows how useless it is to talk of the relation of man to man on the ground of natural morality until we first show people the falsity of the doctrins of Christianity. It may be that some wealthy Liberals, living in a very Liberally inclined community, and receiving the homage that is always paid to wealth, see no need of iconoclastic work. But let them be poor, and at the same time known to be opposed to orthodoxy, they would soon be convinced that in the most enlightened communities there was much need of image-breaking. Or let them go with me into school-rooms for a few years, where we find children, even in the latter part of the nineteenth century, who hav been taught at home to believe that clocks will frequently stop, to giv warning of the death of some of the family; that ghosts still haunt some rickety house or a graveyard; that if we see a meteor or a shooting star, it is a sign some one of the family will die; that comets are sent by the almighty as a sign that there is to be war, or we will be visited by a pestilence or some terrible calamity, and they would see that Liberalism had a great amount of destructiv work yet to do—hard work for many years to come.

There are a few Liberals in this place, and we want Mr. Reynolds to visit us on his return to the East in the spring. If he will write to me when he can visit us, I will do what I can to secure a hall and raise money to pay him for one or two lectures. Fraternally, GEO. H. DAWES.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Regular Boy.

He was not at all particular
To keep the perpendicular,
While walking, for he either skipped or jumped.
He stood upon his head awhile,
And, when he went to bed awhile,
He dove among the pillows, which he thumped.

He never could keep still a bit;
The lookers-on thought ill of it;
He balanced on his ear the kitchen-broom;
And did some neat trapezing,
Which was wonderfully pleasing,
On every peg in grandpa's harness room.

From absolute inanity,
The cat approached insanity
To see him slide the banisters, so rash;
But once on that mahogany,
While trying to toboggan, he
Upset his calculations with a crash!

And since that sad disaster
He has gone about in plaster—
Not of paris, like a nice Italian toy;
But the kind the doctor uses,
When the bumps and cuts and bruises
Overcome a little regular live boy!

Capture of a Whale.

When I lived in Fall River, Mass., once upon a time, there appeared upon that part of the coast bordering Tiverton, the next town, a good-sized whale and her little one. It was, of course, a great sight, because an unaccustomed one, in those parts. Boats went out in pursuit, and finally secured the baby. The baby's mamma, no doubt, felt keenly the loss of her little one, and, half-frightened to death, she splashed wildly around in the water, until finally she stopped to rest just below the bridge in Tiverton, familiarly known as the "Stone Bridge," about six miles off from Fall River.

Near by lived a man who in other days had been on many whaling voyages, and away up in the attic of his house, stowed away, were an old harpoon and a lance. This man was away from home at the time of which I write, but he had a son about twelve or fifteen years old, who took a notion that he would like to capture the whale that was swimming about in the water, looking for her lost baby.

So Charley, remembering the old harpoon in the attic, and also the stories he had heard his father tell about the way they take whales, soon had the harpoon downstairs, and, with a comrade, started to catch the whale. They first procured all the old pieces of rope they could find and spliced them together, and at one end they attached the rusty harpoon; the other end they made fast to the middle notch of an old bar-post.

It was quite dark before their preparations were completed; but, nothing daunted, the two boys, Charley and Ned, proceeded in their attempt to bring in the whale under the light of the moon that was shining very brightly.

Taking the long rope and harpoon that had done good service in other days into a row-boat, they boldly pushed out into the waters of the bay. Charley stood in the bow of the boat, harpoon in hand, while Ned carefully paddled in the direction of the whale. They went on toward the bridge as cautiously as possible, neither speaking except in whispers.

Soon they were close upon the monster, and so excited that they trembled violently. But Charley had a firm hand and steady aim, and plunged the old harpoon into the body of Mrs. Whale. Instantly the water was lashed into a seething foam; away went the rope, and the bar-post to which it had been secured also, bobbing, jumping, dancing, leaping, as a bar-post never bobbed, jumped, danced, or leaped before, first on one side, then on the other, then end on end, out of sight, and down the bay, almost before the boys had time to say Jack Robinson. The whale was out of sight, too. The boys got home as best they could, very wet, and very much astonished at the great strength of a whale, and rather discomfited at their inability to catch whales, and half afraid that they might get a whale of another kind for their audacity in meddling with the greatest of all marine nimals.

The next morning the father arrived home.

"Well, my son," said he, "I understand you hav been on a whaling expedition in my absence."

"Yes, sir," answered Charley with a sigh.

"You didn't succeed in capturing the whale?"

"No, sir."

"Where's the harpoon?" he inquired.

"In the whale," demurely answered Charley.

The father smiled, but, taking his old lance, he and the two boys rowed down the bay in the direction the boys supposed the animal had gone.

Presently they came upon the bar-post, but no whale was in sight.

Now, the gentleman knew the habits of the creatures one of which he was in pursuit of. He knew that when one was wounded, it would dive under water and swim with great rapidity, fleeing for dear life from its enemy, and would only come to the surface to take breath. This particular whale had become fatigued into a passiv and yielding state by dragging the long bar-post with the harpoon sticking in him, and lay just under the water, excepting that part of the head called the "blow-hole," or nostril, which was only at the edge of the surface.

"Now, Charley," said the father, "I am going to take the post into the boat, or alongside it, and do you row cautiously in the direction the rope leads, and I guess we will succeed in finding the whereabouts of her ladyship."

Charley did as directed, and, together with Ned, they coiled the rope into the boat as they followed its lead, slowly and carefully.

It was not long before they came upon the whale, lying there under the water, all tired out.

"There she blows!" exclaimed Charley's father, and, thrusting the lance into a vital part of her body, the water round about was suffused with her blood, and in a few minutes she was quite dead.

Assistance was procured to tow her ponderous body to the shore, and then the farmers round about came with several yokes of oxen and pulled her up on the beach.

It was a great day when that whale was secured, and people came many miles to see such a "monster of the deep"—for she was nearly fifty feet long—high and dry on the land.

After awhile the whale was dissected, or taken to pieces, the bone and oil disposed of for a handsome sum, and the carcass buried. The teeth were kept as mementoes.

In regard to the whale, modern scientists think that it once had legs and fur like the beaver; but the conditions of its living became so changed that it had no need of either, and hence, by non-use of legs, they first became feebler and smaller, then quite useless, until after the lapse of years they disappeared altogether. And as whales lived more and more in the water, the fur disappeared, too, because it cannot grow when constantly wet in salt water. This shows plainly enough that if we would keep the limbs, muscles, mind, and all our faculties healthy and vigorous, we must not neglect their exercise. In India there are people so imbued with religious frenzy that they think that to please their offended gods they must do something unnatural. And we read of them thrustiug an arm upward and holding it in one position until it becomes withered and stiffened, so that it remains useless ever afterward. These deluded persons think they thus prove their sincerity in a false and degrading superstition, which they call religion, and, worse yet, they then feel that they hav a claim to be supported by their fellow-men on account of thus making themselvs helpless and useless for the rest of their lives.

True religion or genuin goodness never calls for any such foolish sacrifice of health or spirits to a supposed offended deity, but rather it enforces the following of truth and the practice of her precepts as manifested in a healthy mind in a healthy body. To be healthy, happy, and wise is to obey the health laws, and to "follow truth where'er she leads the way."

Acute Reasoning.

A Hartford little one was desirous of obtaining something on the sitting-room shelf. Its mother said, quietly but firmly: "You cannot hav it." A few moments after, the mother left the room, and the little one climbed up and got the coveted article. "I thought I told you you couldn't hav it," said her mother as she returned to the room. "I know it; but you didn't say I couldn't get it." The course of reasoning was so very acute that the mother was forced to submit,

Correspondence.

MOODY, TEX.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines for the Children's Corner. I go to school at Moody. I like the teacher very well. Mr. Remsburg lectured on the Sunday question. I liked the lecture. There are not many Liberals here. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER and like to read the Children's Corner. I like the pictures. So I will close. I remain,

Your Freethinker friend,
WALTER L. RUDASILL.

FONTANA, KAN., Feb. 22, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to THE TRUTH SEEKER. My papa takes it, and I like it very much. I like to read the Children's Corner. I will be eleven years old the 25th of February. I go to school and study reading, spelling, arithmetic, language, and geography. I hav not any pets but a little bird. My sister has some nice house-plants. My bird's name is Peep. I think I hav written enough for the first time. Hoping to see my letter in print,

Yours truly, LOLA MAY POLHAMUS.

TURIN, IOWA.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will try to write a few lines to the Corner. This is my first letter, so I will not write much.

I go to school every day. My teacher's name is Miss Wickersham. I study reading, spelling, arithmetic, physiology, and grammar.

We liv on a farm five miles from town. I hav a pony that I ride in the summer-time. My father went to Castana, a small town eight miles from Turin, to hear J. E. Remsburg lecture on "False Claims of the Church." Father thinks him a fine speaker.

My brother takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. We think it a splendid paper. We could not keep house without it.

Hoping my letter will find the Corner, I remain, Your and the children's friend,

BERNICE HOADLEY (aged seventeen).

GARDEN GROVE, IA., Feb., 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON, as the children call you—I am no child; I am nearly seventy—I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for eight years. I paid no attention to the Children's Corner for a long time after it started; I thought it was merely for children, but I begin to see so many little letters in it, and especially little girl's letters, that I got interested in it. I read them to see what the little ladies hav to say.

Keep on with your noble work. I am glad to see so many of the rising generation of women will not be priest-ridden.

Yours truly, JOHN CARNAHAN.

[Thank you, friend Carnahan, for your friendly words. We are doing the best we can, aided by many able friends, to hav a new order of things by and by, when our little girls shall hav grown into thoughtful, wide-awake, intelligent, and Liberal women.—ED. C. C.]

FOOTE, IOWA, Feb. 16, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw my other letter in print, so I thought I would write again. I do not go to school, but stay at home with mamma. I study arithmetic, geography, and spelling, and read in the Fourth Reader. I like to study. I hav the "Story Hour," and think it a very nice book. I like to read the stories in it. I shall be eight the 26th of June. My brother teaches our school, and has a literary class Monday night, and I belong to it, and hav spoken one declamation from the "Story Hour," "Never Trouble." I read, for a select reading, "Grandfather's Poet-Book," from the "Story Hour." My papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it came out. I like the pictures, and think the Children's Corner is very nice. I want to get my likeness, so I can send it to you, and get yours. I would like some of the little correspondents of the Children's Corner to write to me. I remain,

Your little Freethinker friend,
LOLA EDNA OLDAKER.

SUGAR RUN, PA., Feb. 18, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to you again, as I hav seen two of my letters in print.

I think the Children's Corner is improving every week under your careful supervision. Your article on coffee was so interesting, and if it is carefully read, even the smallest readers of your valuable Corner could not fail to profit by it. It was made more interesting by the questions asked at the conclusion of the article, and it would greatly strengthen one's memory to read it carefully and then answer the questions as asked from the bottom of the page.

I hav a piano, and I play a great many pieces.

The poem in the Youth's Companion, "After The Concert," written by J. T. Trowbridge in honor of the young pianist, Josef Hofman, is a beautiful creation in verse. I will append a verse or two of it, as all the readers of the paper may not hav read it, if they are not readers of the Youth's Companion. It is all so prettily and beautifully written that I can hardly choose from the poem, it is so lovely:

A prodigy of youthful years!
What soul-entrancing melodies
Rained on us from seraphic spheres,
When his small fingers swept the keys!

They leaped, they flew, they flashed through all
The turbulent chords; or dropped in play
As carelessly as petals fall
From cherry-boughs in breezy May.

With much love to the Children's Corner, I remain, Your friend,

FANNY BURNEY MORRISON.

WONEWOC, WIS., Feb. 25, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Seeing you were so kind as to print my first letter, I will try and pen a few lines for the Corner again. Last week was examination week. In arithmetic I stood 42. Arithmetic is very hard for me, but I do the best I can. In language 96, geography 75, spelling 92, reading 80. I am going home after my school is out in June. I hav two brothers and two sisters; one little sister I hav never seen only in her picture, and I do not know what her name is yet. So you may know I will be glad to go home. I hav been away a year in May. Maybe I will come back when my school begins again in September. They hav a good graded school here. I would like to belong to the Speak No Evil Society. I would like to know more about it. I will send you "A Little Girl's Logic." I think it good enough for the Corner. My love to you, and good wishes to those who write for the Corner.

EVA M. HALL.

[The "Little Girl's Logic" has not been received.—ED. C. C.]

J. R. PERRY writes that he has read "All In a Lifetime" for the second time with increased interest and approbation. Of the stories in "Apples of Gold" he says: "They contain a lofty moral tone well calculated to please and instruct at the same time. Taken altogether, the volume is a valuable book that should be read and studied by the youth of our land, and should be found in every library."

OF the cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER, J. H. Paine writes: "They are just splendid, and are doing much to lead the mind from a belief in the old Jew Jehovah as being the true God, or author of this and all other worlds. A picture will catch the eye and set one thinking many times more quickly than pages of printed argument."

Profane Jokes.

On the way he inquired: "Mamma, does God make skunks?" "Why, yes, Eddie, I suppose he does," was the hesitating answer. Eddie, after a moment's thought: "Well, if he got a good sniff at one once, I'll bet he'd never make another."

A little girl lately arrived from the East wanted to amuse herself sewing one Sunday. He aunt objected, saying it was the Lord's day. "Why, auntie," said the child, "the Lord can't see me; I'm in California."

There is a teacher in the St. Paul public schools who will hereafter be very careful about asking her pupils scriptural conundrums. She said to them the other day: "Noah had three sons, Japhet, Ham, and Shem. Who was their father?" The children, suspecting a catch, replied variously. One answered Ham, another Japhet, and a third Shem. Finally a precocious little boy shut them all up by inquiring: "Who did Noah suspect?"

A story was told by Judge W. M. Weaver, of Greensboro, illustrativ of the strict construction children sometimes put upon remarks from the pulpit. The judge's little granddaughter, Margie Burke, recently received a large doll as a present. She was delighted with the gift, and named the doll "Gesie," after the donor. Measles broke out in the community, and the little one said her Gesie had the measles, too. On the Sabbath the little one went with her uncle to church, the two taking a seat directly in front of and near to the pulpit. The preacher warmed to his theme and spoke with much earnestness. At last, pointing with his index finger and looking straight toward the little girl, he asked, impressivly, "How stands it with you and Jesus?" Quick as thought she answered, in a clear voice, heard throughout the house, "I am very well, I thank you, but Gesie's got the measles!"—The Freethinker.

A LITTLE four-year-old girl, who had questioned her mother as to the omnipresence of God, was left recently to show her bravery by going to sleep alone. Presently she called out in a frightened voice, "Oh! mamma, mamma, come quick and see to God—he's getting into my bed." The mother hurried to the chamber to find the cause of alarm, and discovered the kitten of a neighbor, which had found its way into the house and climbed up beside the little one.

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

That Badger Boy at Sunday-School.

THE LESSON OF CAIN AND ABEL.

The teacher had read the tragical story of Cain and Abel, when that boy James, with his talking tacks aboard, luffed into the wind of interrogation, so to speak, as follows:

"Please, mum, why didn't God tell Cain he didn't like the smell of roast pertaters, but liked roast lam', then Cain could a swiped one o' Abel's lam's and pleased the Lord, and wouldn't got mad with Abel and slugged him dead?"

"My dear boy [remembering James's taffy], that we shall never know; and we must never ask."

"Well, 'twarn't no fair shakes to go back on Cain's pertaters, anyhow, mum."

"We mustn't criticise the Lord's acts, James; that is very wicked."

"What's cricketize, mum?"

"You wouldn't understand, James, if I told you. Now be a good boy."

"Yes'm. Why didn't God knock Cain out when he come up to slug Abel, mum?"

"Because, James, he made man a free agent, to act as he saw fit, and take the consequences."

"Men ain't free agents now, is they, mum?"

"Oh, yes, dear. All men are free agents."

"Huh! I guess not, mum. There was a book agent and a lightnin' rod agent at our house yesterday——"

"Oh, that's another thing entirely, James. Let me explain. Now, you can whistle or not, can't you?"

"Yes'm" (whistles).

"Sh! sh! don't do that again, dear. But you was a free agent—understand?"

"'Cos I whistled for nothin', mum?"

"No, no, child; because you chose to."

"Oh! Why didn't God hang Cain, mum?"

"Because he chose to let him liv and bear his load of remorse, James."

"What's remorse, mum?"

"Oh, it's a horrid, awful feeling, James, when you've done wrong."

"Is it wrong to hook mince pie, mum?"

"Why, certainly, James; just as wrong as to hook, as you call it, a turkey."

"Guess I had remorse, then, mum, 'cos I swiped half a mince pie out of the pantry t'other day, and had an offle horrid feelin' in my stummack."

"I'm afraid there was more indigestion than remorse in your stomach, James."

"What's ingestion, mum?"

"Dear me, James! you make me tired. And now, children, remember Cain, and never raise your hands in anger against one another."

"Please, mum, didn't God know where Abel was lyin' knocked out?"

"Of course he did, James; but you mustn't ask questions in such a slangy way."

"Then what made him ask Cain where Abel was, mum?"

"Oh, I don't know, James, I'm sure. Perhaps he wanted to see if Cain would tell the truth."

"If you had a boy, mum, would you call him Cain?"

"James Badger, you are too ridiculous! Now, don't ask any more foolish questions, or I shan't like you."

"No'm. What's raisin' Cain, mum?"

"I guess you know. It's what bad boys are always up to—mischief and torment."

"What mark did God put on Cain, mum?—a criss-cross chalk mark?"

"No, he didn't; he made a black man of him; and if you are not careful——"

"Was Cain the fust moke, mum?"

"Moke? I don't know what you mean, boy."

"Niggers, mum. Warn't it offle 'bout 'Squire Bull's dotter 'lopin' with a moke, mum? Would you 'lope with a moke, mum?"

A flood of indignation overwhelmed the teacher, the waves running mountains high, so to speak; but that boy James was there, and cast, not oil, but sweetest honey, on the troubled waters, and the waves that raged were assuaged.

"I know you wouldn't, mum, 'cos you's too nice and hansome!" This was the taffy that stilled the storm.

"Of course I wouldn't, James. It would be awful!"

"Yes'm. Was Adam and Eve the only folks in the world, mum, 'fore Cain and Abel?"

"Yes, dear; the only pair in the world."

"When Cain done for Abel, then there was only three folks in the world, eh, mum?"

"That's all, James."

"Then how did Cain git a wife in the land of Nod, mum?"

"Well—er—that's one of the—er—mysteries we mustn't ask about, James."

"Why not, mum?"

"Because we mustn't, and that's all there is about it."

"Is Minister Cain any relation of the Cain in the Bible, mum?"

"I should hope not, you inquisitiv little weasel, you. Minister Cain is a dear, good man of God, boy."

"Are you mashed on him, mum? Pop says all the old maids is dead stuck on the sky-pilot, mum."

"You James Badger—you miserable, outrageous boy—you go home right away!"

"No'm—please; I'll be good—It's a corker, ain't it, mum, how Cain got his wife?"

"You wretch—you wicked little wretch—I thought you was going to be good!"

"I be, mum. I'm sure that wasn't wicked. Please, mum, did God make man in his own image?"

"Yes, you boy. That was in the last lesson."

"I know, mum. Was God round-shouldered, squint-eyed, bow-legged, and a wart on his nose, mum?"

It was evident, from the teacher's flushed physiognomy, that James had stepped upon dangerous ground, even upon the brink of a volcano. Her face flushed and paled, her eyes glared, her nose twitched, her teeth set, and her lips quivered; but yet she mastered herself (yearning for more taffy, perhaps), and responded:

"You are dreadful, James; but I don't think you really mean to be. No, my dear, God is nothing like as you ask, but is perfect in every way—perfection itself, James."

"Then he didn't make your pop in his image, did he, mum?"

The tigress and the teacher were one again. Her fingers became claws, and she clutched at the shock-haired, shock-producing youth, as the harpy eagle of finance, Jay Gould, clutches at stray railroads and telegraphs, but not so successfully, the lissome youth avoiding her and retiring with hair intact, the Cain and Abel séance ending then and there.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.
The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

THE STRUGGLE FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

Hindoo Virgin and Child.

The worship of the "Holy Virgin," the "Queen of Heaven," the "Mother of God," etc., which has become one of the grand features of Roman Catholicism, was a tenet of faith for centuries before the virgin now adored was born. In India, they have worshiped for ages, Maha Devi—The Great Goddess—and have temples erected in honor of her. Like her Roman counterpart she is the Goddess with a thousand names. As Devaki, she is the mother of Vishnu, the Preserving god, in the form of Krishna. "The gods, invisible to mortals," says the Vishnu Purana, (p. 502) "celebrated her praise continually from the time that Vishnu was contained in her person." She is represented in Moor's Hindu Pantheon, adorned with jewels, and the infant Saviour at her breast. BIBLE MYTHS shows that nearly all nations of antiquity worshipped a Virgin Mother-Goddess.

THE EXODUS OF ISRAEL.

And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the self-same day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt.—Ex. xii, 41.

Gems of Thought.

REASON cannot oblige us to receive more than reason can prove.—Kant.

Now when Noah had lived three hundred and fifty years after the flood, and all that time happily, he died, having the number of nine hundred and fifty years; but let no one, upon comparing the lives of the ancients with our lives, think that what we hav said of them is false; or make the shortness of our lives at present an argument that neither did they attain to so long a duration of life; for the ancients were beloved of God and were lately made by God himself and because their food was then better for the prolongation of life on account of their virtue and the good use they made of it in astronomical and geometrical discoveries. . . Ephorus and Nicolaus [who were they?] relate that the ancients lived a thousand years. But as to these matters, let everyone look upon them as he thinks fit.—Josephus. [As the London showman said to the children who asked, when looking at a picture of the battle of Waterloo, "Which is Napoleon and which the duke of Wellington?" "Take which you please, my little dears, you pays your money and you takes your choice."—Hylax.]

WE ought to watch and avoid the love of money; for nothing so truly characterizes a narrow, groveling disposition as to love riches; and nothing is more noble and exalted than to despise riches, if you hav them not, and if you hav them to employ them in beneficence and liberality.—Cicero.

GODLINESS with contentment is great gain. For we brought nothing into this world and it is certain we can carry nothing out. . . For the love of money is the root of all evil.—1 Timothy vi, 6-10.

PER CONTRA.

Money, 'tis said, is evil's root,
But justly we may doubt it;
For who can expect good, thriving fruit
From any stock without it? —Anon.

AND when the ass saw the angel of the Lord, she fell down under Balaam, and Balaam's anger was kindled, and he smote the ass with a staff. And the Lord opened the mouth of the ass; and she said unto Balaam: What hav I done unto thee that thou hast smitten me these three times? And Balaam said unto the ass, etc., etc. And the ass said unto Balaam, etc., etc.—Num. xxii, 27-35.

THE miracle by which the dumb ass was enabled to speak with a man's voice has been the frequent subject of cavil and ridicule with unthinking men; but when we consider that the power of God alone gave to any of his creatures the faculty of speech, and might as easily hav given it to the brute as to the human race, we need not wonder that he should—in a single case and for a specific purpose—confer that power on a dumb animal. Certainly we must admit, etc.—Bible Cyclopedia, by John Eadie, D.D., LL.D., etc. [NOTE.—To think of a professor of divinity writing such a lame and impotent apology for such a miracle, at this time of day, and that the learned man was the contemporary of J. S. Mill, of Herbert Spencer, of Charles Darwin, and of T.H. Huxley, is enough to sicken a dog. and to make us despair of the progress, if not of the sanity, of mankind; but we will not despair. Let the Eadies of divinity play their fantastic tricks as they will, to please the groundlings of orthodoxy. It is simply another illustration of what was said of old—"And they took the money and did as they were taught." The day of Dr. Eadie and all his numerous gang of asses is about over. They must decrease, while the school of thinkers must increase. Who's afraid?—Hylax.]

THOUGH we readily reject any fact which is unusual and incredible in an ordinary degree; yet, in advancing further, the mind observes not always the same rule; but when anything is affirmed utterly absurd and miraculous [and if the story of Balaam and his ass does not come under this head, the words "absurd and miraculous" are without meaning], it rather the more readily admits of such a fact, upon account of that very circumstance which ought to destroy all its authority.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

IT is a standing argument with Christians in favor of the divine approval which their system of religion has received, that it has spread so largely over the world, and that so many millions of human beings hav embraced it. According to this criterion Christianity is no more divine than Mohammedanism or Brahmanism, and far less so than Buddhism. The last two systems named existed many centuries before Christianity commenced, and hav each had far more followers. Of Buddhists alone, it is estimated they hav reached a number ten times as great as all the Christians who hav lived. To-day there are held to be 400,000,000 Buddhists in the world—three times as many as Christians can truthfully claim. If numbers are the test of the divinity and truth of the various systems of the world's great religions, Christianity will hav to stand about fourth in the scale.—D. M. Bennett.

Odds and Ends.

MOTTO for an Arab tribe: "Up and Bedouin."

DON'T mind his gibberish and haggard look. He's just begun to study Volapuk.

THERE is probably but one thing which is harder to do than get out of a warm bed in the morning, and that is to get into a cold bed at night.

A PIOUS pork-packer of Chicago has on one wall of his office this motto: "Trust in the Lard," and on the other this one: "The Lard Will Provide."

"NATURE," said a philosopher, "is full of wise provisions." He doubtless referred to potatoes, beets, and other vegetables, and not to mince-pie and welsh rarebits.

IN her remarks to Parliament the queen started off, "My lords and gentlemen." Even the queen is beginning to see that there is a distinction between her lords and gentlemen.

THE arrest of the Grand Army men who were accompanying a corpse to its last resting-place, with appropriate dirges, was due to the laws against music and bier. That law must go.

"MY errand here to-night," said a young lawyer to a damsel on whom he had called, "reminds me of the cry of an owl." "Indeed!" said the maiden; "what is your errand here to-night?" "Courtship. To wit, to woo."

TOBACCONIST customer: "The figure of the Indian is all right, and very true to nature, but I don't understand why you put that bottle of rum in his hand." Sign sculptor: "Reckon you've never seen a live Injun, boss."

MRS. BIGGINS: "Ah, Mrs. Stiggins, it's not every woman who has a husband like yours. They say he is very indulgent." Mrs. Stiggins: "There! I told Joshua that if he kept on indulging on the sly somebody would find it out."

A HEALTH writer says, "The washtub is an excellent gymnasium." But will our young ladies tackle kindly to it? As Mr. Bacon says in Shakspere's works; "Aye, there's the rub." And it is the "rub" that makes the washtub unpopular as a gymnasium.

UNCLE 'RASTUS: 'Why does dey put 'In God we-all trust' on a two-cent piece, and doesn't put it on dese yere ten-dollar bills, Sambo—does yer know?" Sambo: "I dunno, chile; but I 'spects it's cause yer don' hab to ask no one fer trus' when yer hab ten dollars."

ST. PETER (to applicant): "You say you were an editorial writer on a New York newspaper?" Applicant: "Yes, sir." St. Peter: "Step into the elevator, please." Applicant (stepping into the elevator): "How soon does it go up?" St. Peter: "It doesn't go up, it goes down."

"WE wish," says a Colorado editor, "to retract our statement, made last week, that our esteemed fellow-citizen, Hon. Mr. Plumley, never was known to keep his promis. After reading the item in question, Mr. Plumley happened to remember that during the heat of the recent political contest he promised to kick us out to the fair grounds, and he immediately came up to the office and executed his promis. In fact, he has not only kicked us all the way out there, but kept it up most of the way back; and if he had not run out of breath, we think he would hav been kicking us yet. Mr. Plumley is a gentleman of his word, cultured and polished, and can talk like an Asiatic elephant."

BEFORE the wedding day he vows and protests that his dearest care will be her happiness, and that there is no sacrifice too great for him to make to secure her comfort. Three months after they are married she has to tack the blankets to the side of the bed to keep him from rolling himself up in all the clothes.

THE Rev. Mr. Alban Cope (dining, quite en famille, of course, at Mrs. Remington de Koi's): "Duck, Miss Angellique, at this season? And you one of the most devoted of our little flock——" Remington de Koi, Jr. (coming gallantly to his sister's defense): "That's all right, sir—Angie's all right. Law was up in Chautauqua county February first, but it's open season everywhere else until May. I'm a Gun-and-Rod man myself, sir, and I wouldn't hav anything crooked at the governor's table for worlds, I assure you."

"THE wife for me," he said, "is the old-fashioned girl—the girl who makes a good house-wife—who has been brought up to sew and to cook and to wash and to iron—the kind of girl that they used to hav before girls went in for fashionable flummery and accomplishments and things." "Yes," said she; "I understand. Well, my ideal of a husband is also of the old-fashioned sort. I want one who will shovel snow, put in coal, split kindlings, put up stoves, dig garden-beds, beat carpets—and do all the things that husbands used to before they went in for silk hats and clubs and four-in-hands and things." There was a thick, glutinous silence for a few moments, while he pondered deeply and broadly. "I wonder," he said at last, "exactly how much of ass I am." "I wonder," she echoed, with a speculativ expression in her eyes.

DAKOTA man (in Boston): "I hav just received a letter from a friend in Blizzardville asking me to engage a school-teacher, and I thought perhaps you——" Boston girl (haughtily): "That will do, sir. Do you suppose any woman of culture and refinement would consent to leave Boston?" "Blizzardville is a lively place in summer." "Thermometer goes to twenty below zero in winter, I suppose." "Yes, in nice weather it gets up to twenty below quite often after Christmas." "'Get's up!' Good, very good—delightful prospect! And no theaters, operas, concerts, or lectures the whole year round?" "Well, Deacon Lunkhead generally gives us a little lecture at the Friday evening prayer meeting." "And you think any woman in her senses will consent to bury herself in such a place? What became of the school-teacher you had before? Did she freeze to death or commit suicide?" "No, indeed. She got married. They get married off so fast we can't keep our schools open." "Oh! The poor little children mustn't be allowed to grow up in ignorance. I'll go."

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 15. No. 12. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY. { New York, Saturday, March 24, 1888. } 28 LAFAYETTE PL. } $3.00 per year.

BUBBLE-BLOWING.—A RELIGIOUS OBJECT-LESSON.

Notes and Clippings.

THE oldest inhabitant of New York has to keep still now. The youngest inhabitant who could get outdoors last week knows just as much about snowstorms in this city as he does.

IN order to cure whooping cough in Warwickshire village, Eng., they cut a piece of hair from the nape of the child's neck, chop it very fine, and spread it on a piece of bread and giv it to a dog. Warwickshire is inhabited by Christians.

HYPOCRISY in the pulpit is thus explained by a deacon who was criticising his pastor: "The trouble is not that our minister isn't orthodox, or that he isn't earnest, but when he is earnest he isn't orthodox, and when he is orthodox he isn't earnest."

MUCH of the so called ivory now in use is simply potato. A good, sound potato washed in diluted sulphuric acid, then boiled in the same solution, and then slowly dried, is all ready to be turned into buttons, poker chips, and innumerable other things that ivory was used for once upon a time.

AT Cottam, a small town across the river from Detroit, the choir of the Methodist Episcopal church undertook to raise money by dramatic and musical performances. The first night was a success, but the minister then attempted to prevent the ladies from going on the stage again, and because they refused to obey him he preached a sermon on Sunday in which he denounced the performances. He threatened to refuse the sacrament to any who took part in or attended the next entertainment. The choir refused to sing the closing hymn, and say they will not sing for the pastor any more. The society is rent in twain.

THE strikers of Galesburg, Ill., hav issued a circular at the close of which they call on the friends of the Rev. J. D. Wyckoff, a clergyman of that city, to boycott him because he wrote an article condemning the despotic tendency of labor organizations.

A MONTREAL newspaper says that a citizen who had agreed to lease a certain house on University street was considerably surprised when he came to sign the lease to find that a clause had been inserted forbidding him to play the piano, play cards, or open the windows on Sunday. He didn't sign.

WRITING of American converts, the Michigan Catholic remarks that priests throughout the United States are receiving into the church every year, quietly and without any heralding, a greater number of Protestants than all the proselytes their foreign missionary societies, with large expenditure and much noise, are able to make.

A MAN in Germany has at last found a useful purpose which ministers may subserve. Sausages, cooked or half raw, highly spiced, are an essential of German cookery. In order to prevent the Germans from exposing themselvs to a number of bad diseases incidental to pork, the authorities insist upon the pigs being examined before being offered for sale. A peasant was arrested for evading this law, and upon being asked to explain, said that he had a most accurate method of determining the soundness of pork. The pastor of the district was always hungry, so the peasant always sent him the first sausage made from each pig slaughtered, and a week later called to inquire his health. If it was all right the pork went to the market, and examination fees were saved.

MAYOR HEWITT refused to allow the Irish flag to float from the city hall on the 17th—St. Patrick's day. Mr. Hewitt is an American, and level-headed. What business has the municipality of New York to celebrate the memory of a Roman Catholic saint, who may hav lived fifteen hundred years ago, or who may never hav lived at all?

H. O. PENTECOST hits his brethren like this: "Hear ministers talking among themselvs, and you will find few of them who believe what they preach. They hav become habituated to the transparent subterfuges of the pulpit. But heresy is expensiv. The orthodox minister is paid very well; his position in society is assured; his prospects are exceedingly bright, so long as he conforms to the religious opinions of his day." Mr. Pentecost probably knows. He was a heretic for a long while before he left the church.

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON has returned from Europe to preside over the International Congress of Women to be held in Washington this month. In London Mrs. Stanton was honored with a farewell reception tendered by her countrywoman, the American poet, Mrs. Zadel Barnes Gustafson, at her residence, 30 Cromwell Grove. A distinguished gathering represented literary and artistic London. Among those present were the Rev. and Venerable Dr. James Martineau, Mr. Rider Haggard and Mrs. Haggard, Mrs. E. Lynn Linton (the novelist), Mrs. George H. Riddell, Bret Harte, Andrew Lang, Oscar Wilde and Mrs. Wilde, Mr. and Mrs. Holman Hunt, Miss Mary Anderson, Wilson Barrett and Miss Eastlake, Felix and Mme. Moscheles, Oakey Hall, T. P. O'Connor, Mme. Kate Thayer, Mrs. Margaret Bright Lucas, Walter Crane and wife, and Mrs. Alexander Hector. Mrs. Gustafson, her countrywoman, sailed on the Aller with Mrs. Stanton, to represent Great Britain as delegate from the executiv committee of the British Women's Temperance Association and the Peace Association of Great Britain.

"WE are compelled to apologize to some of our readers," says the editor of the Arcola (Kan.) Triumph, in a recent issue of that journal, "for the absence of our regular column of religious news in this week's paper. But yesterday afternoon, just before going to press, the gentleman who has charge of that department came into our new office over Cy Fairfield's place with as elegant a jag as we ever saw. He insulted everybody about, from the proprietor to the devil, and finally turned his dirty attention to our wife, who had come down to visit us in our new quarters, and with whom, it seems, he had some previous acquaintance. When we got through with him some of the boys carried him over to Girk Hartmeyer's shop, and he's lying there now. We trust to be on deck again with religious news all right next week, and in the mean time would announce that there will be regular services this evening at the Methodist Episcopal chapel on Mansion avenue. Rev. Edward Ashley will preach, while Miss Kit Larrabee will preside at the organ."

A Revenue Tariff.

Of the various questions now agitating the public mind, perhaps there is none of more importance than the proposed revision of the tariff. It presents an issue on which the two great political parties of the nation hav already taken sides, and on which the coming presidential campaign is to be fought; and as the welfare and prosperity of the whole people are to be greatly promoted or seriously injured by the decision soon to be made, it is highly essential that the question should receive a full and exhaustiv discussion, in order that the people may be enabled to vote intelligently thereon. While I do not profess to hav mastered the vast subject in all its details, I venture to offer a few suggestions which I hope will be of some value to those who are interested therein. I wish to consider the matter not as a partisan, but as an independent citizen, whose only desire is to arrive at the truth, and to hav such a measure enacted as will best promote the welfare and happiness of the people.

The first question presented for consideration is, What is the primary object and meaning of a tariff? Is it designed for raising a revenue to pay the expenses of the government or for protecting the home manufacturer against the competition of his foreign rivals? Upon this question there has been a difference of opinion among our most eminent statesmen and jurists, and many ingenious arguments hav been advanced on both sides. Neither my time nor space will permit me to present these arguments in detail; but I will remark that both objects cannot hav been contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, because they are mutually inconsistent with each other—as a tariff framed solely for protection can yield little or no revenue to the government, and a tariff designed exclusivly for revenue can afford little or no protection to the manufacturer. There can be no revenue to the government except as foreign goods are allowed to come into the country, and there can be no protection to the manufacturer except as they are excluded therefrom. So far as I know, it has never been claimed that protection is the sole purpose for which the authority to levy a tariff upon foreign importations was conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. On the contrary, it seems to be universally conceded that revenue is the primary end sought to be accomplished thereby, and that protection is only of secondary importance. It is reasonable to suppose that if the framers of the Constitution had intended to confer upon Congress the power to establish a purely protectiv tariff, they would hav made a clear and explicit provision to that effect, thereby removing all doubts as to their meaning, instead of leaving the same to be discovered by inference or implication. So far from thinking that such a policy was contemplated by them, I hav abundant reason to believe that revenue was the principal, if not the sole, object which they had in view; and that if protection was thought of at all, it was considered as only of minor importance. My construction of the Constitution is that taxation is only justifiable for public purposes in which all citizens are equally interested, rather than for the benefit of individuals, or to aid private enterprises, however worthy they may be; and I am happy to state that this construction has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States at the October term, 1874, in a case entitled, Loan Association vs. Topeka, reported in 20 Wallace's Reports, page 655; and here I will quote from page 664 a few sentences from their opinion:

> We hav established, we think, beyond cavil that there can be no lawful tax which is not laid for a public purpose. . . .
> To lay with one hand the power of the government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation.

There are only two provisions of the Constitution under which power to establish a protectiv tariff is claimed; and these are the 1st and the 3rd clauses of Section 8 of Article I. Let us consider these clauses in the order therein mentioned. The first one reads as follows: "The Congress shall hav power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Perhaps there is no part of the Constitution which has given rise to more controversy than this clause. It has been contended on the one hand that it authorizes Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, and also to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. In other words, it is asserted that two distinct and independent powers are here granted instead of one. On the other hand, it is held that the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, is to be exercised only for the purpose of paying the debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare; that is to say, the latter words confer no additional authority, but are used simply to qualify or to limit the former; and instead of two distinct powers only one is herein granted. Which of these two constructions appears to be the more reasonable? If the former be correct, there is no limitation whatever to the power of Congress on the subject of taxation, and they hav ample discretion to levy a tax for any purpose that in their judgment may appear desirable, and there is absolutely no means by which the people may protect themselvs from being completely impoverished and ruined by excessiv taxation. Can it be possible that the makers of the Constitution intended to confer such an extraordinary prerogativ as this upon the Congress of the United States? On the contrary, is it not far more reasonable to believe that they designed to restrict taxation to the specific purpose of raising a revenue for paying the legitimate expenses of the government? Perhaps there is no authority ever exercised by human governments more liable to abuse than that of taxation, and for this reason there is none which should be more carefully guarded and kept within reasonable bounds. We are, therefore, compelled to accept the latter of the two constructions above given, and to consider the power in question as limited to the payment of the debts, and provision for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

It has been said that even if this construction of the Constitution be the true one, the power to enact a protectiv tariff is included under the words, "To provide for the common defense and general welfare." It must be shown conclusivly that a protectiv tariff does actually promote the general welfare of the country, and that it only can do so, before we are willing to concede that it alone is authorized by the words in question. How can the total wealth of a nation be increased by a law which simply takes a part of that wealth from one portion of its inhabitants and bestows it upon the remainder? For this is exactly what a protectiv tariff actually does, and if made prohibitory is all that it can do. It does not, and cannot, increase the amount of capital invested in business; and it creates nothing but a disturbance. We challenge the students of history to show that any nation on the globe has ever been made wealthy or prosperous simply by taxing its people. As well might it be said that a person may be made strong and healthy by frequent bleeding, as that a nation may become rich and powerful by excessiv taxation. On the contrary, the commercial prosperity of every people is the greatest where the taxes are the lowest, other things being equal, where all classes receive full compensation for their labor or their services, and where unjust discriminations between the citizens are utterly unknown. There is just as good, if not better, reason to believe that the general welfare may be as well secured under free trade as under protection; and if this be true the language here used may be construed to favor the former system as well as the latter. We contend, therefore, that a protectiv tariff is not necessarily the only one contemplated by this clause of the Constitution, but that if a strictly revenue tariff is found to be as well calculated to promote the general welfare, it is equally authorized thereby.

The second clause under which the power to enact a protectiv tariff is claimed, reads as follows: "The Congress shall hav power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes." Whether this be true or not depends entirely upon the meaning of the word "regulate." The definition of it given by Webster, in his Unabridged Dictionary, is, "To adjust by rule, method, or established mode; to direct by rule or restriction; to subject to governing principles or laws;" and it is fair to presume that the word was used by the framers of the Constitution in its ordinary signification. Nothing is said in that instrument as to the purpose for which this power should be exercised; but it is reasonable to suppose that it was intended to be used in such a manner as to promote or to preserve commerce, rather than to obstruct or to destroy it. Such certainly cannot be the meaning of the words "to regulate;" and yet the present tariff has done more than all other causes combined to check and to injure our commerce with other nations. This it has done in two ways; first, by diminishing both imports and exports, thereby decreasing the demand for ships, and secondly, by taxing many of the materials entering into their construction, thereby making it impossible for our shipbuilders to compete successfully with their foreign rivals; so that at the present time our carrying trade is so small that the American flag is scarcely seen on the ocean; and our limited exports are carried almost exclusivly in foreign vessels. Thus one immense industry of our people has been greatly injured, if not totally annihilated, simply to aid or to protect another. I cannot believe that the power to regulate commerce was intended to hav such an effect as this; and if a protectiv tariff operates in this manner, I contend that it is not authorized by the clause in question.

Whatever may be the true construction of the Constitution on this question, I do not hesitate to declare my profound conviction that a purely protectiv tariff is an injustice and a hardship; and that this is true may be made evident by a single illustration. Let us suppose that an American citizen wants some cloth for a coat, and finding that English cloth is better and cheaper than American, desires to purchase the same. This he could easily do if trade were absolutely free, by paying, let us say, the price of $1 per yard after it has been imported into this country. He finds American cloth of inferior quality selling at $1.50 per yard. Now, in order to prevent him from buying the superior English cloth, and to compel him to purchase the inferior American, the government adds to the price of the former the sum of sixty cents per yard as a duty, which being more than he is able to pay, he takes the latter instead. Now, the party who has received the principal benefit from this arbitrary arrangement is the American manufacturer; as he has been enabled to sell an inferior article at a price that he otherwise could not hav obtained; and the consumer has been directly taxed fifty cents per yard for his exclusiv benefit. In this manner a few manufacturers are constantly obtaining an immense sum of money from the many consumers throughout the country. In other words, the many are taxed for the benefit of the few, and the government derives a comparativly small revenue from the transaction. A more arbitrary and unjust law it would be difficult to imagin, and why such a law should continue in force I leave to the protectionist to explain. No government has the right to tax some of its citizens for the benefit of others, but should treat all alike; and this is an utter impossibility under a strictly protectiv tariff, for the very idea of protection necessarily implies partiality between the citizens. It means that some are to be benefited at the expense of others, and a government adopting and enforcing such a policy as this is not worthy of the respect or the allegiance of its citizens. According to the preamble of the Constitution, the first object after the formation of a more perfect union, for which it was ordained, was "to establish justice," and, as I hav just shown that a protectiv tariff is the quintessence of injustice, I fail to understand how such a tariff can be in accordance with the Constitution.

But it is urged as a reason for a protectiv tariff that it enables the nation adopting it to become independent of other nations. This assumes that this independence is desirable, and a great advantage to the country securing it, but we see no good reason for this assumption. As no human being in a civilized society is or can be absolutely independent of his fellows, so no country in the world can be absolutely independent of all other countries. As the welfare of all men is promoted by a mutual exchange of their several services and productions, so all nations are likewise benefited by a free commerce in their respectiv products. Every country possesses some particular advantage over every other country in certain industries, and where trade is free each one produces those things for which it is best adapted, and the free exchange of their products is for the mutual advantage of all. For instance, France produces excellent silk at a moderate price; but as England has no good soil for the growth of mulberry trees, on which silk-worms feed, she cannot produce a superior quality of silk, and no legislation of either country can alter these facts. England, however, produces the best of cutlery, and, therefore, it is for the mutual benefit of both nations that, at least so far as these articles are concerned, trade should be absolutely free between them. If each country were compelled to produce its own silk and cutlery, England would possess some very dear and inferior silk, and France would possess some very dear and inferior cutlery. Both nations would suffer a loss, and only the protected manufacturers in each would be gainers by a protectiv system.

It is also asserted that a protectiv tariff by raising the price of our manufactured articles enables the manufacturer to pay higher wages to his employees than he otherwise could, and that therefore the laboring man is greatly benefited thereby. If it be true that the American operativ does receive higher wages under the protectiv system than under free trade, it does not not follow that he is benefited thereby, unless it can be shown that his cost of living is not correspondingly increased. It is no advantage to any man to hav his wages doubled if, at the same time, his expenses are also doubled. Now, as the price of nearly every article which he is obliged to use is increased by the protectiv tariff, the additional tax which he is compelled to pay is equal to, and in many instances greater than, the increase of wages which he is paid under protection; and consequently he receives no corresponding benefit therefrom. Besides that, the rate of wages does not depend wholly upon the tariff, but principally upon the law of supply and demand. Every man who employs labor seeks to do so at the lowest possible cost; and, although the advocates of protection profess to be greatly interested in the welfare of the laborer, we hav never heard of a single instance in which the manufacturer has paid him a higher price for his labor than he was absolutely obliged to pay. If these professions of love for the workingman are sincere, why do not these wealthy capitalists adopt the system of profit-sharing, instead of paying him the lowest wages for which he is able to work? Such a course would be far more consistent with these professions of regard for his welfare than the policy at present pursued by them.

Again, we fail to see how the workingman is protected under the present system, while there is nothing to prevent the manufacturer from discharging all his help at any time and filling their places with the so-called pauper labor of foreign countries, the law against importing labor under contract being practically inoperativ and ineffectual. If there were a provision in our present tariff against the importation of foreign labor, there would be some color of truth in the claim that American operativs are protected thereby; but the simple fact is that the manufacturer supplements his pretended protection by importing the cheap labor of Europe, thus producing a competition which lowers the wages of the unprotected workman below what they could be under the most absolute free trade. Thus the claim that our working classes are benefited by a protectiv tariff turns out, on examination, to be wholly fallacious, and is no longer worthy of serious consideration.

A protectiv tariff works a decided injury to the whole country; for while it secures to our manufacturers the home market, they are restricted to it alone, and are thus shut out from the markets of the world. There was a time in our history when our ax manufacturers exported their products to nearly every country on the globe; but now the excessiv duty laid on some of their raw materials and the materials used in the construction of their machinery, renders it impossible for them to compete successfully with foreign manufacturers; and they are undersold in all other nations; and their trade is limited simply to the United States. Thus, while they are enabled to obtain a higher price for their goods at home than they otherwise could, this gain is more than counterbalanced by the loss of the profits which they might receive if trade were absolutely free, so that they could supply the markets of the world. And what is true of this branch of industry is equally true of many others. In this manner the prosperity of the country is injured far more than it is benefited; and such will continue to be the case so long as this policy prevails.

Before leaving the subject, there is one other reason for the abolition of the so-called protectiv system which I will present, and which I consider of more importance than any above mentioned; and that is that such a policy is entirely beyond the legitimate scope and function of government. If all that has been said in its favor were absolutely true, we would still oppose it, because we do not consider it the duty of government to aid its citizens in conducting their business. The primary, if not the sole, object for which governments are instituted among men is to administer justice to the citizen, to secure to each one the full enjoyment of his natural rights, and to prevent one person from encroaching upon the rights of another. The purpose for which people willingly submit to taxation for the support of government is that they may be made secure in the enjoyment of their personal liberty. Although I am a citizen of the United States, I am also a citizen of the world; and my relations to my fellow-man across the ocean are the same as my relations to my next-door neighbor, and consequently my right to trade with the former is just as sacred as my right to trade with the latter. If this be true, the government under which I liv has no just power to deprive me of that right, or to throw any obstacle in the way of its exercise; and whenever it does so, it reverses its function and itself becomes an aggressor. Thus it appears that all laws which hav for their object the restriction of trade are direct infringements upon the liberty of the individual, and are wholly inconsistent with the purpose for which our government was ordained and established.

For these and other reasons which need not be mentioned here, I am in favor of the immediate repeal of the present protectiv tariff, and the enactment in its place of a tariff so adjusted as to yield a revenue sufficient to pay the expenses of the government economically administered, the interest on the public debt and the principal thereof as it becomes due, and such pensions as hav been or may be hereafter granted. I also favor the immediate abolition of the internal revenue system, as it is altogether unnecessary and a heavy burden upon the industry of the people. After the adoption of these desirable measures, the enormous sum of money now withdrawn from circulation and hoarded in the treasury of the United States might and would be utilized in carrying on the business of the country, and the vast army of idle men in all our cities could be speedily employed at remunerativ wages. Nor do I see how any disastrous results can follow from the proposed legislation; for if the present system be partial and unjust, as I think I hav clearly shown it to be, no permanent good can flow therefrom; but, on the contrary, I contend that the best method of securing the welfare and happiness of the country is to preserve inviolate the rights and the liberties of all our citizens; and this is impossible so long as the protectiv system prevails.

JAMES W. STILLMAN.

Pennsylvania Conventions and Ohio Workers.

After a long, tiresome jolt over that paragon of bad roads, the L. S. & M. S., your correspondent arrived at Girard station on the forenoon of the 24th of January. The day was cold, the station-house was cold, the baggage-master was cold, very cold, as I asked him, in my most persuasiv accents, when the Erie and Pittsburgh train left for Louisville. "Five hours, miss," and he wiped the young and budding icicles from his mustache. Five hours! and only one weary, forlorn passenger with which to while away the time. It looked dubious, but, in sheer desperation, I determined to "face the music," and, marching boldly up to the lady—thanking my stars she was a lady, as I could discuss draperies and plaitings, on a pinch, rather better than the latest Prince Albert style or toothpick-toed pumps—and disclosing my destination, inquired if I was to hav the pleasure of her company during "the wait." She lifted a pair of glorious brown eyes to mine and said, with a smile, that she was going down to report the Linesville Paine celebration. "Aha!" said I to myself, "I'm in luck; I'll get on the right side of the reporter." A few moments' conversation brought out the fact that my new friend was as radical a Liberalist as the country afforded, and as there is always much pleasure in the commerce of kindred ideas, the five hours passed away most agreeably. At Linesville we were met by our good Liberal friend, Mr. E. B. Brooks, who escorted us to the Arnold House, and bade me be ready to greet the audience as soon as possible, since neither of the other speakers had yet arrived.

The evening's address was "Secular Education;" as it has already been printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I need not outline its argument. The audience was as fine an assemblage of intelligent men and women as one often meets, and, perhaps I might add, as sympathetic. Many of them came and shook hands with me, as evidence, I presume, that they held no ill-will against me for punishing them so ruthlessly in the infliction of the address.

The following morning our gifted and merry logician, Charles Watts, arrived, and it was a fine address which the Linesville Liberals heard that morning—finely delivered, and finely received.

The afternoon train brought the delinquent Mr. Darrow, together with Dewitt T. Root, the wide-awake president of the Farmdale Secular Union. Our company had now its full complement, and many were the bright flashes of wit, the scorings of repartee, the quaint stories, and real, earnest thoughts and sentiments exchanged during the remainder of our stay.

Mr. Darrow's lecture on "The Industrial Problem" was unique, and as pleasing as it was unexpected. As an orator Mr. Darrow is at first disappointing; he appears strange, diffident. and slightly awkward, but as he warms to his subject, as ideas begin to glow, and daring thoughts gleam across the dome of the mental firmament like meteors, his strangeness becomes almost grandeur, his diffidence melts into a masterful ease, and as the inexorable logic of facts, the mournful eloquence of pitiful lives, grows up and out of the dark statistics of the crimes and sufferings of poverty, his former lack of grace is lost, his very personality seems sunk into the immeasurable profundity, the limitless hight, of the idea of economic liberty he advocates; he ceases to be a man; he becomes a principle.

The lecture met with the unqualified approval of a large audience. Mr. Watts supplemented the discourse by a few well-timed remarks, calling the attention of his listeners to that higher question upon which the settlement of the industrial problem hinges—namely, the necessity of ridding the world of a divine monopolist before the competitiv system on earth can giv place to a better state.

The following morning the same speaker entertained an attentiv audience by a clear and comprehensiv review of the "Evidences of Christianity."

A short intermission was followed by some witty remarks from Mr. Root, which put the audience in good humor with themselvs, and in a mood to listen to the Paine oration, delivered by your humble servant. Its reception proved that there are many true and noble men and women in the Linesville League who revere and honor that generous man who said, "The world is my country, to do good my religion."

The evening lecture, on "Materialism and Spiritualism," given by Mr. Watts, was marked, as usual, by strong logic, elegant periods, and powerful elocution. The festivities were concluded with a ball, much enjoyed by the young people of Linesville; and the general opinion was that this was one of the pleasantest reunions ever held by the League. Five dollars and fifty cents was donated to the Campaign Fund of the national Union, and the subscription list to Secular Thought added several names from Linesville and vicinity.

The following morning we bade our generous friends good-bye and separated, on various missions bent. Mine was to clamber aboard the Erie and Pittsburgh train and for more than five weary hours watch fleeting skies and clouds and rocks and mining villages, and streams glassed over with Winter's congealing breath, and winding railroads along which a fiery snake now and then dragged its hissing length. Notwithstanding all this jumbled in upon my sight, and a corresponding jumble of ideas in my brain, there was one very well-determined wonderment, withal, which stood out sharply defined against the horizon of my mental vision. This wonderment assumed gigantic proportions as I approached the city of iron and steel and beheld the grimed and sooted chimneys of monster furnaces standing out like swarthy Vulcans before a giant forge. This wonderment was not poetical, nor profoundly logical, nor was it in regard to anything I hav heretofore mentioned very relevant; but, considering the fact that I had eaten nothing since the evening previous, and God never sheds manna upon the unbeliever, it was nevertheless important. I was hungry, and I wondered whether Pittsburgh people ate dinner in the middle of the afternoon. This thought was in my mind as I stepped upon the plaform at the Union depot, and looked anxiously about for a tall gentleman with a plug hat and long whiskers whom I had last seen at the Chicago Congress. Alas! there were plenty of tall gentlemen, but either the hat or the whiskers, or both, were missing, and the tide of humanity continued to surge around and past me as the swirl of waters on our lakes breaks, and parts, and rushes past a sand-bar on an island.

I consulted a hackman, and, having made my bargain with him before starting, settled down among my valises with an unswerving resolution to storm the fates if need be, but that I would find the fort of liberty garrisoned by the Pittsburgh Secular Union.

Regarding the Paine celebration I need say nothing, as Mr. Barker has already described it better than I am able to do; but of the Pittsburgh Secular Union let me say that I never met a nobler or more generous band of earnest men and women, devoting themselvs with the high enthusiasm of a glorious purpose to that end for which we all are struggling: the complete emancipation of mankind from mental slavery. Persecuted by the remorseless bigotry of Presbyterianism from its very birth, maligned by a subsidized press, misrepresented, misconstrued, misunderstood, it has, with the dauntless courage born of its very sense of right, born of the indomitable desire to overthrow the tyranny of church and state union, born of its glowing, daring, irresistible principle of liberty that will not down, fought the hard battle with a faithfulness that should put to blush those pusillanimous Liberals, of which "the woods are full," who for the fawning flatteries of society eschew their principles, and kiss the popish toe of Solomon's amour! Not one coward in their ranks! Every gunner stands to his piece, every bayonet flashes back the burnished glory of the sun of Freethought, every soldier stands ready to defend his fort, and high over all floats the fair banner of the free—the flag of truth—not one spot upon its folds, that stream out on the breeze so purely. And there may they gleam forever, kissed by the stars and bathed in the sunshine!

During the week following the Paine celebration I visited the Alleghany penitentiary, where 690 men were wearing prison stripes and working at prison tasks. We were shown through the various departments, the clock-work regularity and oppressiv stillness of the place reminding me strongly of the long, tedious years I myself once spent in worse than prison walls. Many of the inmates were engaged in picking oakum, cleaning it, and weaving it into mats; others in tending to the culinary department, and others still watching the huge engins. On visiting the library I glanced through the catalog of books, and, though the list was in some departments excellent, I failed to find any of the advanced works upon new lines of thought. No Darwins, Spencers, or Ingersolls, but plenty of Christs, Gods, and Bibles. The institution is well provided with church accommodations, as there are two chapels, one Presbyterian, the other Catholic. On inquiring if attendance was compulsory, the keeper informed me that it was not, and added nonchalantly, "This chapel [Catholic] is always crowded; you know those who fill these institutions are mostly Catholics"—a remark which I did not fail to utilize in my Sunday lecture on "Convent Life Unveiled." A packed house greeted me, it being the largest meeting the Secular Society has had in three years. Numbers of "good Catholics" were sitting in the best seats, and, with a sovereign contempt for good manners, would hav allowed our Secular ladies to stand, had not the real gentlemen of the society practiced the virtue of courtesy—one on which Christianity was supposed to hav a patent-right, but which evidently ran out some time ago. These minions of the pope were not overly pleased, I fancy, with the discourse; in fact, it was not delivered with that intention, and, to be honest, if it really hurt their pious beliefs in the virtues of mummeries, if it really shocked them to see the veil of Catholic hypocrisy torn asunder, I am heartily glad of it, and the more they curse me the better I shall be pleased.

After the lecture a donation of $25 was collected for the benefit of the American Secular Union fund—a substantial indorsement of the present administration and plan of campaign.

There are many interesting features about Pittsburgh, and the lover of mechanics, the dreamer in machineries, whose thoughts revolve like wheels, whose ideas crystallize in iron, will find his ideal world here among its magnificent mills, where a thousand furnaces lick up the gleaming ore with white, hot mouths. Here one may see the glowing stream of gold-red metal dripping over the furnace lips, as if from off its panting lungs had risen a scalding hemorrhage. There one may watch a hissing, glittering ball, which burns upon the retina like rolled-up sheets of imprisoned lightning, borne on a little truck, spitting and fuming as it goes, toward a huge, revolving coffee-mill; once within its jaws there is a rushing, crunching sound, a crash, a slight explosion which sends up a whirl of molten stars, and then a huge red bar comes out and is borne away by a band of men who move with the precision of the very machinery itself. Magnificent men they are to look at—magnificent giants! There stands the master of the furnace, peering with keen eyes down the flaming throat, where the seething metal writhes and quivers in its pain. The glare of its glowing glory strikes up and over him; no tableau fire was ever half so brilliant, and the figure, clad in its rough work-clothes, seems vested with the majesty of self-conscious power at rest, force in repose. Ossian, painting the battle of Fingal and the ghost, might so hav imagined the genius of the storm. A study for Michael Angelo is the master furnace-man!

There are saws with teeth that go singing through the hot metal slabs, and saws without teeth which, whirling at the rate of three hundred and twenty revolutions per minute, close down upon the cold, rolled iron, and by the terrific friction raise the spot beneath the saw to such a degree of heat that it withers and curls like a piece of tissue-paper on the grate; a fine, gleaming iron worm creeps down across the path of the toothless saw, while iron sparks shoot out in all directions. It is an iron place; a village of iron giants, with iron muscles and iron nerves. Each workman is as much a machine as far as precision and unvarying routine go as the machines themselvs; each man is an iron man; and over all, and above all, and through all rings the grand, deep iron music, like waves of a molten sea striking on an iron-bound shore.

The glass-works also form an attraction to the curious sightseer. The "aristocracy of muscle," of which Mr. Van Buren Denslow recently wrote in language as sparkling and scintillating as the great glass bubbles themselvs (and, I may say in an aside, presenting arguments about as fragil), is indeed well represented, but the thing which struck me most forcibly was the immense number of little children, boys under ten years of age, working as hard and faithfully as the blowers themselvs. So deeply was I impressed with the appearance of these white-faced, dirt-begrimed mites that I was moved to inquire where the educational law of the state of Pennsylvania was keeping itself. They informed me that it was on the statute-books at Harrisburg. A good, safe place, by the way, where it is not liable to be disturbed.

I must not, in this description, omit our visit to old Fort Du Quesne. I was quite anxious to see the spot which had so tried my memory and my patience, when, several years ago, I was, with the ardent fervor born of fear of the ferule, committing to memory the exploits of the late lamented George. As my friend Mr. Barker (to whose kind escort I commend all curiosity-eaten sojourners in the smokeless city) was casting about to find which specially muddy alleyway would be most likely to reach the desired locality, a wee, small voice out of a wee, small lad at his feet piped out, "Did you want to see the old fort, mister?" Special providence, you see—"and a little child shall lead them." But, oh, by what dark and devious ways did he conduct us to that monument of a century gone! And what a strange monument it is, half buried in Monongahela mud and smoke, its eight stone faces almost hidden by surrounding buildings, its solid oaken beams pierced here and there by long, narrow portholes, suggesting the eye-sockets in a skull! En effet, it is at once a monument and a corpse; a monument to the heroes who defended it, a corpse of an old idea. Talk about evolution; here you see it—there is a deadly evolution, even in deadly things; and if those old doors were lips that could speak, and those sightless windows eyes that could see, oh, how many a solemn thing could the old fort tell of the progress of destruction since first it stood there in the lonely Alleghany forests, and listened to the low lapping of the waters as they met, and kissed, and swept down past the Ohio banks!

Having explored to our satisfaction, we were about to resume our pilgrimage, when the guileless infant with the powerful voice again made himself heard: "Giv me a cent, mister, for showing you?" This youngster is doing well; his charges are not exorbitant at present, but when he has added a few more years' experience to his somewhat limited stock, and read the popular guide-books, etc., I am sure he will develop into a full-fledged "Ferguson." Everything in this part of the city is Du Quesne something. There is Du Quesne Way and Du Quesne Works—I am not sure but there is Du Quesne whisky—and, finally, Du Quesne Heights, up which you are whirled by the Du Quesne Incline Company's cars, six cents per whirl. From this point, it is said, we may on a clear day count thirteen bridges spanning the Alleghany and Monongahela; and talking about bridges reminds me that this magnificent suspension affair, almost beneath your very feet, not content with taking two cents toll from every man, woman, and child who passes over it six days in the week, also exacts the same on Sunday; yet a poor woman in the city, having been prevailed upon to sell a glass of soda-water or some other similar drink to a representativ of Presbyterian piety bent on enforcing the Sunday laws, who worked upon her sympathies by representing himself to be ill and in need of it, was arrested, tried, and heavily fined. The bridge is a rich corporation; the woman was trying to get her living. I hope you perceive the eternal fitness of Christian justice! Yet it is said Christ stole ears of corn on the Sabbath day!

From this point of observation one may also glance down the Ohio, and see there, resting in its arms, Bruno's island, so called in honor of Felix R. Bruno, author of the God-in-the-Constitution scheme. It may be an honor to Bruno, but the compliment to the island is very doubtful. It were better to be named after that other Bruno, martyred by the church because he advocated the use of school-books. Farther away up the distant hights one may catch a glimpse of the Alleghany observatory, half hidden by intervening buildings. The two cities lie spread out like a map before you, and but for the black vomit of the river traffic rolling over and obscuring the nearer view, every object stands out sharply defined against the sunlight and the blue wall of sky—a wonderful cyclorama, built up by the western glory. After all, one cannot wonder at the enthusiasm of these Pittsburgh Secularists; they see so much man-made slavery before their eyes, but nature molded all so gloriously free!

A large house was in attendance at the lecture on the "Rights of Labor," and an animated discussion on the merits of the ballot followed the discourse.

During the following week I spent several days with the Farmdale Liberalists, giving three lectures on "Secular Education," "Convent Life," and one on a subject chosen by the audience. Happily, they selected one which I delight to handle—"Woman's Suffrages." I think the Christian people of that village, if there were any present, must hav had their reverence for Paul and Solomon terribly shocked. I only wish my Teutonian friend, J. G. Hertwig, might hav been there to lead the reply; as it was, that task devolved on Mr. Peter Bethune, who took issue with the speaker on the statement that women were people. Peter assumed that people, being a collectiv noun, could not properly be applied to either men or women distinctivly. It reminded me of a certain occasion when I gravely remarked to my mother that "young Speckle wasn't a chicken; he was a rooster."

The Farmdale League is brisk and means business; no room for laziness in their ranks, and President Root is making it a decidedly aggressiv movement. Two dollars and fifty cents was donated to the American Secular Union fund.

From Farmdale I returned to Pittsburgh, to participate in the social given by the society on Sunday, February 19th. Music, recitations, and short speeches were the order of the day, and a very pleasant shake-hands all around at the conclusion of the exercises.

On Wednesday afternoon I bade adieu to my good friends, Messrs. Staley, Pierce, Barker, Hoover, D'Jones, ex-president of the League, now of Cleveland, Ohio, and all the other brave, tried hearts whose names are indelibly engraved on memory's tablets, and, "spreading out my white wings," set sail for Alliance.

In this lively little place of some six thousand inhabitants there is a very large Liberal element, but owing to divers causes it has heretofore remained unorganized. The morning lecture on "Orthodoxy and Freethought" was devoted chiefly to rousing a sentiment in that direction, and, from the disposition manifested, the writer has reason to hope that her efforts were not in vain; and that through the energy of the three Messrs. Smith, G. W. Thornburg, Messrs. Rockhill, Haynes, and other Liberal Spiritualists and Agnostics, an auxiliary local Union will soon be fairly in working order.

Notwithstanding the fearful weather a very large audience came out in the evening to hear how we lived in convents, and my thanks are especially due them for the respectful attention given to the entire discourse; but the prettiest compliment of all was paid by Miss Flossie Smith, the six-year-old daughter of D. W. Smith, who said to her mamma, "I liked it because she said more words that I knew."

"Here endeth the lesson." Five weeks of a life are here inscribed. Five pleasant weeks! made pleasant by the companionship of genial minds, and broad Liberal hearts, and brave, true, manly and womanly hands—hands the memory of whose touch sends a thrill of gratitude through my being, and calls up the echo of voices which breathed strong, courageous, inspiring words into each fiber of my inner self. It is all past now. I am returned to "Michigan, my Michigan." No more blue, dim hights down which the cloud tears tremble and drip and fall in hard, gleaming crystals; where the sobbings of the rocks are hushed in frozen music; where hill rises over hill in its mad, steep staircase to the stars, and the sun flashes down its cohorts of golden lancers through the jutting teeth, the cavernous hollows, the darting ravines, of the wild Alleghanies. Here, in our broad, fair, level fields of southern Michigan, hemmed in by the sweet-toned thunder of our deep lakes alone, we lose the grandeur of the mountains. But one sublimer peak which caps them all stands out as clear and bright to us and as fair—the hight of science, over whose majestic brow is bursting the glory of the new day, when all shall be truth seekers, when none shall walk blindfold, and knowledge be the savior of mankind. Adieu!

VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE.

Mrs. Freeman's Adventures.

From Salem, where I gave the first lecture on my route, Francis Sheldon writes: "As a result of your visit here, one intelligent young man has begun investigating, and borrowed a number of TRUTH SEEKERS." Already, from various points, words of encouragement are coming to me, expressing satisfaction as to the results of my labor. Mr. Sheldon is the only live Freethinker in Salem. The town is strictly orthodox; the two prominent sects, Quakers. These attended my lecture. Opportunity was given for criticism, but the "spirit" did not move any of the brethren to speak, and the meeting adjourned with significant silence. All seemed pleased, however, with the lecture, and were talking of having me remain another night. Thomas Rook, an activ, intelligent Liberal, came in from the country to attend my lecture. He brought his little family with him, three bright, handsome children, who listened intently to the speaker's every word.

Mr. Sheldon and his wife came out from the Quakers twenty-five years ago. As Mrs. Sheldon said, she admired their honesty, and it must be admitted that, in becoming Liberals, these two hav lost none of the sterling qualities they held when of Quaker faith. Their family consists of eight children—men and women grown—all Freethinkers, strong and large, and never sick a day in their lives. Salem is an old antislavery battle-ground. Here was located one of those wonderful, invisible underground railroads, sustained by loving hands and loyal hearts. Many a poor black wretch fleeing from some Christian owner was hurried away through here toward Canada and liberty.

I hav laughed often at the ludicrous situations in which Charles Reynolds has frequently found himself on his route. He seems to me like a great schoolboy howling at the top of his voice because he had frozen his fingers a little. Brace up, brother. It is better than being a Christian missionary to the Cannibal islands, after all. The Liberals won't eat you, even if they do put you in a cold room to sleep. That's what they hav out West—plenty of good, cool, fresh air. Plenty of Liberality, too; and the farther West you go the more of each you find. New Jersey, you know, is too little and narrow and cramped for either.

I hav laughed sometimes in sympathy with my fellow-laborer. For instance, when waiting at Mount Pleasant for a train to Ottumwa. "She goes at 12," said the station agent; "it's 11 now." I waited patiently. I heard a crazy old engin shrieking up and down a side-track somewhere in the distance, but the train that I was expecting to come dashing in did not put in an appearance. I went again to the station agent. "Isn't it about time?" He looked at me helplessly. I knew there was something wrong. "Time!" he gasped; "that train went fifteen minutes ago." I found, then, that on many of the branch roads one has to ride on freights; that they are not apt to come anywhere near the depot; that one must tug his luggage about a quarter of a mile, and no one ever dreams of notifying the poor traveler that the train is in. There was no help for it, and I waited six long, mortal hours, with a vision before me of Brother Reynolds sitting down somewhere on his route in a mud-puddle, with the train he had hoped to capture growing beautifully less in the distance. Misery likes company, and I was almost sorry that Watson Heston had not made an illustration of this scene in Mr. Reynolds's wanderings for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

At Ottumwa I was met at the depot by Wm. Lindsey, one of the most intelligent Freethinkers of the West. Reads all the Freethought papers. Mr. Lindsey attended the Congress last fall in Chicago. He had found a nice place for me to stop, with the McCarrolls. Mrs. McCarroll is the daughter of Jacob Millisack, an old antislavery pioneer. At his house hav been entertained Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Frederick Douglass, Abby Kelly Foster, and so on.

I think that every reformer on the road has been entertained by the McCarrolls. And one need not wish for a pleasanter home, more gentlemanly host, or kinder hostess. I found nearly all the Liberal papers here, among them THE TRUTH SEEKER, Mr. McCarroll having taken it for years. I gave two lectures in the court house, speaking Sunday morning and Sunday evening. N. M. Ives, editor of the Industrial Appeal, was present, and manifested his approval of my lectures by saying, when I gave opportunity for criticism, "that all were of the same opinion."

Other earnest Liberals here are Mr. and Mrs. Phillips, Mr. and Mrs. Adler; Mrs. Adler being sister-in-law to that enthusiastic worker, Katie Kehm. Miss Kehm is a school-teacher, and has given several lectures herself. Upon the occasion of Mr. Putnam's visit here she surprised him somewhat by giving his poem, "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" in excellent style. This bright young girl is no doubt destined to make a place for herself among the Liberal workers in the future. I also met B. G. Bolton, P. F. Kearns, Miss Ellen Armstrong, a remarkably intelligent lady, and Mr. Scott, a brilliant young lawyer.

At Cromwell, Ia, I was met at the depot by Jacob Geier. Mr. Putnam is so great a favorit here that I was made at home at once, because I came as Mr. Putnam's friend. Out in the grove I was shown the spot where Professor Bell had rested from his labors. We in Chicago thought him lecturing. The professor was swinging in a hammock. We will forgiv him this time, but I hav no doubt but that some future summer will find him reclining again under that same vine and fig-tree. The professor hates the heat as badly as Brother Reynolds does the cold.

Mr. F. I. Green came from Nevinville, a distance of twelve miles, to attend my lecture. Mr. Green takes all the Liberal papers. When that is said, it is useless to add that he is intelligent. Mr. Green is a young man of about thirty, and has accomplished much for Freethought throughout his community.

At Helena, Neb., I stopped with Dr. Brooks. The doctor resided formerly at Linesville, Pa., where I met Mrs. Brooks, an intelligent, amiable lady, a year ago last January, when I attended the Paine anniversary held at that place, and where that bright young speaker, Voltairine de Cleyre, Charles Watts, and Mr. Darrows, a young lawyer of Chicago, furnished the speaking last winter. I gave three lectures here, speaking in the school-houses; riding in all, from the farm to the depot, and from the farm to the school-houses, forty miles—sometimes with the doctor in his carriage, and sometimes we all piled into the sled, sitting on the bottom or on the seat just as we preferred. On the morning of the day I got there the thermometer was eighteen degrees below zero. Here I found virgin soil. Here the sound of the Liberal lecturer's voice had never come. Even that indefatigable worker, John Remsburg, had not, in his many wanderings, in his "going to and fro and up and down on the earth," found his way hither. And yet my audience were pleased, laughed and applauded, and were much more amenable to reason and common sense than an older community would hav been. As one gets away from the church-spires he finds himself among a grander, freer, nobler people. "Go West, young man." That advice is as pertinent to-day.

Dr. Brooks is a speaker of considerable note; has devoted a great deal of time to the labor cause; has a book in press on the finance question; had an article recently in THE TRUTH SEEKER in reply to Van Buren Denslow's "Distribution of Wealth;" takes about thirty Liberal papers. This is an intelligent family, an oasis in the desert. And yet one can feel that their residence here will Liberalize the whole community. Even now, in the doctor's vicinity, this effect is felt.

At Seward I was met at the depot by H. L. Boyes. Mr. Boyes is a Liberal of many years' standing, thoroughly honest and outspoken in his views. In fact, he is proud that he is a Freethinker, and stands up as readily for common sense and reason as the believer does for Jesus. Mrs. Boyes is one of the most original thinkers I hav ever met. She has not read much, she said, and yet she kept me constantly wondering at the brightness and quaintness of her ideas. She is a great favorit with the children. She givs them a party every now and then. She told me how last fall a gay crowd had come into her room, and, after singing a May-day song, the youngest of the lot slipped up behind her, and placed over her head a wreath of flowers, and then they all sang laughingly, gladly, "We crown you queen of the May, queen of the May." "And this," she said, "was in October, and think of the bright flowers above my old face! think of me as queen of the May! And yet they were just as happy as though I had been young and beautiful, and the month May instead of October." Every spring these little children bring her a fairy basket, a dainty creation of green moss and flowers woven into shape and beauty by tiny, cunning, childish fingers. And remember, my friends, that this woman, who commands all this love, this veneration, from the community in which she livs, is a Materialist, a Freethinker. She understands that immortality is not so much, only as one may do some good deeds to liv after him. Her gentleness and tenderness will be remembered in all the years to come by the little ones she loves so well to-day.

Mr. and Mrs. Moffatt, of Seward, are earnest Liberals. Mr. Moffatt is thoroughly outspoken, and there is not a preacher in the town but that has been worsted by him in argument. Mr. Moffatt is always ready to giv a reason for the faith in him. Several years ago they buried their only child, and their elegant home must seem somewhat desolate. Under the evergreens surrounding this residence I was shown another spot where one of our lecturers had swung in a hammock—no less a personage than our then hard-working secretary. I was glad to learn that he did rest once in a while, for I had begun to believe that he, like Mr. John Remsburg, never paused.

A prayer-meeting was held at the Congregationalist church on the night of my first lecture, and, after praying for me, the audience was dismissed, and the pastor and a portion of the flock came to the court house to hear my lecture. The house was full. An opportunity was given for remarks, but no one spoke. On the next evening it was packed, some standing. At the conclusion of the lecture the Congregationalist minister, the Rev. Mr. Dalley, jumped upon a chair and announced that on the next Sunday evening he would reply to Mrs. Freeman in the Opera House. Unfortunately some of the boys, young men nearly, cried: "You can't do it!" "Why don't you do it now?" and "Rats!" The next day the reverend gentleman rushed into print with this, complaining of the impoliteness of the Freethinkers. Cornelius Clark replied to his accusation, assuring him that the Liberals were not responsible, but gently reminding him that it would hav been a good place and opportunity, there and then, to make a protest against the lectures. A friend writes me: "He foamed for two hours on the Sunday evening announced, but used up his time in abusing Voltaire, Thomas Paine, and your ladyship."

Seward contains a good many prominent Liberals: H. H. Boyes, son of H. L. Boyes—this gentleman is thoroughly posted, and has quite a number of valuable books—B. Babsen, Jr.; Judge Lowrey, president of the Secular Union here; Daniel McKillip, eighty years old, strong and well, and never sick a day in his life, he told me; his son Daniel McKillip, a popular young lawyer, and his handsome wife; several teachers from the schools; William Bowers; Cornelius Clark, a writer and speaker; Schuyler Clark, Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Leinhardt, and many more. Among the strangers introducing themselvs was a gentleman from Kansas, a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and all the Liberal papers, also a friend of all the Liberal lecturers.

I think these people were glad that I came to them. Mrs. Boyes assured me of this at parting, and Mr. Boyes said earnestly: "I shall pass away before many years, and I want no superstitious mummery to be indulged in at my grave. Let me be laid aside quietly. And the next lecturer that comes here, if it isn't until six months later, let him say a few words then in regard to me as a man, as a citizen. I am willing to be judged by the people among whom I hav lived. This is all I ask."

MRS. M. A. FREEMAN.

Riotous Romanists.—Fulton Frightened.

Parading the down-town streets the early part of this week were scores of hungry-looking, blear-eyed tramps, traveling Indian file, book in hand, bedecked in huge straw hats, with somber black bands, on which were inscribed the words, "Why Priests Should Wed." If any possessed matrimonial intentions, they certainly might be excused from inviting these scarecrows to the wedding feast. It was soon ascertained that Rev. Justin Fulton took this sensational style of advertising his lecture. There was a good-sized audience, some richly dressed ladies, and a large representation of the genus "tough" in the galleries. These gentlemen of the "upper circle" were not of the ordinary lecture auditors—they looked like our ward statesmen whose slugging proclivities were the test of their political acumen. The first part of the lecture was listened to, but the reader can obtain a faint idea of the rumpus from the Herald report:

After calling Roman Catholics pagans, he said that families were robbed "to recruit the seraglios of the holy fathers;" that a young man had told him that his sister entered a convent, and for "six years was subject to the will of the priests, and during this time a child has been born to her and——"

"That's a lie," "Nein, nein," "False, false," rang out from all parts of the church. Hisses and shouts of approval and dissent followed, and a roar like a set-to in a close ward caucus swept over the room. Many ladies left.

"We should do for women what Germany has done," he continued.

"You can't go to a nunnery and converse with your friends."

"There's not a word of truth in that." The shouts became so angry that whole pews were quickly emptied of ladies. Dr. Fulton said: "Don't leave, ladies. There has been a nunnery in Rome which it cost £5,000 to enter."

"What's the name of that nunnery?" "It's money you are after."

"Women are kidnapped to fill convents."

"Another of your lies."

"There's one thing I like about myself. I——"

"Oh, no, you are not George Washington." (Laughter.)

"The Catholic church is under the pope, not our government."

"It's a lie. I'm as good an American citizen as you."

"McGlynn threatens to turn on the church."

"Never." (Cheers and hisses.)

"In New York the body of a young lady found in the river was taken to the morgue. The papers announced it. Eight Catholic mothers went there in the morning searching for lost daughters."

"How do you know?"

"They told me so."

"There are women in Chicago convents who would hail with gladness the appearance of an officer."

"Bet you $500 there ain't."

"Oh, you havn't got a car-fare."

Dr. Fulton made a brief appeal to those interrupting him, which drew this response from the gallery in a jocular tone, "Oh, you love to lie so, sir," and peals of laughter swept over the great assembly.

"Oh, go to work again on the nunneries."

He alluded to another of his books, containing a story which he narrated.

"That's a pretty black story," "Giv us some truth," and similar shouts greeted him. The hisses, applause, and shouts kept growing louder, ladies flocked toward the doors, and the speaker, though he had announced that a song would conclude the exercises, very prudently closed it with the benediction.

During the whole rumpus not a particle of protection was afforded by the police, although it is said they were appealed to, and the foregoing fails to mention the fact that while an usher was attempting to eject a disturber, the latter drew a revolver, and the sudden disappearance of the usher on more important business possibly prevented a tragedy.

Although Dr. Fulton had engaged the church for a series of lectures, he and his audience found themselvs locked out the following evening.

While fully prepared to believe the immoralities which Dr. Fulton has depicted common to the Catholic priesthood, and firmly denouncing this suppression of free speech, I fail to find that Methodist ministers hav made a much more virtuous showing. Furthermore, I question the sincerity of anyone who resorts to such mountebank methods of advertising his show.

It is our pleasure to turn to a more agreeable and certainly more profitable topic—the success which our standard-bearer, Samuel P. Putnam, met with in Fresno, Cal., where he delivered a course of three lectures at this starting-point for his spring campaign. The lectures were highly spoken of by the Expositor. Following are its remarks at the conclusion of the course:

The attendance last night at Samuel P. Putnam's third and last lecture was larger than at the two previous lectures, and the interest appeared to increase as the audience had grown numerically. The speaker denied that the Bible was the work of revelation, but added that there was nothing beautiful or moral in that book that Liberals did not as thoroughly adopt as do the orthodox Christians. The supernatural idea of the Bible was rejected by people of the speaker's belief. The lecture was principally devoted to an elaboration of the Nine Demands of the Liberals, the substance of which has already been given in the Expositor. He spoke at considerable length, advancing practical ideas on the advantages of a secular system of education over the modern sectarian method. Particular stress was laid on the necessity of sound physical training, and had Froebel been present he would probably hav bowed his thanks for the compliments the speaker paid the kindergarten system of instruction. The educational plank in the Liberal platform is one of the strongest in the structure.

A temporary organization was effected by the election of J. F. Waterhouse as chairman and C. A. Burks as secretary. A committee of five on permanent organization was formed, consisting of the two persons above named, J. W. North, J. F. Lee, and George Church, who are to report at an early day. The intention is to form a branch in Fresno of the American Secular Union, procure a place for holding meetings, hav speaking, and musical and dramatic entertainments; in short, to form a complete organization for the advancement of the principles of Freethought.

The Chicago Secular Union has determined to do work more worthy the headquarters of the National society, and we hav leased the Universalist church for our regular Sunday evening meetings. Our current expenses now are close on to $1,500 per year. Toward this expense Dr. E. S. McLeod has pledged $100 to add dignity and prestige to the society which he has labored so incessantly and intelligently to maintain. As the lecture committee, the doctor has shown fine discrimination in the selection of persons and subjects, and whatever of success the Chicago Union has attained is largely due to the assiduity of E. S. McLeod.

Dr. W. H. Henry, a new-comer, but a veteran Secularist of the British Society, has contributed most generously to our local Union, and given it a splendid impetus by his wise counsel and extended experience. He is thoroughly enterprising and does not believe in doing anything by halves, and brings to the Secular work a well-stored mind and the unconquerable determination of a Briton. As a token of his desire to extend the local work he handed the writer his check for $100 the other day; and that is not his first donation by a large majority.

Shakspere and Bacon.

I am aware that sarcasm and fun is not argument, else I should try to write a little fun at the Hon. Ignatius Donnelly's expense.

Of the able writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 25th, who so kindly answers knotty questions, and who so kindly told us some time ago that John Wesley was not indicted in Georgia for adultery—when every Methodist bishop knows to the contrary; and during the Beecher-Tilton trouble Beecher's friends published the fact to the world; and the Cincinnati Methodist Advocate explained that the presiding judge in Georgia forced the grand jury to indict Wesley; and every Methodist knows that Wesley's wife followed him here and there and publicly charged him with adultery, which Wesley says he was unable to defend himself against (see Wesley's Works)—of this writer, and of all others that may be interested in the Baconian controversy, I will ask:

1. Though all of Bacon's manuscripts and letters hav come down to us, how is it that none of Shakspere's plays were among them?

2. If Bacon took so much pains to incorporate a cipher in "King Henry IV.," First and Second Parts, why did he not in some of his letters or papers tell us all about the matter? He left all his papers in Constable's care.

3. If Bacon claimed he invented a cipher which was published when Bacon was only three years old, how far was Bacon away from the truth?

4. Why is it that Bacon consumes so much Latin and Greek in "Novum Organum" and his other works, and so little in all the plays, if he wrote them?

5. Why is it that the style of Bacon in all his conceded works is exactly alike and yet his acknowledged style is slow, awkward, clumsy, and as different from the style of the plays as possible?

6. Upon the ground of style, every scholar from Augustine down to the present says that Paul never wrote the letter to the Hebrews, because it is so different from the other Epistles.

7. What object had Bacon, when he was always thirsty for glory, in immortalizing an ignorant butcher's son, by publishing immortal plays in his name, and the worst kind of rot poetry in his own name?

8 How did it come that Bacon could write 180,000 lines of magnificent poetry and never leave even one earmark of his own thought in all those lines?

9. The only mention made of Bacon's connection with the theater is the statement that in the early reign of Elizabeth he wrote some speeches for certain dumb shows, which were failures; and Bacon became disgusted and went into philosophy.

10. Why should Bacon fear to be known as the author of the plays, when the queen heard them and applauded them, and it appears that Shakspere enjoyed wonderful favor among lords, earls, and all the scholars of England?

Donnelly has harped on Shakspere's signature as his stock in trade so long that he has at last convinced himself that Shakspere could not write even his name.

Horace Greeley had to keep a foreman in his office to decipher his writing. I once received a letter from Dr. Joseph Haven, author of "Moral Philosophy" and "Mental Philosophy," which I could not read, not even the name, neither could any of my friends; and how THE TRUTH SEEKER gets up my manuscript with no errors I cannot comprehend.

11. Where are the children of Henry Clay? Who were they? It is a little singular that great men's children are never heard of except in lunatic asylums and dunce-houses, and Shakspere must not be judged by his children; although Susannah married Dr. Hall, and wrote a bold, fine hand. Out of the twenty councilmen of Stratford-upon-Avon, fifteen could not write their names, and made their marks. A man that could write 180,000 lines of poetry against he was forty-nine years of age would not probably write equal to copperplate.

12. In regard to Shakspere's manuscript, it is well known that Shakspere wrote for the company to which he belonged, and the manuscript was in the company's possession, and the most of Shakspere's plays that were not published in his lifetime were not published because the company owned the plays and did not choose to let the public hav them; but in 1623, when appeared the folio, the Shakspere Dramatic Company surrendered Shakspere's manuscript to the printer, and we all know how much is left of a manuscript after the printer is through with it.

13. Bacon was the father of inductiv philosophy in England, and all his works are thoroughly Atheistical. His first publication was in 1597, the "Essays." According to your able correspondent, Mr. Burr, Bacon's works made him wonderfully popular, instead of securing a warm place for him at a log-wood fire.

The plays of Shakspere are not Infidel or Agnostic, but run in the groove of "doubt," "don't know," "hope," and certainly convey a belief that we shall liv again, Jehovah or no Jehovah. If Bacon ran a risk of being burnt for writing Shakspere, had it been known, how did Shakspere escape? He was at least the conceded author, and all England believed him to be the author of the plays; yet he lived in peace, and died at his home honored even by King James I., who licensed his, or rather Burbage's, company. Shakspere owned an interest in the dramatic company to which he belonged, and a house in London, mentioned in his will, where no doubt his books were kept, and probably owned by the company.

At Shakspere's death his plays, manuscript, etc., were at his house in London, which was occupied by the Burbage Dramatic Company, known now as the Shakspere Company. What became of Shakspere's books, manuscript, letters, etc., no one knows. They were probably scattered over the earth, for in 1837 a small volume of Florio's translation of Montaigne was discovered with Shakspere's autograph on it. But Donnelly says this is not Shakspere's signature. How does he know? If Shakspere could not write, according to Donnelly and others, how do they compare signatures?

The French say, "The finer the penmanship, the bigger the fool," but Donnelly and Mr. Burr hav reversed it, and hav satisfactorily "proved" that because Bacon wrote a fine hand, therefore he wrote Shakspere's plays. And because Shakspere was a poor councilman or butcher's son, reared in poverty in the country town of Stratford, therefore he could neither read nor write, and was so ignorant that he had no use for a book. By a parity of reasoning Abraham Lincoln was never president of the United States, and Henry Clay was not secretary of state and a senator. Does Mr. Burr forget that about one-fourth of the kings of England could not write their names?

I am profoundly sorry that such able men as Mr. Burr and Hon. Ignatius Donnelly should stoop to the Christian tactics of scandal, and use the tools of the scavenger to prove that William Shakspere could neither read, write, nor make poetry. The tools of the scavenger are the Christian's stock in trade.

I deny that Thomas Paine, the hero of the Revolution, did his works in secret. He did his work openly and aboveboard in and before the Revolution, and took his life in his hand by so doing. While the only thing that Bacon did in secret was to take bribes from plaintiffs and defendants in lawsuits, and to, while he was counsel-extraordinary, secretly execute Barrow and Greenwood, two religious fanatics called Brownists, corresponding, I presume, to our Salvation Army, after their sentences had been commuted by Queen Elizabeth.

Barrow and Greenwood taught religious liberty, and had to die for so doing. It is well known that Bacon forged affidavits against Essex, and appeared in court, pleaded against him, and helped turn the ax toward Essex's head. But this was some years after, according to Mr. Burr, Bacon's writing the Sonnets to Essex and his bride. Bacon accepted large landed estates from Southampton, and afterward helped imprison him. And yet this is the man that wrote the plays of Shakspere, but was afraid to own them on account of the theater being a despised "weed," and its being dangerous to be known as a dramatic writer; and for reasons of state Bacon palmed them off on an ignorant butcher's son, which did not endanger Shakspere's life, but made him immortal!

I am surprised to learn of the immense power of Donnelly, and how easily he convinces strong-minded people. According to Mr. Burr, Donnelly convinced him in a moment that Bacon was not only Shakspere, but Christopher Marlowe also. Had Donnelly told Mr. Burr that Greene was Bacon's mask before Marlowe was killed, he no doubt would hav been convinced in a moment of that fact, but Greene says he was Shakspere's feathers (or mask).

The fact is, young Shakspere came to the theater in London about 1589, and as a natural poet wrote all of the classical fellows "down and out." Greene had to go, Peele had to take a back seat, and Marlowe changed his mode of verse from the stiff ten-syllable Grecian style and in his last plays adopted the easy, natural style of Shakspere.

Ben Jonson said Shakspere had no art—he had little Latin and less Greek—in other words, Shakspere was not classical; and no wonder Jonson loved Bacon, for they were both college-bred men, and both aped the ancient writers; and yet in 1623, when Shakspere had been dead seven years, and his fame had filled the earth, Jonson wrote the following commendatory lines in the preface to the folio that appeared, and Bacon stood by and saw his works plagiarized and his immortal fame given to a butcher's son. Hear Jonson:

Soul of the age!
The applause! delight! the wonder of our stage!
My Shakspere, rise! I will not lodge thee by Chaucer, or Spenser—or bid Beaumont lie
A little further to make thee room:
Thou art a monument without a tomb,
And art alive still while thy book doth liv,
And we hav wits to read, and praise to giv.

And tell how far thou didst our Lyly outshine
Or sporting Kyd, or Marlowe's mighty line;
And though thou hadst small Latin and less Greek,
From thence to honor thee I would not seek
For names; but call forth thund'ring Æschylus,
Euripides, and Sophocles to us,
Paccuvius, Accius, him of Cordova dead,
To life again, to hear thy buskin tread
And shake a stage.

Of all that insolent Greece or haughty Rome
Sent forth, or since did from their ashes come,
Triumph, my BRITTAIN! thou hast one to show
To whom all scenes of Europe homage owe!
He was not of an age, but for all time.

The above does not describe Bacon. Jonson even in his praise of Shakspere had to be classical—he could not understand how a man could be a poet without patterning after the ancients. Bacon had plenty of Latin and Greek; Shakspere had little. When did Bacon ever shake a stage? Jonson admits that Shakspere is above the ancient writers of poetry, and claims the glory for Brittain. According to Donnelly, Greene, Kyd, Marlowe, and Shakspere succeeded each other as Bacon's masks. If this be so, Bacon was the most prolific man in styles that ever lived. And it is strange! passing strange! that nobody discovered this fact for over two hundred years, when the present discussion of the authorship of the immortal plays arose from the "Historical Doubts" of Walpole—almost equal to the divinity of Jesus founded on a dream of Joseph, the stepfather of God!

Ben Jonson conceded the immortality of the plays of Shakspere after he was forced to by the unanimous voice of England, which soon placed Shakspere's plays on the highest pedestal of eternal fame. Jonson was always opposed to Shakspere's style, and said so; he considered his own plays far ahead of Shakspere's, and of this fact no one knows better than Mr. Burr; but when Jonson saw that he could prevail nothing, but that the whole multitude had gone after Shakspere, he gave honor to whom honor is due—to his friend Shakspere.

Here is Bacon's description of a Christian:

The Christian believes three to be one, and one to be three; a father not to be older than his son; a son to be equal with his father; and one proceeding from both to be equal with both; he believing three persons in one in one nature, and two natures in one person.

The following is Shakspere's, in the "Merchant of Venice:"

So may the outward shows be least themselvs;
The world is still deceived with ornament.
In law, what plea so tainted and corrupt,
But, being seasoned with a gracious voice,
Obscures the show of evil? In religion,
What damned error, but some sober brow
Will bless it, and approve it with a text,
Hiding the grossness with fair ornament?
There is no vice so simple, but assumes
Some mark of virtue on his outward parts.
How many cowards, whose hearts are all as false
As stairs of sand, wear yet upon their chins
The beards of Hercules, and frowning Mars;
Who, inward searched, hav livers white as milk?
And these assume but valor's excrement,
To render them redoubted.

Mr. Burr, do you not think the above describes Bacon excellently as judge and Christian? For Bacon was both; at least, he belonged to the state religion, i. e., popular church. Pray be candid; do you see any difference in the style of the poetry and the prose above? Be careful, for if you do, the fact is fatal to Donnelly's theory that Bacon wrote Shakspere.

The following from Shakspere's Sonnets that Lord Bacon did not write, shall fittingly close this paper:

How heavy I do journey on the way,
When what I seek—my weary travel's end—
Doth teach that ease and that repose to say,
Thus far the miles are measured from thy friend;
The beast that bears me, tired with my woe,
Plods dully on to bear that weight in me,
As if by some instinct the wretch did know
His rider loved not speed, being made from thee:
The bloody spur cannot provoke him on
That sometimes augers threats into his hide;
Which heavily he answers with a groan,
More sharp to me than spurring to his side:
For that same groan doth put this in my mind,
My grief lies onward and my joy behind.

If Bacon wrote that Sonnet to the earl of Essex and his bride, it certainly was a true prophecy that Bacon should ride Essex into power and not only thrust the spur (ax) in his side but chop his head off, for Bacon was the attorney that pleaded against Essex and Southampton both. Shakspere shows in that Sonnet that it grieved him to spur the poor beast on account of the brute's groans, but perhaps Bacon was at the execution of Essex, and to fulfill his prophecy shed a few crocodile tears. Bacon lived and moved among flowers and wealth and position; he did not hav to plod on a weary way, but Shakspere did.

I hope the bottom facts will come out about the Shakspere authorship.

A word about Shakspere's signature. There are six signatures that are authentic according to the best Shaksperean scholars. Mr. Burr givs only five in THE TRUTH SEEKER, omitting the one on Shakspere's copy of Florio's translation of Montaigne. Shakspere's signatures are about equal to Lord Byron's. They show that he had written a great deal. They are not handsome by any means. Two hundred years from now, no doubt, such men as Walpole, Judge Holmes, Hon. Ignatius Donnelly, and Mr. Burr will be unable to marry Greeley's writings with his life and signature. They will claim that he was manager of the Tribune, but some fellow, kept hid in New York, and for state reasons, used Greeley as a mask.

It was a great accomplishment in his day to be able to write at all. And the fact that Shakspere could write settles the question of his education; besides, all his early biographers, Nash, Aubrey, and tradition, say he was a noverint (law clerk) at Stratford, and had passed through the grammar-school at that place. He must hav passed through some school to learn to write, for his father, John Shakspere, could neither read nor write; neither could Shakspere's mother.

Shakspere's family resided in Stratford, and if his daughter Judith preferred to marry early, instead of educating herself, I do not see that that proves Bacon wrote the plays. Nor does the mistake of Mrs. Hall about her husband's writing prove that Donnelly has not struck a mare's nest. In a future article I wish to giv the authentic pictures of Christ and Shakspere, if I can get the inimitable Watson Heston to draw them. GEO. H. BETHARD

A Socialist Christian to Our Contributors.

We are reminded that, about a year ago, you were requested to call a halt on the discussion of Anarchism in THE TRUTH SEEKER, because it is not included in the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and Secularists are not unanimous in opinion about it.

I think that smells quite as strong of dogmatic intolerance as anything Christianity has yet offered.

That request is now renewed, and Socialism is added, presumably because the objector does not know the difference between them, or, to use his own words, "he cannot easily determin where the latter leaves off and the other begins."

That is the best reason he could offer for the further discussion of those questions. Those of your readers who are better informed desire to know all that can be said on those questions pro and con. And I think they hav good reason to, if the questions are really of so much importance that men should be hanged on account of them. Moreover, when gentlemen of intelligence volunteer to enlighten us on those and kindred questions, I think it expedient, both as a matter of courtesy, and to encourage further effort, that we should appropriately express our appreciation of favors received. I can think of no more appropriate method of expressing appreciation, with a view to eliciting further information, than by noting important facts and considerations that are overlooked, fallacy that is substituted, and to especially note the amusing absurdities and self-refutations that are sometimes liberally indulged in. I will offer a few "specimen bricks."

We are instructed that all our properties, conditions, and relations are aristocracies, but I think that proposition is made to appear somewhat questionable by the further statement that they are mutually dependent on each other for existence, which should make them a democratic unit, in the aggregate, that will not possibly admit of aristocratic exclusivness. Even great wealth and abject poverty are but positiv and negativ effects of a common cause, and, they being the offspring of a common parentage, their relationship should be somewhat intimate.

It being disputed that all men are born equal, I will suggest the incontrovertible facts that all men are born physically helpless, hav not intelligence enough to distinguish their mother from a she-goat, and will as readily endeavor to extract nutriment from a dry rag as from the paps of either. I think that is being born as nearly equal, physically and intellectually, as can be intelligently conceived of. Unless the law of nature has been amended, which is hardly probable, if possible, the first generation of animate beings who inhabited this planet should hav had a birth and infancy analogous to that we now hav, hence, there could primarily hav been no ownership of anything. Therefore, I think ownership is indisputably usurpation, and usurpation is usually regarded as a synonym of robbery. Ownership of wealth enables thousands to liv in idleness and extravagant luxury by the labor of others, who are thereby despoiled, impoverished, and degraded; therefore it is not only robbery in and of itself at its inception, but is also a continuous repetition of robbery, spoliation, and rapine, causing vice and crime of every name and character. Therefore it is not great wealth, but ownership of wealth, that is the mother of crime and abominations of the earth.

Every expedient that human intelligence is capable of devising appears to hav been resorted to with a view to mitigating the evil that inheres in ownership of wealth. Hence, tribal ownership, agrarian division, state ownership with vassalage of the people, state landlordism, of which the Henry George theory is a synonym, it being obvious that a tax in consideration of occupancy and use is but rent called by another name. Last, though not least, we hav the system that is driving many intelligent, thinking people mad in this and other countries. These devices appear to hav served no purpose better than to practically demonstrate that ownership of wealth is an unmitigable curse to the human race. Hence, a few hav suggested that we should own nothing, but be possessed of all things. That is what I understand to be the fundamental principle of Socialism, and it appears to hav been advocated by Paul and the primitiv church. Paul also suggested that we should prove all things, and hold fast that which is good. I understand that to be the creed and dogma of Freethought. The name Christian was applied to the brethren of the primitiv church in derision, and appears to hav been rejected as an indignity. Hence, when Agrippa said unto Paul, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian," he made the evasiv reply, "I would to God that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day were both almost, and altogether such as I am, except these bonds." Therefore, I shall recognize Paul and the primitiv church as brother Socialists and Freethinkers, and good enough Infidels for my latitude, for I am not at a white heat on the Infidel question either pro or con.

Socialism evidently contemplates organizing the entire production and distribution of this planet under a common management or board of direction. I think that will be a business enterprise that will require the best business talent that can be found on this planet to organize and put it in successful operation. The kingdom of God, as illustrated by the parable of the ten talents, is also a business enterprise that will require the best business talent of this planet to organize and put it in successful operation. Hence, Socialism and the kingdom of God are synonymous, will be established on this planet if anywhere, and will effect a social resurrection from a social state that passed upon all men as a result of the only known transgression that could possibly hav such effect. Right here I will inquire, By what authority is it asserted that the forbidden fruit was an apple? The word apple occurs but once in the Bible, that I find, and relates to the apple of the eye; but I find no intimation that Adam and Eve ate each other's eyes out. The story is evidently a fable intended to illustrate a philosophy, and that being purely Socialism, I shall accept it and defend it against all comers.

The principle of Anarchism was illustrated by the Harman matrimonial alliance, in which they mutually promised to do by each other, without law, all that the law requires them to do. Therefore, law and government do not appear to be an insurmountable obstruction to the practice of Anarchism; then why should Anarchists make a fuss about law and government? If people do by each other all that the law requires them to, why should they be hanged for it? Viewing the controversy from that standpoint, it appeared like a laughable farce that I could enjoy, until a stupid or vicious court of injustice spoiled my fun by enacting a tragedy. When it came to hanging people for making themselvs ridiculous, I was unable to see clearly where the laugh came in; it suggested the possibility of being hanged myself some day for a like offense.

The distinctiv difference between Socialism and Anarchism will be found in the important facts that Socialism proposes to enforce and establish the practice of just principles by the agency of law and government; Anarchism proposes that we shall practice just principles instinctivly without law and government. Socialism supposes that the average of the human race will require subjection to strict disciplin for several generations to prepare them for that responsibility. Therefore, Anarchism should take a back seat for the present, and not be obtrusiv, for it should necessarily be preceded by the schoolmaster, Socialism. There appears to be no difference between them on the question of principles, but on the method of procuring the practice of them. To "do by others in all things as we would hav others do by us," is a cardinal principle of both. Socialism would procure the practice of the principle by removing the incentiv to do otherwise. Anarchism expects us to practice the principle regardless of adverse incentiv. I think the foregoing should enable your readers to see where Anarchism should begin, but I hardly think that Socialism will "leave off" at that point, but its principles will be practiced on other conditions.

I perceive that some of your correspondents are anxiously desirous that they shall not be suspected of any sympathy with the foregoing principles; nevertheless, I shall claim the honor of having instinctivly advocated them from early youth, am at it yet, and not likely to "down at any man's bidding." They are Bible questions, gentlemen, and I perceive that THE TRUTH SEEKER correspondents make the discussion of Bible questions a specialty; hence, their calling a halt on the discussion of them is suggestiv that they feel beaten, but hav not the fairness to admit the fact. Moreover, in my introductory letter on becoming a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER, I offered to defend Bible philosophy against all comers. I intended that for a standing challenge, and shall think it more honorable for Freethinkers and truth seekers to accept it, and manfully combat those questions on that line, if no other, than to persistently request Mr. Editor to choke the dogs (Socialists) off or "stop my paper." J. A. TUTTLE.

Herbert Spencer a Land Reformer.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav been a subscriber to your radical paper for the last ten years, and I am happy to say that I highly appreciate the very useful knowledge I hav acquired from a careful perusal of its pages, which were filled, as a whole, with good mental food so varied in kind and so ample in quantity. I feel sure that I hav received many times the worth of my money. And it givs me pleasure to "spread the light and teach the benighted" that the Gods can take care of themselvs; that we mortals should do all in our power to establish justice among ourselvs. The French National Assembly, in 1789, declared "that ignorance, neglect, or contempt of human rights are the sole causes of public misfortunes and corruption of government." This declaration is as applicable to us now as it was to France then, and is as true to-day as it was a hundred years ago. But let us take our own Declaration of Independence. If men are endowed with certain unalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, it must unavoidably follow that they hav unalienable rights to the source and storehouse of all supplies—the land. Here I will let Herbert Spencer speak by quoting the first two paragraphs of the ninth chapter of "Social Statics," bearing upon this question:

1. Given a race of human beings having like claims to pursue the objects of their desires—given a world adapted to the gratification of those desires—a world into which such beings are similarly born, and it unavoidably follows that they hav equal rights to the use of this world. For if each of them "has freedom to do all that he wills, provided he infringes not the equal freedom of any other," then each of them is free to use the earth for the satisfaction of his wants, provided he allows all others the same liberty. And conversely, it is manifest that no one, or part of them, may use the earth in such a way as to prevent the rest from similarly using it; seeing that to do this is to assume greater freedom than the rest, and consequently to break the law.

2. Equity, therefore, does not permit property in land. For if one portion of the earth's surface may justly become the possession of an individual, and may be held by him for his sole use and benefit, as a thing to which he has an exclusiv right, then other portions of the earth's surface may be so held; and eventually the whole of the earth's surface may be so held; and our planet may thus lapse altogether into private hands. Observe now the dilemma to which this leads. Supposing the entire habitable globe to be so inclosed, it follows that if the landowners hav a valid right to its surface, all who are not landowners hav no right at all to its surface. Hence, such can exist on the earth by sufferance only. They are all trespassers. Save by the permission of the lords of the soil, they can hav no room for the soles of their feet. Nay, should the others think fit to deny them a resting-place, these landless men might equitably be expelled from the earth altogether. If, then, the assumption that land can be held as property involves that the whole globe may become the private domain of a part of its inhabitants, and if, by consequence, the rest of its inhabitants can then exercise their faculties—can then exist even—only by consent of the landowners; it is manifest that an exclusiv possession of the soil necessitates an infringement of the law of equal freedom. For men who cannot "liv and move and hav their being" without the leave of others cannot be equally free with those others.

The logic of the above is, I think, absolutely irrefutable. But let the readers think and ponder seriously upon this most important question, and then decide for themselvs as to what is right. It ill becomes us who hav adopted the noble name of "Liberals" to condemn the land reformers before we hav given them a hearing. And yet, if one may judge by the letters and comments which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER during the past year, on or about Henry George and his principles, they show that very thing. We hav not been fair to him or to ourselvs.

We liv in a country capable of supporting a thousand millions of people in comfort, if justice to all and favors to none had an abiding-place among us; but under our present system what do we find? We find amid advancing wealth a still greater increase of want and poverty. Though the power of labor is elevenfold more effectiv than it was fifty years ago, millions of our brothers and sisters are suffering for the necessaries of life.

> For 'tis hard upon the many—
> Hard, unpitied by the few,
> To starve and die for want of work,
> Or liv half-starved with work to do.

It has been estimated that were the houses in New York city containing criminals, and the recipients of charity, set side by side, they would make a street twenty-two miles long. Certainly, in view of such horrible every-day facts, anyone who tries to show the cause of the disease ought to be heard with respectful attention. As reforms cannot be effected until the people are educated in the nobler principles which underlie the same, our work must be the removal of mountains of prejudices, which always cluster around long-established wrongs, whether religious or political. PAUL GARIÉPY.

The Bible in Texas Schools.

Governor Ross, of Texas, used to be one of J. D. Shaw's parishioners when that able Infidel was a Methodist preacher. But he was never an "amen corner" member of the church. Mr. Shaw thus describes him in answer to a question as to how much religion the governor is afflicted with: "He is quite liberal in so far as we can judge; a quiet, upright, and patriotic citizen, of broad charity and tolerance. We were his pastor four years, and during that time he paid his quarterage promptly, attended church about as regularly as men of his sense and judgment should be expected to, but we hav no recollection of his ever having taken the sacrament, and as to how much he believes or how little, we simply know nothing." Since Mr. Shaw left the pulpit and became a working heretic the governor has met him as kindly and affably as before, and the inference is that the executiv of Texas is not particularly pious.

The secretary of state, however, is a Christian, but the comptroller is not. The secretary believes that our government is founded on the Christian religion, and acts accordingly. This knowledge was elicited by the action of Mr. C. A. Graves, of Fiskville, who is endeavoring to hav the Bible removed from the school which his children attend, and who was referred by the various school authorities to the state board of education, composed of the above-named officials. Mr. Graves is a persistent gentleman, who deeply feels the injury done his children by the corruption of their education with superstitious instruction. He first appealed to the trustees of the school, who first took counsel of the county and state superintendents of education, and then replied that "they had directed a discontinuance of scripture-reading during school hours." This meant only a change in the order of proceedings in the school. The Bible would be read, when the teacher would tap a bell and announce that "school will now begin." This dishonest subterfuge did not satisfy Mr. Graves, and the state board has had his appeal before them for three months; but no action has been taken upon it, and he believes the board is afraid to meet the issue, or prefers to maintain by stealth what it is afraid to take openly. Under the administration of Ireland reading the Bible was left to the discretion of the teacher. But when Roberts ran the state, the Bible was peremptorily ruled out of the schools.

Mr. Graves should hav the support and countenance of every Liberal in the state, for whether he wins or not the agitation will help the next case by familiarizing the public with the question. If a little political pressure were also put upon the officials, it might also help. When Infidels band together and refuse to vote for any man who will not publicly avow his willingness to aid them in obtaining justice, the complete separation of church and state will be much nearer than it is now.

Ancient and Modern Beliefs.

The sacrificial system of the Jews is the foundation of the vicarious atonement scheme of the Christians. That is, the latter is barbarism retrograding, for, as a human life is more valuable than a sheep's life, so is—at least, one would so suppose—a God's life more valuable than a man's. Christ is called the lamb of God, because when John the Baptist so named him, he was speaking as a Jew, to Jews, and employed the language they had been used to in their sacrificial system. A religious paper offers as proof of the divinity of Jesus this regard that John the Baptist, Paul, and Peter had for him as a substitute for the lambs killed by the Jews under the law of Moses. Says the journal in question: "A lamb, under this system, was required to be offered every morning and evening as an atonement or sacrifice for sin. A lamb was the usual and most common victim in the Jewish system of sin-offerings; and when John, himself a Jew, and speaking to Jews, applied this term to Jesus of Nazareth, he clearly meant to say that this Jesus was destined to be the victim in a sin-offering yet to be made. This is the point of the analogy between him and the sacrificial lamb of the Jews, and the reason why the term was applied to him. Isaiah in one of his predictions relating to the messiah said that he would be 'brought as a lamb to the slaughter.' Paul also said: 'For even Christ our passover [paschal lamb] is sacrificed for us.' The Greek word, here translated 'passover,' means the paschal lamb, or the lamb that was slain at the feast of the passover. The apostle spoke of Christ, the lamb, as being 'sacrificed for us.' Peter tells us that our redemption is secured, not with 'corruptible things,' but with 'the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot.' One of the songs of heaven is in these words: 'Worthy is the lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing.' The names of the redeemed are said to be written 'in the lamb's book of life.' No one familiar with the language and the doctrin of the Bible in regard to Christ will hav any difficulty in seeing the reason why the term 'lamb' is applied to him."

We fail to see the improvement of this new scheme over the old. The Jews were barbarians who offered animals upon their altars to appease the supposed wrath of an imaginary deity. Even human sacrifices were not unknown to them, so barbarous and besotted in brutality were they. But the Christians go beyond them, and sacrifice a man upon a cross, and, if one may believe their theology, a God as well. Now, if heaven's throne is occupied by a good God, a God who loves justice and hates oppression, who admires a man for not shirking the responsibility of his own conduct, and hates a sneak—and a decent God would—how do the Christians think he will view their substitution of sacrifice? Will it please him better to hav a man slain than a sheep? or a God than a man? Is not their barbarity a little deeper and more brutal than that of the Jews?

A few weeks since we printed a horribly materialistic picture taken from a Roman Catholic journal, in which a young sheep was superimposed upon some clouds, with a halo around it, the blood streaming from its fore leg and being caught in chalices by winged angels, who were pouring it upon the heads of the damned in purgatory, who were by means of this blood to be finally rescued and taken up to heaven. The picture was designed by the church authorities to explain to their followers—most of whom cannot read—the plan of salvation. It was a plain, matter-of-fact explanation of Christian theology, expressed in the sensuous manner usual to Romanism. But who can object to that picture and not to this drawn by a Protestant writer in a Congregational paper? In the one case, the artist's pencil tells the story; in the other the pen is employed. Both are literal; both meant to be taken exactly as they appear; both equally beastly. Of Roman Catholicism we expect a good deal in the way of crude and barbaric symbolism, but in Protestantism we look for better things. Yet this writer has not even the excuse that he is a Methodist. Refined and progressiv Congregationalism drew this pen-picture of a man who was at once a sheep and a God, and who was sacrificed on the altar of barbarous ignorance to appease the wrath of another God, to save the world from being destroyed.

In the long-ago our ancestors—the human race—were naked savages, ferocious and almost brainless. They lived in caves, and when hungry crawled forth and with knotted clubs killed snakes for dinner. Their armor was a turtle shell; their musical instruments were tom-toms; their paintings daubs of yellow mud. When they lived near the water, their ships were logs, navigated by sitting astraddle. These people had a religion. Fear was its base; fear of Nature, and a personification of her elements. They believed in thousands of little ghosts, and one big ghost, boss of all the others. This boss ghost had passions, parts, and power, and to placate him our savage ancestors sacrificed animals and human beings upon the rude altars their medicin men had erected. They thought this pleased the boss ghost, who would in consequence restrain his passions and allow them to liv. They sang songs to this boss ghost; they told him how powerful he was; how weak they were, and unworthy to even mention his name; and by and by the medicin men wrote holy books by his inspiration in which he was put over all other ghosts, and those who denied his power were killed, and the world finally acknowledged that he was the real and veritable boss ghost of the universe.

Of course there is no analogy between the religion of our barbarous ancestors and the religion of to-day. The sacrifice of a sheep by a savage was barbarism; the sacrifice of a man upon a cross only is civilization. The savage was a heathen—a low-down, degraded monster—and his great ghost but a figment of his ignorant imagination. Our religion is much superior, and the only true one, because when God sacrifices his son the act is greatly superior to that of the savage, and its being done by God proves at once his divinity, the truth of the Christian religion, and the vast improvement of our morality over that of our ancestors. There is an enormous difference between sacrificing a sheep upon an altar and a God upon a cross. The first is of no use in procuring remission of sins, and is a mark of barbarism; the second is all-powerful, and a mark of civilization.

We trust the reader will readily perceive this stupendous chasm between the religion of our ancestors and our own religion. It is perfectly miraculous. And not the least miraculous aspect of the case is that he who reads of the savagery of our forefathers, and then of the transition of the sacrifice from sheep to God, is enabled to draw this distinction, so necessary to salvation and so ennobling to his moral faculties. Let us thank God that we are not barbarians!

Legal Illegality.

The legal profession of Missouri seems to be rather pious just now. Another witness has been cross-examined as to her religious opinions, contrary to and in violation of the state constitution. This occurred at St. Louis, in a suit between a husband and wife for the custody of their children. Mary Duff, of 1,227 Pine street, was put upon the stand. To impeach her credibility the lawyer on the other side asked her if she believed in any religion, when the following conversation took place:

"I am a Spiritualist," replied the witness.

"Are you a believer in a savior?"

"I do not know what you mean by 'savior;' there are sixteen crucified saviors, as history givs us—which do you mean?"

Mr. Goode: "As I only know of one, I cannot answer your question. Do you belong to any church?"

"I don't see that theology has anything to do with telling the truth," replied the witness.

"Is Spiritualism a religion?" asked Mr. Goode.

The witness: "I am not a doctor of theology."

"Do you believe in God?"

"I don't know what your understanding of God is," said the witness.

"I submit, your honor," said Mr. Goode, "that a witness who does not know any savior, who does not believe in God, and who belongs to no church, is not the proper person to swear to the moral character of any woman."

"Are you a believer in God, and can you tell the truth on the witness-stand?" asked Mr. Goode.

The witness: "I am not required by the law of qualifications to believe in the God of the Christians any more than in the God of the Jews or the god of the Mohammedans. I believe in the sanctity of my oath, as I believe in the obligation of my word; that is, that my word is not less binding upon me because I put it into the form of an oath."

The court: "The witness is not required to believe in any particular god."

After a few more inconsequential queries the witness was allowed to testify. The Globe-Democrat reports that she avowed her belief in "God as recognized and accepted by the Christians or the Jews," but this Mrs. Duff, in a letter to us, very vigorously denies. But a more important question is, Why do the courts allow these religious inquisitions when the constitution of the state forbids them?

Dr. Dix in Lent.

Each year in Lent Dr. Dix, rector of Trinity church, preaches a series of sermons which he thinks specially adapted to the period. Last year he talked about the women, and his abuse of them, the Pauline style in which he spoke of the female half of the human race, raised a storm of indignation, and avalanches of criticism buried him from public sight. It seems, however, that he has managed to dig his way out in time for this year's period of fasting and mortification of the flesh, and a week ago yesterday evening he rose up in Trinity chapel and preached another Lenten sermon. It was an anchoritish discourse, inspired by impotence, austerity, and puritanical piety. The audience was composed of women mostly, some of whom, say the papers, are leaders in society. Why they sat still under the abuse, is as inexplicable as why they support a church which degrades and enslaves them, and regards their womanhood as a mark of inferiority. These are some of Dr. Dix's slanders:

"When Adam and Eve sinned they were ashamed, for they knew that they were wicked. But men hav become hardened now, and hav set up the lust of the flesh as a special and worthy desire. Schools of philosophy teach this frightful doctrin. Poetry idealizes it. Painters and sculptors delight to picture the nude in lascivious forms. The carnal has been exalted with a cultus called religion. It is a noticeable fact that this sin, which theology has named concupiscence, goes hand in hand with Infidelity. St. Clement of Alexandria has depicted the shameful things of paganism in words which I will not repeat, but which, if I did, would drive you from your seats with horror. The characteristic of paganism has always been licentiousness. The battle which Christ began is still on—the church against the world, against pagan philosophy and habits. Wherever pagan philosophy is its followers adopt the horrid pagan practices as much as they can, and look wistfully back to the panorama of pagan lust and corruption in the old days.

"The devil has a double-headed propaganda on foot to-day—of Infidelity and of impurity. He is at work everywhere. The missionaries of the cross find the heathen naked, indolent, and licentious. And in France we see in this age a political propaganda of Atheism, and a social and literary carnival of indecency. There flourishes a literature which is unequaled for licentiousness in any time or age, and a school of art whose motto is to display the naked human body in every lascivious and filthy attitude. Nowhere is there a more easy field for this devil's propaganda than in America, and the signs of his handiwork are on every side. We see the public journals pandering to an unwholesome appetite by feeding the public mind with the filthy details of criminal and licentious deeds. We see a popular school of fiction the plots of whose books are mostly adultery, murder, seduction, and suicide, whose heroes and heroins lead immoral lives, and make a jest of purity. We see a poetry which seductivly stimulates animal passion; dramas which wet a sensual appetite, and glorify murder and shame; salacious and licentious figures used on every hand as advertisments; and pictures imported from a foreign school, and produced by a growing nativ school, I am ashamed to say, of a shockingly lascivious character.

"And what is the state of the society in which these things are? The poorer classes living in crowded tenement houses in which it is impossible to be decent! Girls among the higher classes taught to cultivate the attractions of their bodies and to lure men by these—young girls, with their lunches of a dozen courses and half a dozen courses of wine—shamefully attired at the opera and fondled there by the hands of careless men, and holding supper parties afterward, where the champagne and the liqueurs flow—listening to broad speeches and filthy gossip and unclean stories, which make them lose all faith in the virtue and manhood of men—when married, so accustomed to flattery and flirtation that their husband comes to occupy a second place in their affections, until separation or divorce follows!

"These are the commonest things to-day. We see men in high social places whom no self-respecting woman ought to admit over the threshold of her home—flirtations carried on by people each of whom has plighted his or her troth, probably, to two or three persons—scandal and disgraceful stories about households, with strange hinting at mysterious and immoral doings in high places the common gossip; married men with the devil's look in their eyes and the adulterers' desire in their hearts running after young girls, and all bidding the men and women hold their tongues who dare to cry out against the horrid business.

"If these are the things in sight in the open day, what in heaven's name are the things out of sight? Think of the sin and shame which one night in New York hides! In the slums and faubourgs, the dance-houses and ball-rooms, the theaters, with naked women on the stage and naked women in the boxes—with men behind the scenes dallying with the actresses—men who invent a story of business and absence for the ears of loving wives and daughters at home; the adulterer stealing forth and saying to himself, 'In the twilight no man shall see me!' I hav said all that I dare to say.

"The drift of the age is toward even greater license and indulgence. There is a school gaining ground which teaches that passion is natural and is to be obeyed. Oh, how great is the need of Christian women! What influence might they wield for the better—some I know who are absent and some whom I see before me! O woman! bethink you of your duty and your power. You know how young women are tempted, what books they read, the gossip they hear, the fool jests of evil-minded men which are poured into their ears while older women stand by as chaperons—the very life they lead, so that one season in society takes the bloom from the face and the modest look from the eye. Oh, will you help to do away with these things?"

Either Dr. Dix associates with some very indecent people, or he possesses an unspeakably foul mind. There is not much use in trying to reason with him. He is a kind of a St. Jerome of the nineteenth century. He ought to go into retreat and contemplate his own toes for a year or two, as he is unfitted for human society by reason of his defectiv organization.

But there are a few serious errors in his statements which may be pointed out. First, the pagans who horrified St. Clement were not so bad as the Christians of his own time and later. The orthodox church accused the schismatics of the most licentious conduct, and the heretics retorted in kind. "And it was confessed on all sides," says Gibbon, "that the most scandalous licentiousness of manners prevailed among great numbers of those who affected the name of Christians." Second. Pagan philosophy is as pure as Christian metaphysics, and the lives of pagan philosophers were chaste as snow beside the lives of Christian holy men. Compare Socrates with Solomon. Third. The morality of the heathen of the east is infinitly superior to that of the Christian of the west. Everyone knows that who knows anything at all of the subject. China, India, Japan, Turkey even—all are better in this regard than England and the United States. Fourth. The only countries where the missionaries can find the nativs naked are in the Polynesian and South Sea Islands; and in these places, all travelers tell us, the nativs liv simply and chastely, or did till the missionaries got among them. Fifth. Although France is more Atheistic to-day than ever before, the moral condition of the people is infinitly higher than when all France was Roman Catholic and Voltaire the "one old man in a wide field, with a whole herd of bulls burning to destroy him." Sixth. As to America, everybody here knows its condition. With the exception of the clergy, the people are moral enough, and growing in that direction all the time. To say that the artists and poets and novelists and journalists of to-day are panderers to licentious vice is the frothing of the crazy ascetic. Dr. Dix should take cooling draughts and put ice upon his head, before his fever takes a dangerous turn.

Editorial Notes.

THE bill for the repeal of the blasphemy law of England will probably be introduced in Parliament by Mr. Courtney Kenney at this session.

THE first Freethought paper ever published in Denmark, Norway, or Sweden has now been established for several months. It is called the Fritækeren.

THE Protestant churches of Boston are short on the clerical supply. The Boston Journal records thirteen vacant pulpits of various denominations. The trouble seems to be that men of sufficient brain power to suit the Bostonese hav too much to be ministers.

SEVERAL parties in Iowa and Nebraska having written Mr. E. A. Stevens desiring him to lecture for them, he wishes us to state that if a sufficient number of engagements can be made to pay the expenses of the trip he will be glad to make a tour. Let all who can see their way clear for having Liberal lectures in their towns write to Mr. Stevens at 750 West Lake street, Chicago, Ill.

IN the House of Commons on the night of the 14th Mr. Bradlaugh moved the second reading of the Oaths bill, which permits jurors, witnesses, officers of the army and navy, and all officials to affirm, if they so desire. After a hot debate, the bill passed its second reading, by a vote of 250 to 150, amid enthusiastic cheers. The bill will probably pass, and add one more to Mr. Bradlaugh's many victories for Freethought.

ST. GEORGE MIVART, the Catholic scientist who undertakes to reconcile Darwinism with the Bible, is coming to grief in all quarters. Sir James Stephens, an English Freethinker, has whacked him from the heretical side, and the Catholic papers are repudiating him, scolding him out of the church. Between the two, Mr. Mivart's position is uncomfortable, illustrating the old saying about the man trying to occupy two stools.

WE are informed that in a lecture delivered recently at Liberal, Mo., Mr. G. H. Walser stated that he had no fight with the church, and that he was opposed to the American Secular Union because that organization objected to the employment of chaplains in the United States army and navy. Is Mr. Walser contemplating a union with the church? If so, the Liberals of the country ought to know it, that he may not deceive them by posing as the founder of the only Infidel town in the country.

IN the arches court of the province of Canterbury, Lord Penzance decided recently that "the rubrics of the prayer-book were not merely directory, but were in their smallest incidents nothing less than positiv commands of law, strictly to be followed and faithfully obeyed." Mr. Bradlaugh thinks that now the Christians should not accuse him of unfairness when he presses on them quotations from the Book of Common Prayer as binding on all members of the Established Church.

WE congratulate Mr. J. M. Waters on his political victories in the city of Anniston, Ala. Mr. Waters is an outspoken Infidel, and everybody in his town knows it. His fellow-citizens recognized his ability and chose him for alderman, and his fellow-aldermen gave further proof of their esteem by electing him chairman of the committee on police and prisons, on health and hospitals, and, best of all, on public schools. We hope Mr. Waters will giv Anniston good police protection, without brutality or invasion of personal rights; good health and kind treatment of hospital patients, and good public schools without the teachings of superstition.

THE London correspondent of the New York Sun says that Sunday observance is rapidly going out of fashion in England. Sabbath-breaking among the mercantil and laboring classes is most observable in warm weather, but the Lord's Day Observance Society has presented a petition to the Upper House of Convocation, plaintivly lamenting that the ways of breaking the Sabbath in the higher grades of society were painfully numerous, including formal dinner parties, comic recitations, smoking concerts, exhibitions of jugglers, coach drives, boxing, lawn tennis, and dances at clubs and private houses. The startled bishops promptly passed a resolution asking the upper classes to stop their goings on. The bishop of London protested that it was no good to ask them to stop, and he was probably right. In England, Sunday is a day of gayety and festivity for everyone who can afford to make it so. It is practically the same as in France, with the exception that public places of amusement are closed, and that the enjoyment of the poor is confined to the hours spent in public-houses. If it were the desire of the Church of England to improve the morality of the people instead of to make them the property of the church on Sunday, that useless institution would see to it that the museums and libraries were opened on Sundays, and cheap out-of-door recreation provided for indoor toilers. But the church does not care for the people; it cares only for itself.

REUBEN DAILY, who made so much fuss over himself when he joined the Liberals some years ago, has gone back to Presbyterianism. Mr. Daily is the editor of a local journal somewhere in Indiana, and had ambitions to shine as a lecturer. Failing in this—not having the gifts—he kept still until an itching for office and notoriety (so says his friend Monroe) inspired him to join the church. Mr. Daily was originally an Englishman. His advent into Liberalism in this country occurred in 1878. He published his views in his own paper, and gave orders to the foreman of his printers to hav God spelt with a small g. We cannot regard men who consider that an argument as of very great mental caliber, and the Presbyterian church is welcome to them. Mr. N. Field, a townsman of Mr. Daily, sizes him and his conversion up as follows: "Reuben has several axes to grind, and he expects to make the grindstones by joining a popular church, teaching the greatest amount of error in the city. If he fails in his money-making scheme he will desert again and try something else." The local papers, in commenting upon the "conversion," say that Mr. Daily is a "very moral man," not using profanity or alcoholic beverages. But if Mr. Field's estimate of the new-born Presbyterian is accurate, the encomiums upon his moral character are misplaced. There are more immoral things in this world than profanity and rum, and the innumerable small vices in the average human seem to be consolidated in Mr. Daily's case into a few great ones. Alongside of a hypocrit and self-seeker a hearty but honest swearer is an angel of light.

Lectures and Meetings.

MR. CHAS. WATTS will deliver a four-night lecture course in Kent, Ohio, March 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th. Subjects: 1. "The Churches and Modern Thought;" 2. "Bible Morality;" 3. "Philosophy and Theology—A Contrast;" 4. "Roman Catholicism; Its Teachings and Doings."

THE following is C. B. Reynolds's list of lecture engagements so far as known:

San Bernardino, Cal.	March 26, 27, 28.
Riverside, Cal.	29.
San Jacinto, Cal.	30, 31. April 1.
Diamond Mines, Cal.	2, 3, 4.
San Diego, Cal.	6, 7, 8.
National City, Cal.	9, 11, 12.
Los Angeles, Cal.	14, 15.
Santa Ana, Cal.	17, 18, 19.

California friends desiring lectures should write to Mr. Reynolds at any of the above places so letters will reach two days ahead of dates.

Letters from Friends.

KANSAS CITY, MO., Feb. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The Sam Jones & Co. revival has just closed here, with the following results and converts: To Presbyterian church, four; Baptist, two; Methodist, sixteen, and one girl adjudged insane yesterday and sent to the asylum, on account of his preaching so much hell. Collection for the Jones fund a little over $6 000. A collection was taken up on Sunday last amounting to $1.090 to pay some old bills of Sam Small before professing religion—perhaps whisky bills.

Very respectfully yours, A. B. Fox.

HEURELTON. Feb. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR:.I write to inform you of the death of my grandfather, Otis C. Jillson, who has been a constant reader of your paper for the last fourteen or fifteen years, and who thought a great deal of the paper. He was taken from us very suddenly. We arose in the morning and found him dead on the floor, his wife being away from home at the time. She has lost a noble, good husband; we, a kind and good grandfather. He was ever ready to help the needy; and also to investigate so-called Spiritualism, and believed a great deal in it. JENNIE L. JILLSON.

CARROLL, IA., Feb. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find fifty cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1888 and Colonel Ingersoll's argument on "Blasphemy," in Reynolds's case, Morristown, N. J.

I had a dispute with a friend of mine as to the correct pronunciation of Ingersoll's name. I say the long sound of the letter o is correct; he says not. Please inform me.

Yours cordially, A. S. GOOKLEY, M.D.

[The o in Colonel Ingersoll's name is not a long o. It is usually pronounced as u short and obscure; some giv it the sound of broad ä, as in "all."—ED. T. S.]

FT. WORTH, TEX., Feb. 13, 288.

MR. EDITOR: Since my last we hav had the great Remsburg with us. It may hav been intended by the Christians as it was—at any rate, the court house had been engaged for him, but the janitor could not be found, nor anyone else who had a key. Yet we got in about 9 o'clock P.M., and in a remarkably short time we had a fire going and started the ball rolling to a small but very select audience. Doubtless the house would hav been crowded had we been able to effect an entrance at the proper time, as a great many people came and left before 8 o'clock. There were several ladies present, and everybody seemed happy. We will try and arrange to hav Mr. Remsburg with us about March 1st. The evangelists hav left, and the Catholic fair is in full bloom.

Respectfully, C. E. ILLSEN.

HAVANA, CUBA, Feb. 8, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am at a loss to know how, while our United States Constitution provides that Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, and the law provides that the great seal of the United States shall not be affixed to any other than constitutionally legal documents, Mr. Cleveland could dare to affix that great seal, together with his signature (not that of the president of the United States), to a "Thanksgiving" proclamation. The president of the United States, having none other than constitutional powers, cannot do it, though Mr. Cleveland may—and commit murder, too, if you please, though in violation of law and of his oath of office. If Mr. Cleveland cannot be impeached for that act, then he can be impeached for any other illegal act only by a preponderance of influence, just as a great majority of the cases are decided by the judges of our courts throughout the Union. Because of votes cast by silly gawkies, ours is a government of influence. Anarchy! No, you bet, I am not an Anarchist! I've had enough of it. GEORGE NEWTON.

OXFORD, MICH., Feb. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: By inclosed you will see that I hav secured two new subscribers for your valuable paper. I hav sent all the TRUTH SEEKERS that I hav received for the last three years on errands of conversion among the people. Some are received by the clergy, and some by other classes. I think that your light is too bright to be hid under a bushel. It is amusing to me to read the different letters your correspondents write that you print in THE TRUTH SEEKER—to see how positiv some are that there is no life after death, as we generally understand the term, while others are equally certain that we liv in a future state of existence. The Spiritualists are very certain of it, but Uncle Winter is certain that we do not. Now, between the two extremes I reason thus: There are four facts in nature that we can all agree upon, that is, time, space, matter, and life. The four hav always existed. Vegetable life developed out of mineral, and animal life out of vegetable, and man, the highest type of animal life, out of the lower order of animal life. Man we find possessed of more knowledge. Out of knowledge is developed wisdom just in proportion as he becomes Liberal. (I would state right here that some that claim to be Liberal hav hardly outgrown orthodoxy.) When man acquires wisdom enough, he will begin to see harmony in all nature, and the wiser he becomes, the more he will incline to believe that he is a part of the great, stupendous whole. I can see nothing but change in all matter, and that change leads to higher evolutionary forms. Who ever saw a live man? No one, unless it was clairvoyantly. We see the house that he livs in, the body. All the actions of man, no matter of what kind, are the result of spirit manifestation. Where is the man now in the body that can tell what the next fifty years will unfold to the living? In my opinion, we are living in a spiritual age now, but many of us of rather a distant order from that to which at some future time all will be unfolded. No man ever had knowledge enough to destroy one particle of matter; how much less can life become extinct! Who is there that can not see a yoke of cattle in a load of hay?

Please find inclosed one extra dollar, for which send me the ANNUAL for 1888, John Peck's "Absurdities," and the balance in something worthy of reading that I can pass around among friends. O. F. DELANO.

SALEM, IA., Feb. 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I want to tell you and the readers of your valuable paper that on the evening of the 2d of the present month we had the pleasure of listening to a Liberal lecture delivered by Mrs. Freeman, of Chicago. The lecture was listened to by an appreciativ audience, although it was the first lecture of the kind ever delivered in this priest-ridden town. A goodly number turned out, although the roads were very bad, and the weather unfavorable. Her subject was one of deep thought and research. She commenced at the creation of Adam and described the process by which he became a living soul. But the poor woman, who was an afterthought, was not privileged with a similar process for the purpose of becoming a living soul. hence the belief for centuries that women had no soul. No wonder they were so badly treated. At the close she gave an invitation to all or any to ask questions or criticise her lecture. As the ice is now broken, we hope soon to hav another intellectual treat of Freethought. F. D. AND C. SHELDEN.

HURON, DAK., Feb. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I saw a notice in a late number of your valuable paper to the effect that the book by Rev. Justin D. Fulton, entitled, "Rome in America," was a work of such a character that the women compositors had refused to set type on it, as it was obscene. Now, I did not believe one word of the statement, inasmuch as I am skeptical on many things I see in print. I sent for a copy, read it attentivly, and declare I found nothing which could be twisted into obscenity; nothing but an earnest appeal to resist the power of the pope in America, for protection of public schools, and, last but not least, for the conversion of Catholics to Protestantism by the grace of God.

I hav just finished reading "Men, Women, and Gods," by Miss Gardener. This is a work which should be read by every woman in the land. She is a powerful writer, and her arguments are such as to carry confusion into the camp of her opponents.

About a year ago a minister lectured here on "Woman Suffrage," and made the statement that all that woman has or had she owed to the Bible and Christianity. When will women read for themselvs and know when they are lied to?

Yours for the truth, A. H. RISDON.

BAVARIA, KAN., Feb. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The Lord—the God of the Jews—has been vindicated here. It makes no difference if it did take the wages for two months, and one-half of a widow's only support, in the middle of an extraordinarily hard winter—he had to be vindicated. And the only crime consisted in following the example set by the followers of the good and lowly Jesus. Two of our young men laughed in one of their meetings—and, from all accounts, I think they had good reason for doing so. They were arrested, taken to Salina, nine miles—when we had a justice of the peace and other officers here—and fined $50 each and costs; and by the same parties who tried to break up our meetings while Brother Putnam was here. The justice impressed upon their minds very forcibly that they were very lucky to get off at that, and that they could not fool with the Lord.

Now, I do not believe in interrupting their meetings in any way, but they could hav used a little more reason and justice in their examples. But some one must be made an example as to what they would do if they had a chance, and I think we will make a move to hav that justice of the peace put upon the supreme bench of our state.

T. H. TERRY, Sec. Bavaria Secular Union.

TALENT, ORE., Feb. 10, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: The 151st anniversary of the birthday of Thomas Paine was observed by a few progressiv Liberals and Spiritualists (our mossback Liberals stayed at home) on Sunday, January 29th, in the Universal Mental Liberty Hall. The hall was tastefully decorated with mottoes in evergreen—on one side: "To do Justice to Mankind, Scorn the Priest and Free the Mind;" on the other side: "Reason is our Guide, Truth our Pride;" over the entrance: "In Science we Trust," and back of the stage, "Seek for Truth." The pictures of Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll were decorated in evergreens and everlasting flowers. The exercises consisted of instrumental music and singing by the Universal Mental Liberty choir, short speeches and select reading by the members, and an original poem, by Miss Rosetta Waters, written for this occasion.

And now, Mr. Editor, I hav to say a few words of praise for THE TRUTH SEEKER illustrations and its editorials. I hope you will always publish a Liberal paper. I take a good many Liberal papers, and THE TRUTH SEEKER comes as near as any to being a true Liberal publication. I hope the barking of the intolerant faultfinders in regard to the illustrations, and the fairness you showed to the murdered Anarchists, will not affect the present policy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. From the tone of their letters, I think they compare well with the mossback Liberals of this place. They are more benefit to the church than to the Liberal cause. Those who keep the flag of Freethought flying are those proscribed ones, Anarchists and Spiritualists. In my judgment, THE TRUTH SEEKER has done more than any other Liberal paper in destroying the respectability of the paternalistic church; but in attacking the church you only strike at the effect. The cause lies deeper, and you find it in society, which upholds our paternalistic government. You are afraid of the state, not the church. I, as an Anarchist, know that Anarchy is a mental growth; that there is a continual progress in human society from hierarchy to Anarchy; that Anarchy, or the sovereignty of the individual, is the condition of adult society, and will come from necessity, if we only remove some of our present unnatural social conditions, and by so doing make the way clear for higher social development. If this is treason to some of our "Liberal" sectarians, let them make the most of it.

Hoping THE TRUTH SEEKER will outliv all bigotry and intolerance in Liberals as well as in Christians, I am,

Yours for universal mental liberty, WM. H. BREESE.

FARMERSVILLE, IND., Feb. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to say for the benefit of our many friends that Brother Bell was here the 8th of February, and gave a lecture on "Liberty and Morality" to a full and crowded house. How is it that a Liberal can tell so much truth in so short a time? Two young men in this neighborhood told me that since the lecture they had thrown off the last garb of superstition, and hav put on the full armor of Infidelity. One of the members of the Campbellite church took great pains to hav his preacher here to reply to Mr. Bell, so, what do you think?—when Mr. Bell closed his speech and stepped aside, the little man of God wilted and could not say a word, although he had taken two pages of notes. I think he will reply some day in his pulpit, like all cowards. Here is the way some of the Christians talk since Mr. Bell left here. Some say that he should not be allowed to speak; some say that he ought to be hanged; others say that he ought to be tied to a stake and his books piled around him and burnt. So, you see, hell is in the Christians yet. Ever since God commanded Mose to shed so much blood it has been in the Christians, even to this day. There is quite a strong Liberal element here, and we are going to organize now in a few days. Then we will hear the threats of fire and fagot. If the Christians will keep their hands off we are safe, for we fear not their God. We believe in a good God, while they believe in a bad one. The churches in this place hav the dry rot, and I think when we get organized then it will be safe for Mr. Bell to visit Farmersville; but if you could hear the talk since the lecture, you would think the days of the Inquisition about to return, and that it was to make its headquarters in Farmersville. W. W. BISHOP.

BURLINGTON, KAN., Feb. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I had the pleasure of reading your issue of February 4th. Allow me to say that I am in full sympathy with the objects and aims of your paper, and should be a subscriber if I could do justice to more Liberal papers than I am now taking, viz., two. The reason of my writing this letter is that in C. B. Reynolds's article dated December 29th and 30th he grossly misrepresents Kansas, and I, through your paper, desire to correct his misstatements. He says the climate of Kansas is execrable. This is known to be false in every way. No person of sound mental and physical make-up who had spent twelve months in Kansas can be found who will not giv the lie to this his first insult to us. Lie No. 2: "Old settlers, who hav no interest in real estate booms, admit that in thirty years past Kansas has only averaged one crop in three years—two failures to one success. But the malaria is always a full crop." I hav been a resident of Kansas sixteen years, and there has never been a failure of crop in that time. To be sure, we hav at times light crop years, but in sixteen years' experience we hav not had to exceed four seasons of this kind. I feel sure Brother Reynolds when he penned this article had more malaria in his system than ten average Kansans ever had in their whole lives; also that he must hav had an attack of the "janders" while in Missouri, and hav been still under its influence.

Our city of Burlington feels that we hav worse than thrown away our money in giving it to him, and I venture to say that there is not a Liberal among us who has read this article of his who would giv a cent a lecture to hear him again. Presumably the habit of misstating facts while acting as pulpit-pounder has so firm a hold on him that he can not help doing so yet. I speak not alone my own sentiments in the above, but the sentiments of every reader of your paper that I hav seen. We want Liberal lecturers in Kansas, but we do not want cranks. JOHN I. JONES.

OSHKOSH, WIS., Feb. 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: A couple of weeks ago one of our local preachers made the remark during his discourse that he believed Christ had already made his second appearance on earth, and that he is here now. Well, I got to thinking it over, and I came to the conclusion that he was right. And I think I hav seen him, and he is six feet high without boots. And he came among us under different circumstances this time—better off in this world's goods, I mean, for he does not hav to go into other people's corn-fields and steal corn on Sundays, but is able to hav a good, square dinner at home in the bosom of his family—for I am told he has a family, and a very interesting one at that. And he does not say he comes to bring a sword, but he comes to enlighten the people. I believe he was here in the United States long before many of the people knew it, and do not think he let himself be known very much until about twenty-five years ago. Perhaps he was afraid they would crucify him, as they did before, and not giv him time to get in his work. I think he has improved very much during his vacation, and I think he must hav attended some public school, for he can read and write first-rate now, and as for speaking—why, he is simply immense. When he came among us before he did not marry (but he was only a young man then). But now he believes in it, and I do not blame him, for I am that way myself. And then, again, he is proof against the devil this time, for the devil and all his imps could not carry him up to the top of a mountain unless he wished to go, and although he is not a pugilist, I think he could knock the devil out in one round. He is not so puny as he used to be, and believes in striking back if anyone hits him. I hav seen him, and know whereof I speak. There is one thing in particular I like him for, and that is, he does not go around boasting that he is the son of any God. He is more modest than he used to be, and this time he claims to hav come into the world naturally. No ghost business about it, you know; and that looks more reasonable to me, for I do not take any stock in ghosts anyway. And then, again, he does not go around raising the dead as he did before, but he givs the living a pretty lively shaking up, and it will do the whole world good before he is done. It is very evident he has evoluted very much, for he does not believe in slavery now, and I think he has done more and is doing more good than all the sixteen crucified saviors ever did. His folks puzzled their brains a good deal to know what to call him, for it would not do to giv him the same name he had before, for it was unlucky, so they concluded to call him Robert G. Ingersoll.

P.S.—The books came all right, and are all loaned out. "John's Way" is having a boom here among the Christian ladies. Wish I had more of them. G. M. H.

WELLS, MINN., Feb. 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find letter received yesterday morning from one of the faithful. Several letters hav passed between this gentleman—who, by the way, is a reverend, a sky-pilot—and myself. This one is in answer to my last. You see he answers every argument I advance. What a fine thing it is to hav lots of faith to crawl behind! But you may rest assured he will need more faith to crawl behind when he gets the answer to this letter. Too bad we cannot hav the Dark Ages, so our Christian brethren—and our brother herein mentioned in particular—could hav the old way of answering our arguments. W. L. HORTON.

WENTWORTH, DAK., Feb. 3, 1888.

MR. W. L. HORTON: Yours of the 29th inst. came to hand on Monday last. I am sorry you talk as you do, but since it is your choice I will leave it in your full possession, but, Brother Horton—I am so used to calling almost everyone whom I write to "brother," so I will not deviate this time, even to you—let me say that I am well acquainted with all you say in a general sense, and, as Job says, "What ye know I also know," and I am not inferior to you in all of your knowledge in relation to this subject. I did not write with the expectation of such a lecture, but it does not offend me in the least. But the day will come when it will try you to the depths of your soul—not only your reason, but ten thousand times above all your reason, judgment, and understanding; and I predict that unless you change your mind from reason to naked faith and belief in the religion of Jesus Christ and his power on earth to forgiv sins and save your soul, the time will not be long when eternity, with all its horrors will so fasten upon you that death itself would be a happy state if it would only end all there. Well, let me tell you some things that I know, and of which you do not know anything, and then I am done. I know these things better than I know that two and two make four. I lived for years a wretched, miserable man. I cared for nobody. My home was not attractiv to myself. My wife—God bless her, as good a woman as ever a man was blessed with—was no satisfaction to me. But there came a time without ever being preached to or prayed for, for I was alone, when all these things you term reason did not amount to so much as rotten pea-straw. I tell you the world by reason or wisdom knew not God, and it is no wiser in these things now than then, and you will see that the wisdom of this world is foolishness to God. And I cried, "O God! save me!" Now I know I am a saved man and washed in the blood of Jesus Christ, the lamb of God, that takes away the sins of the world—not by reason, but by faith, which has become, by obedience to his will, a knowledge above all reason and worldly wisdom; and it is good for the souls in danger, in darkness, and in the deepest sorrow.

Glory to Jesus for this wonderful salvation! My soul is full of it, and I am happy! Amen and amen!

Your friend and well-wisher, A. C. VINE.

PHELPS, Mo., Feb. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Remember me as one of the kind and faithful in Freethought. I am a poor man, of middle age, unmarried, and in the lecturing field, which I hav followed for nine years, and hav delivered over nine hundred lectures in the middle Western states—in all eleven hundred lectures—on phrenology, physiognomy, ethnology, and geology. Of course, studying ethnology, I hav had to study the Bible myths and the origin of man, and I find the birthplace of man seems to hav been in the central part of Asia on the highest plains, just south of the Caspian sea. Eighty thousand years ago the first emigration was made by the Turanian nation. I use Liberal ideas in every lecture, and when I lecture on geology I knock the bottom clear out of the ark or flood theory, and the whale story, the age of man, and all Bible teaching. I even make preachers laugh at some of the absurdities. I take two Freethought papers, or I pay for two. After I read mine I send it to some good Freethinking person in the fourteen states I hav traveled over, and urge him to subscribe for it—which a number hav done. So I want the good work to swell and go on.

I hav had poor health the last year, and up to this date I hav been sick five times since last August. My expenses hav been great for a poor man who depends altogether on his lectures. But THE TRUTH SEEKER, I cannot do without it. And those pictures of Mr. Watson Heston are the very life of the ancient people. I hope he will continue them as long as he livs.

I wear my gold badge that I bought of Brother C. B. Reynolds. Before I was taken sick I prepared the way for him here in this way. I came here to Phelps the 17th of December, and gave a free lecture to a house of one hundred and twenty-five people on the phrenology and the progress of man. I illustrated the superstition and old-fogy ideas of men from the Dark Ages up to the present time, link after link, until I could come to where I could recommend Brother Reynolds very highly as one of superior intelligence who is preparing a way for perpetual freedom of man, so man could liv and enjoy a fountain of highest intelligence. So I told my audience I would not lecture to-morrow night, for I was going to hear this intelligent speaker, and I invited them out. So his hall was crowded, and Brother Reynolds gave a noble lecture, and has converted many to Freethought by it here. There hav been twenty names enrolled as a Freethought society, and will be more. I hav strewn Freethought papers around here, so there will be, I know, many who will subscribe for the paper.

I can safely say one-fourth of the church people to-day are Freethought people. If it were not for women we would not hav churches, as preachers cannot get many men out. Women generally are not so well posted on theology as men, and they think the preachers are telling the truth, and are model men of the day. I say they are the worst criminals of the land, and if there was a hell they would be all there in good time a mile deep for leading millions of people astray. They do not believe what they preach, but do that work because they can liv on chickens and hav a good time.

I want this letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, so I can get acquainted with all the writers. They write well, all of them, and I feel proud of them. I feel as though I was a brother to them all; and I am, in Freethought.

PROFESSOR RANDLEMAN, Phrenologist.

JASPER, TENN., Feb. 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In August, 1876, I began to edit and publish the Sequachee Sun. In my salutatory I announced that I was a Republican, and that I belonged to the Christian (Campbellite) church. I made it hot for Democracy, and published several lectures for the benefit of penitents. In my travels I ran across a stray copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the second number containing Heston's Bible illustrations, which struck me very forcibly. I hav been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER every week since, distributing the numbers after reading them among my friends, many of whom enjoy it hugely. My lectures to penitents ceased to put in an appearance shortly after I read the first TRUTH SEEKER, simply because I could not refute the arguments set forth in its columns. Last year I raised Cain, or sheol, or something else by stating that the Mormons had more Bible authority to sustain their creed than the Methodists had for theirs, and that I was opposed to persecuting the Mormons and confiscating their property on account of their faith and practices. Pulpit, press, and many smart Alecks pitched into me indiscriminately, abusing me for what I did not say, misrepresenting my article entirely, causing my subscribers to stop the paper, until I finally sold out my interest in the Sequachee Sun, and hav now retired to private life a wiser, if not a better, man. If the preachers and members of the church are to be believed, I am a bad man, not fit for decent society. I do not see that I am any worse than I was before I quit the church and quit donating funds to its support. I still pay my debts when I hav the money or any property that my creditors will take in exchange for what I owe them, and that was all I did while I was a bright and shining light, following in the footsteps of the meek and lowly lamb. I do not think I tell any more lies now than I did before, or that I am less charitable to the suffering and distressed. I hav a pretty large family—ten—dependent on my efforts for subsistence; an aged father eighty-one years old; an invalid sister who is blind and helpless and has not walked for many years, and who requires the constant attention of some able-bodied servant to watch over her night and day. I am afflicted with scrofulous rheumatism myself, and needed the proceeds arising from the publication of the paper to support those dependent on me. I am at present out of a job, with two of my children sick—one with the mumps, and I do not know what ails the other. In the sale of the printing-office I reserved the right to read THE TRUTH SEEKER during the time it continued to come to the Sequachee Sun. As it was partially the cause of my failure, like the dog, I licked the hand that struck me. In other words, I shall continue to read the paper that has undone my fortune, unless it fails to put in an appearance.

The other day I was told by a Methodist that I was unfit to liv in decent society. I picked up his Bible and pointed to a few passages in it, and asked his opinion of its decency and morality. He said I was so blinded by sin that I could not understand the meaning of the language used; that he had had a change of heart, and fully comprehended its meaning. I tried to get him to expound it to me, and he answered that I was too far gone to comprehend it, and then the discussion ended.

I think all Liberals who are able ought to chip in to help defend Messrs. Harman and Walker. Do not wait till they are convicted, but act immediately. If I was able I would cheerfully foot the entire bill of their defense for the cause of liberty and free speech. I feel the effects of ostracism and proscription, and can sympathize with all who are persecuted for opinion's sake. If the different denominations of Christians were united, they would force our law-makers to enact another batch of Blue laws for all who failed to throw up their hats and hurrah for their old blackguard Bible. They can shut off my customers, but they cannot shut off my thinking apparatus. I am like Collins's ram—I hav a head of my own and do my own butting; and sometimes, like the ram, I hav butted a stump with a rag on it, yet my head seems to hold its own pretty well. Three cheers and a tiger for Heston and THE TRUTH SEEKER!

AMOS L. GRIFFITH.

ALEXANDRIA, CAN., Feb. 13, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I once heard it said that when France became Infidel it was time a change of some kind should take place, as half of France was owned by the church, and consequently paid no taxes and was in nowise productiv of any material benefit to the people. I fancy it will not be many years before the same state of affairs reveals itself in this Canada, particularly in the province of Quebec, where the clergy rules with an iron arm, and the priests and nuns swallow down everything that has a good taste. It may be interesting to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to hear a couple of instances of my personal experience in this matter. Fifteen or eighteen years ago an aunt of mine was robbed of the biggest portion of her fortune at the death of her husband by a nun—daughter of her husband by his first wife. The greed and dishonesty displayed by the dying man's daughter, and by the other nuns and the priests that assisted her in the shameful work of deceiving her dying father and robbing her brothers and her stepmother, had so scandalized my aunt that for a few years she gave the Roman Catholic church the cold shoulder, but after a time she was brought back to the fold. She spent the last years of her life in a convent, where she died and left the balance of her fortune. At her death presents were sent to all members of the family to remember her by. My portion was an old prayer-book, which I did not keep. My charity being greater than my affection for my aunt, I returned the book with the request that it should be given to some one who had use for it, as I had none.

Three or four years ago an uncle of mine, named Francis Proteau, died, leaving an estate variously estimated from $15,000 to $50,000. My opinion is that it was about $25,000. He had no children, and the whole fortune was left for my aunt to liv on and to dispose of at her death or to leave for the legal heirs, who were the nephews. When I was about sixteen years old, I lived with them one winter, and they had taken a great liking to me. They kept much money, and were constantly in fear of robbers, but they had such a high opinion of my courage that they felt perfectly safe when I was with them. They lived at St. Eustache, a village twenty-five miles west of Montreal. My uncle was a great contractor, and there was no bank in the place; hence the necessity of his keeping a large sum of money in his house. When they got too old to do business and rich enough to liv without work, they moved to Montreal. Eight years ago I also lived in Montreal, and called on the old folks occasionally, and at every encounter the old folks, who were very ignorant and consequently not very delicate of manners, always apostrophized me with a reminder that they were old and must soon die, and the promis that I would be the principal heir. They had never forgot what a brave boy I was when I lived with them. I had twice driven away from the house night prowlers who had undoubtedly come to rob them. Once I told them in the presence of my wife and my son to liv and enjoy their fortune as long as possible; that for my part I preferred their company to their money, and that, indeed, I had no hope of ever touching a cent of it. Oh, but they reiterated their promis, and gave me to understand that they were not in the habit of promising what they did not intend to do. I said: "Yes, I believe you are honest and sincere in what you say, but I also believe I know a few things you hav not thought of. You must hav the visits of priests and nuns pretty often. They will persuade you to g and finish your existence in one of their homes, as they do all old people who hav money, and when you die what money will ever come out of that place will never satiate anybody's cravings for your fortune." They would not believe me, but my prophecy was consummated to a T. As I said before, three or four years ago my uncle died, after which my aunt retired to a convent. About a year ago she died. The first intimation I had of her having been sick was a dispatch informing me of her death. The message was from one of my cousins, who had attended her on her deathbed and was not paid. I was so confident that I had been omitted in the will that I refused to pay for the message, and I did well. I learned by letters from relativs that my cousin who had sent the message had got $500; my two brothers, $150 each; a widowed sister of my uncle, who has a large family to support and is very poor, had received a similarly insignificant gift, and I, the man known by many priests and called by them "Voltaire the Second," was completely omitted in the will. The poor old woman had been persuaded that she could never reach heaven if she gave anything to an Infidel. The balance of the fortune had been distributed to the several religious institutes of Montreal, for which the Catholic Seminary of Montreal is to educate one of the heirs. I am now in receipt of a letter from one of my nephews, an orphan and very poor, informing me that he has been chosen as the recipient of the education, and the letter, apparently written by him, but dictated by an older head, informs me that the institute is obliged to educate him, but not to provide for him in any way, and that consequently such things as clothing, books, etc., he will expect to receive from me and my above-mentioned cousins, we being the only ones in the family able to support him. Two months ago I went to Montreal, and got the following details of the scene that took place at my aunt's deathbed. I do not know how true it is, but it is at least very probable. When the old lady was dying, my cousin and a priest stood by her, and while she was in a fit of agony the priest reached in her pocket and took the key to the box of her treasure. My cousin demanded it, saying he was the rightful guardian of it. The priest refused. My cousin clinched him, and a tussle ensued. The nuns came in and parted the combatants, allowing the priest to retain the key. My cousin went to some lawyer, intending to contest the will on the strength of certain letters and papers in his possession, by which he could prove that my aunt had been intimidated, but subsequently he conferred with the priest, and, finding that he could get more in that way than he would get in the division of the estate between the legal heirs, he gave up the damaging papers and compromised with the clerical rogue.

These are not isolated cases. That kind of hellish work is continually going on. The Roman Catholic clergy of Canada I know to be the biggest lot of unbelievers in the country. Instead of their minds being bent to the saving of souls, their sole occupation is to see where the money is and concoct their diabolical plans to get it. CHAS. LAPEROHE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight.
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Our Flag.

Roses from the fairies' bowers,
Lilies of the brook sprites' dell,
Twine with violets entrancing,
Wreathed by hands that love them well.
Fluttered by a gentle zephyr,
Each rose captiv holds its hue;
Rustled by the riding breezes,
Still the lilies' color's true;
Shaken by the fiercest ragings,
From no violet fades its blue,
For the crimson, white, and azure
Ever, ever will be new.

'Tis the flag which shields our homesteads
From the thunder of the foe;
'Tis the emblem of our freedom,
Of a one-time tyrant's woe.
As it proudly waves, the sunlight
Golden paints each silken fold,
Fanning to new flame the fires
Of our hearts that, growing cold,
Embered o'er a patriot's virtue,
Turning essence into mold.
May thy mem'ry, glorious beacon,
Never be one moment old. G. H. S.

How to Make Up.

Two little people, who couldn't agree,
Were having a tiff, and were "mad as could be;"
They looked at each other in silence awhile,
Till a sudden glad thought made one of them smile.
Said she: "Say, you ain't very mad, are you, Bessie?"
"Well—no," said the other, "nor you, are you, Jessie?"
"Then let us make up," little Jessie suggested.
"Well—you be the one to begin," Bess requested.
But that didn't suit. So the tiff lingered still,
While both of the children were claiming their will,
When—what do you think brought at last sunny weather?
Just this: they agreed to—begin both together.

Don't Do It.

Don't use slang expressions. The cant phrases and words of the street do not sound well coming from anybody's lips. And yet how common it is to hear nice-loooking boys and sweet-faced girls utter the silliest nonsense in ordinary conversation, abusing the "king's English" to a most alarming extent upon every occasion!

It certainly is a jar upon the nerves to hear from a high school boy or girl the words: "I'll bet yer!" "Bet your boots!" "Oh, cheese it!" "Great Scott!" or "Great Cæsar!" "Did you ever?" "Shoot the hat!" "Pull down your vest!" "Wipe off your chin!" and many similar expressions.

It certainly is not a mark of refinement to use the slang words of the street at home, in school, or, in fact, anywhere. But insensibly slang creeps everywhere. It is easily acquired, and when once the habit of talking slang is fixed, it is hard to get rid of. The habitual use of extravagant and slangy language makes a person appear coarse and rough. It is better never to acquire a bad habit, and everyone should try to guard against all bad habits, and especially the habit of using extravagant expressions of every kind.

As a nation, the American people are not apt to be over-accurate, and the difference between false statement and exaggerated truth is so slight that one should be continually upon his guard lest he make the fatal mistake of sending out falsehood for truth.

Some think it very smart to rattle off slang words upon every occasion, but it is the reverse of smartness. To be familiar with all the slang of the street brings one into a dangerous proximity to classes who tread a downward path.

Therefore guard well your speech. A word once uttered cannot be recalled. Let the thoughts be clean and the speech be pure, and then there need be no fear for the future.
S. H. W.

FOR the benefit of those who are getting tired of "Truly rural" as a cure for stammering the following is respectfully submitted: Pronounce rapidly, "She sells seashells; shall she sell sea-shells?"

PEDESTRIAN: "Madam, a boy who I am told is your son has just thrown a stone at me, causing a wound that is very painful. What are you going to do about it?" Mother: "I don't know; hav you tried arnica?"

Correspondence.

BELTON, TEX., Feb. 23, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My father and mother liv on a sheep ranch, and I liv with my grandfather and grandmother and go to school. Grandpa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it was printed. I like to liv in Texas. I am seven years old. I hav learned the piece in the Corner called the "Golden Keys." I am going to speak it in school. Yours truly, ORIN W. BEVERLY.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Feb. 29, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I write for the purpose of proposing my name to your society, Speak No Evil. I think it is a good thing, and hav intended to send my name ever since I read your article. I am corresponding with Lulie De Taylor, of Kansas, who sometimes writes for the Children's Corner. I would like to hav some little girls of the Corner write to me—some one near my own age, eleven years. Hoping that all the rest of the little girls will send their names to your society, I remain,
Your friend, IDA A. BALLOU.

DECATUR CITY, IA., Feb. 25, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I was nine years old the 9th of this month. My mamma has been dead for three years. I lived with my grandpa and grandma for a while, but now I liv with my adopted papa and mamma. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I read the Children's Corner every week. I like it very much. I like to stay here better than I do at grandpa's, because grandma is very religious, and made me go to Sunday-school. Now I don't hav to go if I don't want to. Papa got me "The Story Hour," and I like it very much. Yours truly, MAUDIE PARRISH.

SODUS, MICH., Feb. 26, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a few lines this very cold day. We left our home in Ohio the 7th of February. It was pleasant weather when we started, but it has been very cold here, with the exception of a few days. I think I will like Michigan, and will be glad when we get to keeping house; we are visiting at my aunt's, and hav a very pleasant time. We do not get our TRUTH SEEKER very regularly now, and do not suppose we will until we find out our future post-office address. I like the Children's Corner and enjoy reading the letters. I am a little girl thirteen years old. I wish to be a member of the Speak No Evil Society. I hope all the boys and girls will join, but they do not seem to be in any hurry about it.
Yours truly, ZELLA FITZPATRICK.

OSCEOLA, IA., March 1, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As you were so kind as to publish my letter, I thought I would try another. We are having rainy weather now, and it is very muddy. School was out last Saturday. Papa is going off this spring to find us a new location in the Southwestern territories or states. Dear Miss Wixon, I can just imagin how you look, and what color your eyes are, and how tall you are, and what kind of a dress you wear. As I can imagin all these, I am anxious to know if I am right. I would like to get your picture. If you will send it, I will put it in a pretty frame and try to keep it nice. If you will be kind enough to send it, answer in the margin of my letter by yes or no. Pearl and I were over to our Uncle Reuben Jones's on Wednesday and stayed all night; we had a nice time playing with our cousins. Well, I will close.
Yours very truly, JENNIE GIGRAY.

[Miss Wixon will try and remember Jennie when she has some new photographs taken.]

WHY I AM A LIBERAL.

BURNS, MINN., Feb. 18, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a Liberal because Liberalism looks forward, and continues to work for a glorious future for the human race. I am a Liberal because Liberalism teaches natural morality rather than artificial morality and immorality. I am a Liberal because Liberalism is not headed by one of those old-time gods noted for their infamy, cruelty, and tyranny, created by man to resemble the people of the nation to whom they belong, or by one of the sixteen dead saviors, all of which are represented as haters of mankind. If the Christian church had simply destroyed the learning of the Roman empire, that would not hav been so bad, but, worse than that, after destroying everything that tended toward the education of humanity, they now claim to hav fostered education during what they, themselvs, class as the Dark Ages, which, in reality, were the lightest ages of the church. Liberalism is not founded on myth, ignorance, or superstition, but on science, and what is known to be fact. The ministers of the gospel to-day will cry, "Down with Thomas Paine!" but he was one of the best men that ever trod American soil, and had it not been that he wrote that little book called the "Age of Reason," that you can buy for twenty-five cents, they would hav extolled him to-day next in comparison to Jesus Christ; but because he wrote that book they hav damned him and sent him to hell ever since. But Thomas Paine was the first man to breathe independence into the hearts of the people; he was the first man to write the words, "Free and independent states of America." I am a Liberal because Liberalism teaches humanitarian doctrins. Well, fearing that I hav taken up too much space, this being my first writing, and hoping to see this in the Children's Corner, I remain,
Your friend, LORA E. RATHBUN.

SOUTH OTSELIC, N. Y., Feb. 28, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a little letter for the Children's Corner. I am twelve years old. I hav a pair of steers that are coming two this spring, and a pair coming one this spring. The big ones' names are Jack and Gill; the little ones' names are Robert G. Ingersoll and Henry Ward Beecher. The big ones do a good deal of work in the course of a year. I broke them myself. I hav also a nice three-year-old colt. I drive her anywhere I want to go. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much. Last fall we had about a hundred and fifty hens, but we hav killed them along this winter to sell. I am learning to play the piano and piccolo. I guess I will close now. Hoping to see my letter in print, I remain,
A true Freethinker, WALTER B. PECK.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is with pleasure that I write to the Children's Corner again, for I believe it to be a guiding light in an age of enlightenment; that it is a pleasure to all, both great and small, for I know it is to me. It givs me pleasure to think that the old fable theology is dying out, and the new now is taking its place. The theology of education and science is taking the place of the old heathen mythology, and the old book called the Bible is looked upon no more to be the word of a God of infinit love and mercy, but is giving place for the true doctrin—the doctrin of humanity. It givs me pleasure to think that the enlightened world has begun to see the folly of the four gospels. They bear no evidence of divine inspiration. They did not claim to be inspired. The enlightened hav investigated these matters, and found that what one commands the other condemns.

It givs me pleasure to think that such nonsense is fast passing away; that none but the ignorant and those who are afraid to investigate believe it. The enlightened hav seen the folly of priestcraft. They see that it has ever been in the path of progress; that science and education hav ever been held in darkness by it.

I will now say a few words about the Speak No Evil Society. I don't think that I could belong to it very well, for when the said Christians call me a fool for believing as I do, I can't keep from calling them ignorant and credulous. But I think it would be a good society for all young people and for old. Mr. J. E. Remsburg lectured here in Moody, February 13th, to a very fair audience. His subject was "The Sunday Question." Mr. Remsburg is a good and pleasing orator. I don't think that anyone got offended at him. Several praised him as a good speaker of his honest and candid opinions. I hav written several times to the Corner. I like to know how old the children and older ones are, so I will put my age to my letter this time. It is seventeen.

Hoping for a long continuance of the Corner, JOHN M. SIMMONS.

[We hav been obliged to omit a part of our friend's letter, not because it was not good, for it was all excellent, but on account of its length. We hav not space for lengthy letters. We would say to all: Learn to condense. Be brief, pithy, and to the point. Write with ink, on one side of the paper; spell and punctuate correctly.—ED. C. C.]

SUGAR RUN, PA., March 6, 288 A.S.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 3d a very interesting letter from the pen of Father Hacker. I think he must be a man of more than ordinary ability, and he certainly deserves recognition from the ablest Liberals. I think, too, that THE TRUTH SEEKER should giv him the asked-for space to print articles he thinks will do so much for the spreading of Freethought. He, according to his own story—which of course none doubt—has been the means of doing a vast amount of good work in the Liberal field; for this reason he should be doubly respected by all Liberals. Then, too, he shows courage not often seen in men of his advanced age. Think how he has been deprived of his hearing for upward of sixty long years. Yes, it is indeed something to engage the sympathy of all, and many a helping hand should be extended to the brave old man.

Think how in all these years since he has been denied his hearing he has never despaired, and here we find him, at his advanced age, having all his senses but that of hearing and able to write as fine a letter as we so lately read in THE TRUTH SEEKER. His story of lifelong deprivation, how he has so patiently labored, and, at the same time, done all he could for the cause of humanity, is sadly impressiv and should command the attention of all; and how, after living in a rough board dwelling for a lifetime, he at last builds himself and aged wife a comfortable house, but does this at the risk of losing all he possesses—this should certainly induce many Liberals to aid him.

Now, in consequence of these things, I will giv $1 toward establishing a fund for the benefit and relief of Father Hacker. This fund shall be known as the Children's Hacker Relief Fund, and I hope all the children who read THE TRUTH SEEKER will follow my example by contributing what they can, and in this way I am in hopes we can raise a considerable sum to lift the debt from the home of our deserving Liberal friend. Now, children, giv what you can—ten, twenty, and twenty-five cents—and we will see what the children of THE TRUTH SEEKER can do. Let all contributions be addressed to Miss Wixon, who will, I am sure, be only too pleased to be treasurer of this fund, and when we hav contributed the desired amount forward it to our friend.

Hoping my request will be heeded to raise this, our monument to our friend, so as to show our appreciation of him while he still livs, I will close with best wishes to the Children's Corner.
MAUDE MONTAGUE MORRISON.

[Our correspondent is correct in the estimate of the worth, work, and character of our respected and venerable friend, "Father Hacker." We are sure he will feel highly gratified with Maude's kind and noble sentiments. He has indeed done good work for humanity, and still continues in well-doing in his advanced years. We trust Maude's testimonial may be followed by others from appreciativ friends. All sums for such purpose will be duly credited, and forwarded to "Father Hacker."—ED. C. C.]

A Little Girl's Logic.

A little girl six years old was on a visit to her grandfather, who was a New England divine celebrated for his logical powers.

"Only think, grandpa, what Uncle Robert says!"

"What does he say, my dear?"

"Why, he says the moon is made of green cheese. It isn't at all, is it?"

"Well, child, suppose you find out yourself."

"How can I, grandpa?"

"Get your Bible and see what it says."

"Where shall I begin?"

"Begin at the beginning."

The child sat down to read the Bible. Before she got more than half through the second chapter of Genesis and had read about the creation of the stars and animals, she came back to her grandfather, her eyes all bright with excitement of discovery: "I've found it, grandpa. It isn't true, for God made the moon before he made any cows."

Babies in Japan.

The babies are strapped to the backs of their mothers, and sisters scarcely larger than themselvs. One often sees a dozen or two boys and girls under ten at all sorts of play, one-half of them having babies on their backs—oftentimes when the little nurses are playing regular romps, the little ones sound asleep, their heads hanging down and flopping from side to side as if their little necks would break. Here in front of this hotel, when the tide was out, I saw hundreds early one morning seeking mussels, mosses, and sea-weed. Little fellows not over ten are seen gathering shell-fish, with babies fastened to them. When they would stoop on hands and knees the baby would almost stand on its head. I can say I hav seen hundreds of those and hav as yet heard but three babies crying. Little ones of two and three sometimes hav dolls strapped to them. Not once hav I seen a doll in the arms.

Little Johnny's Composition.

Gees hisses, but ducks quacks, and wen Franky, that's the baby, is painfle in his lap he hollers, but the lion roars dissant thunder and makes the welkon wring!

Uncle Ned, wich has ben in Injy, and evry were, he says one nite a lion come out of the woods and went to his correl for to eat his cattle. Uncle Ned he got up and looked in the correl thru a crack the lion shode his teeth, and Uncle Ned sed: "The idiot thinks I am a dentist, but I havn't no time for to tend to him. He send for the lion tamer for to quell him with his I."

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectively and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. That Badger Boy at Sunday-School.

THE LESSON OF THE FLOOD.

"Now, children, I will read you the interesting story of the flood——"

"Oh, I know all about that, mum," broke in that boy James. "It come a rippin' and tearin' down Mill brook and run all over pop's medder, and raised thunder, mum!"

"James, you must not interrupt me. I am going to read of the flood of ages ago, which drowned all the people, except Noah and his family." (Proceeds to read the fiction, at the conclusion of which reading James gets in his work.)

"What made Noer so good, mum?"

"God, my child."

"Who made the other folks so bad, mum?"

"The devil, James. Beware of the devil."

"Who made the devil, mum?"

"God, of course" (forgetting herself).

"What did God make the devil for?"

"James, you mustn't ask such questions."

"Ain't there lots of wicked folks now, mum?"

"Yes, I am sorry to say, James."

"Why don't God drownd 'em, mum?"

"Because he promised Noah he would never flood the world again, my child."

"Does the devil make folks bad now, mum?"

"Yes, James."

"Does God want 'em to be bad, mum?"

"No, dear; he wants 'em to be good."

"Then the devil's got the bulge on God, ain't he, mum?"

"James, you must not talk so wickedly. It is perfectly awful the way you talk!"

"I won't, mum. Did Noah take some snakes in the ark, mum?"

"Yes, dear; a pair of each kind."

"What for, mum?"

"Because God directed him, my son."

"Do you like snakes, mum?"

"Oh!—oh, no! They are perfectly horrid, James!"

"What did God want to save snakes for, mum?"

"James, I don't know; but we mustn't ask."

"Did Noer take some wasps in the ark, mum?"

"Yes, dear; a pair of every living thing, and seven of some kinds."

"Do you like wasps, mum?"

"There, I know what you would say, but don't you say it—it is awful wicked, James."

"Did they hav beds then, mum?"

"I suppose so, of course."

"Then they must had bugs, mum. Did Noer——"

"James" (severely).

"Yes'm. What'll them folks do in heaven, mum, that can't swim?"

"What a ridiculous question, James Badger!"

"Don't see it, mum. If there was water enough up there to drownd the world, it must be offle deep now, mum, when the winders havn't been opened sence that corkin' flood!"

"James, once for all, you mustn't talk so. It is perfectly awful. I should be afraid of being struck by lightning if I talked so."

"Huh! Pop says that's the easiest way to die of all, and says he'd enough sight rather be struck by lightnin' than die of liver complaint. Must hav been dreffle muddy after the flood, mum, and the snakes must had an offle time squirmin' 'round. [No response from the teacher.] Did the lions eat the cows and lambs in the ark, mum?"

"No, they did not" (sharply).

"Why didn't they, mum?"

"Because God was there."

"Is he round now, mum?"

"Yes, he is; he is everywhere, boy."

"But he wasn't in that barn the other night when the lion got out of Barnum's fiery circus and chawed up the heifer, was he, mum?"

"James, I shall send you home."

"No'm—don't. I like it here. Did the monkeys and parrots hav a red-hot time in the ark, mum?"

"I don't know anything about the monkeys and parrots, boy; and you stop asking such wicked questions."

"Yes'm. Was Noer offle good, mum?"

"Yes, he was, James. He walked in God's ways and was blessed of the Lord."

"Who was the Lord, mum? [No response, and James did not persist] But pop says Noer got drunk after the flood, and proved it by readin' in the Bible, and ma got offle mad. Ma's dead stuck on the Bible, you know, but pop don't go a cent onto it. He says its pap for loons, mum."

"James" (austerely).

"Yes'm. Was the pigeon Noer sent out of the ark——"

"It was a dove, James."

"Wall, ain't pigeons doves, and doves pigeons, mum?"

"Well—yes—I suppose so."

"Was there any pouter pigeons in the ark, mum?"

"I don't know what pouter pigeons are, boy; but, of course, there was a pair in the ark."

"Huh! you're away off now, mum, 'cos pop's got some pouter pigeons, and he says—say, mum, how long ago was this offle flood?"

"Four or five thousand years ago, dear."

"Then pop's got yer, 'cos he says there wasn't no pouters three hundred years ago, but has been bred from other kinds sence."

"Well, I don't care. You're an awful, irreligious boy, and I don't want you to come here any more."

"Please, mum, lemme come. It's bully fun, and I'll be good, but pop says Noer did get drunk and lay round naked in the henhouse, and says if old Comstock had got onto him he would a run him in for obscenery of person, or something——"

"Your father is a wicked, outrageous man, and you, too, and the class is dismissed!" snapped the teacher, and the flood séance subsided, as it were.

Obituary.

Departed from earth-life in Auburn, N. Y., Feb. 27, 1888, Theoda N. Wilkes, wife of Edwin Greenfield, aged 67 years, 6 months, and 28 days.

Mrs. Greenfield was born in Victory, Cayuga county, N. Y., and spent her entire life in said county. About forty-five years ago she was united in marriage with a man whom she respected and loved for his many noble and manly attributes. Together these two joyfully and harmoniously discharged the various duties of life till by the laws of nature, on the 27th of February, a separation took place. One daughter came to add to the joys of the household many blessings and comforts for the parents whom she so much loved and for "the old folks at home." The father, mother, and daughter were Agnostics, lovers and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and were strongly opposed to orthodoxy and priestcraft, to the extent that by the special request of Mrs. Greenfield no minister was to officiate at the burial of her body. The only service held was the sweet rendering by her nephew and niece of the song entitled, "The Old Folks at Home," after which, on the 1st of March, her body was given to Mother Earth, in an attractiv spot on Fort Hill Cemetery, Auburn, N. Y.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.
The Present and the Future Republic of North America.
BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

THE STRUGGLE

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

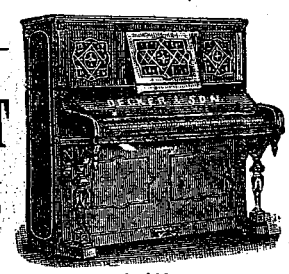
"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.



The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE NINE DEMANDS

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS THE LAMP OF THE MIND.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

MIRACULOUS ESCAPE OF ISRAEL.

And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left.—Ex. xiv, 22.

Gems of Thought.

IT can matter but little, even from their point of view [i. e., the conservativ and orthodox], whether one mere individual is added to the rank of the unbelieving on the floor of the House of Commons. It matters very much indeed, from every point of view, whether the hands are to be put back on the dial-plate of liberty, and a man's creed to become once more the criterion of his civil rights and liberties. From the standpoint of absolute religious liberty it is impossible to draw a valid distinction between the refusal to permit a duly elected representativ to take the oath because he has, on another occasion, declared himself an Atheist, and the refusal of the same privilege to a whole class because they happen to be Roman Catholics, Jews, or other Dissenters. The wrong and danger in either case consists in assuming for the House of Commons the right to inquire into the personal religious convictions of its members. That is a right which it is impossible for thoughtful lovers of liberty to concede in the year of our Lord 1881.—Toronto Globe.

As Emerson makes use of philosophy only to benefit men, and passes it by when it leads to doubtful disputations, so, it must be admitted, he disregards the formal statement of dogmas, and the prescriptiv observances which constitute the popular notion of religion. We should not presume to supply his reasons except as far as they are apparent. But he seems to believe that the whole aim of religion should be to make men devout and moral; and as he regards the end only, he is indifferent toward the doctrins and ceremonies which hav been associated with the simplicity of piety and good conduct.—Francis H. Underwood.

Odds and Ends.

IN the case of the assembly of this state (old; but, oh, so thundering true!): Fiat Justitia, Ruat Ceiling.

MAMMA (reading): "And the Lord called Samuel——" Tommy (a young American): "What did he hold?"

THE girl of old wore ashes cold
In Lent upon her brow;
The girl of to-day isn't built that way—
It's ashes of roses now.

A WILD rumor, which could not be traced to any reliable source, is to the effect that the two great political parties will make an effort this year to catch the American vote.

"I AM glad I learned to sew on buttons when I was a bachelor," observed Fangle. "Why?" asked Cumso. "I find the accomplishment so useful, now I am married."

MISS CHURCHMAN: "Oh, yes, I always deny myself in Lent. I giv up cards, music, frivolous reading, and unedifying conversation. Now, what do you giv up?" Mr. Mundane (reflectivly): "I think I'll giv up calling here!"

"I KNOW that you love me," she said sentimentally, as he held her to his vest. "I know that you love me," she repeated, "because when I lay my head against your breast your heart beats so loud I can hear it." "That," gasped the poor fellow, as the awful truth dawned upon him, "that is not my heart. That's my Waterbury watch."

"MAY I ask you a question, Miss Dora?" he demanded, with a deep meaning in his voice. "You may, Clarence," she replied wearily; "but if it's the same one you asked Lulu Caldene last week, it may interest you to know that Lulu and I are both in the Matrimonial Trust this year, and the combination is holding together so far."

A SPIRIT, new released from mortal breath,
Soared upward through drear space of sky unknown;
Untraced by chart of continent or zone,
The no-man's land of mystery and death.
Anon this soul arrived in realm of light,
And straightway sought, with eager haste, the gate
Where myriad hapless ghosts their doom await,
Of bliss and day, or never-ending night.
St. Peter paused (ere turned the portal key)
And questioned thus the stranger: "Tell me why
Thou did'st the laws of righteousness defy?
Can'st hope to here escape thy destiny?"
Aghast the spirit cried: "Because—because My head was not in shape to know these laws!"

"YOU must push matters a little, James," said the druggist to the new boy. "By calling a customer's attention to this article and that article, you can often effect sales." "Yes, sir," responded the new boy, and then he hastened to wait upon an elderly female who wanted a stamp. "Anythin' else, mum?" inquired the ambitious boy politely; "hair dye, cosmetic, face powder, rheumatic drops, belladonna, mole destroyer——" The elderly female licked the stamp viciously, and left the door open as she went out.

LATTER-DAY LYRICS.

I Puritani.

Devoutly devout, and austerely austere,
Was Hew-Them-In-Pieces Sellew.
A Puritan he, with a capital P,
Of seventeen hundred and two.

Of taking a shot at a Quaker on sight
He made a particular boast;
While, given a witch and a barrel of pitch,
He'd manage an excellent roast.

Could such a one, think you, hav fallen from grace?
Then list to this narrativ true.
A maiden one day did the heart steal away,
Of Hew-Them-In-Pieces Sellew.

A stranger was she both to one and to all,
But wondrously, wondrously fair.
She gave but one look, but it brought him to book,
And plunged him in utter despair.

His sad-colored garments he speedily doffed,
Did Hew-Them-In-Pieces Sellew,
For gewgaw and gaud, which he couldn't afford,
Although they improved him to view.

His former amusements forthwith he eschewed.
Nor longer the Quaker did quake,
The witches were merry, and singular, very,
Not one of them went to the stake.

The scandal grew larger; 'twas even averred
By people who certainly knew,
That out on the green there could nightly be seen
A-dancing, good Master Sellew.

The twain to the solemn Assembly were haled,
The trial gave infinit sport.
As one might expect from so plainly select
And rigidly orthodox court—

As, All-The-Day-Roaring Pigwhistleton Pratt,
And Strike-The-Loud-Psaltery Snell,
With Cherubim Cutts, and with Behemoth Butts,
And Howl-Ye-Oh-Kadesh Bedell.

Grim Behemoth Butts was for boiling in oil,
And Cutts recommended the knout,
While death on the wheel, all the rest seemed to feel,
Was nothing too much to giv out.

Then to his right mind was good Master Sellew
Restored, quite uninjured and whole.
But he couldn't forget a snare had been set
For his infinitesimal soul

By Diabolus, the father of mischief, himself.
It was a distinction as such.
But when he insisted on not being listed
For taxes, 'twas something too much.

With arrogance swollen beyond all belief
He calmly the bailiffs defied,
And yet what to do with presumptuous Sellew
The court couldn't really decide.

Until, to their infinit joy and relief,
'Twas quite unexpectedly shown,
The horrible schism of Arianism
Had counted him one of its own.

With arrows, and bullets, and missils diverse,
They bored him most thoroughly through.
And so in his pride, most uncomfortably died,
Stern Hew-Them-In-Pieces Sellew.

—W. G. van Tassel Sutphen.

TOIL on; but little canst thou do to-day.
The sun is risen. The daylight dims thy shrines.
The age outstrips thee, marching on its way
And overflowing all thy boundary lines.
How art thou fallen, O star! How lurid shines
Thy taper underneath the glowing sky!
How feeble grows thy voice, how lusterless thine eye! —The Church, by C. P. Cranch.

MR. INGERSOLL preaches paternal affection, love of home, duty to children, do unto others as you would they should do unto you; and his theory of life is, that man makes his own heaven or his own hell; that it pays best to be a good fellow; that if you get worldly prosperity in a dishonorable way you are sure to be unhappy, whether you believe in God or not; that, in short, honesty is the best policy. "You cannot help God in any way," he said. "He is beyond anything you can possibly do for him; but you can plant a flower daily in the path of your child from its earliest years, until the day comes when you die in that child's arms." There were homely touches of this kind from the beginning to the end of his address, and there were tears in the eyes of many of his hearers as he contrasted with the uncertain bliss of heaven the certain happiness of kindly deeds and domestic duties well fulfilled on earth.—Hatton's To-day in America.

OH, call my brother back to me!
I cannot play alone;
The summer comes with flower and bee—
Where is my brother gone?

And by the brook and in the glade,
Are all our wanderings o'er?
Oh, while my brother with me played,
Would I had loved him more!

YOU do not form your conception of a cup from a broken one, nor that of a book from a torn volume, nor that of an animal from one that is maimed, or mutilated, or distorted, or diseased. In every species the specimen is the best that can be produced. So the conception of a man is not to be taken from stunted souls, or sick souls, or withered souls, but from the healthiest and soundest, the most entire and flourishing, the straightest, the highest, the truest, and the purest.—Guesses at Truth, by Two Brothers.

THIS was the noblest Roman of them all;
All the conspirators, save only he (?),
Did that (?) they did, in envy of great Cæsar:
He only, in a general honest thought,
And common good to all, made one of them.
His life was gentle; and the elements
So mixed in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man."

—Shakspere.

IF what is known as the Christian religion is true, nothing can be more wonderful than the fact that Matthew, Mark, and Luke say nothing about "salvation by faith;" that they do not even hint at the doctrin of the atonement, and are as silent as empty tombs as to the necessity of believing anything to secure happiness in this world or any other.—Ingersoll.

HAPPY is he who, caring not for pope,
Consul, or king, can sound himself to know
The destiny of man and liv in hope.

THE bill granting the franchise to women had its first reading in the English House of Lords last week.

ONE of the most consistent Prohibitionists in Iowa is a clergyman who refused to marry a couple because the groom-elect was a saloon-keeper.

THE doings of the White Caps, an illegal organization of regulators in Indiana, come back to these shores from England as the doings of the "'White Cap' Indians."

THERE are some really good children in the high school of Tampa, Fla. Their teacher thought that it would be a good thing to celebrate Washington's birthday by giving the pupils a holiday, and put the question to a vote. The pupils voted against it, saying that so much time had been lost by the epidemic that they thought the day would be more profitably spent in the usual routine of study, and in this way they spent it.

THE decision of the United States Supreme Court allowing railroads to carry liquor into Iowa excites much interest there, and the liquor men say it will assist them materially. The Law and Order League admits that the decision will make the work somewhat more difficult, but claims it is not serious. Its attorney says the freight depots and express offices will hav to be more closely watched. A Davenport dispatch says: "In places where the Prohibitory law is enforced the new law will make no difference, as the liquor, if shipped, would be seized and destroyed on arrival."

MINISTER (about starting for church): "I hav been requested by several members of the congregation to pray for rain this morning." Wife (of great faith): "We do need rain badly. Hadn't we better take the umbrella, John?" Minister: "No, I think we will be able to reach home before the storm comes."

SOME of the relativs in Fredericksburg, Md., of the late Barbara Fritchie, recently sent to the poet Whittier, who immortalized the venerable lady in verse, a number of table articles which formerly belonged to Mrs. Fritchie. Mr. Whittier acknowledged the receipt of the articles some days ago, and stated in his letter that he had become convinced that his poem entitled, "Barbara Fritchie," was based upon a supposed incident that had no foundation, but that he was glad to know, nevertheless, that she was a loyal woman.

MAPS of Norway and Sweden hav for some time shown a railroad starting at Lulea, almost on the Arctic circle, running north in the general direction of the North pole, and suddenly breaking off apparently in an Arctic wilderness. The stock of this most northern railroad in the world is probably not quoted on any exchange, but it is said that the road is doing a thriving business carrying iron ore from the rich Gellivara mines, and, unlike our own railroads, it has met no blizzards or other influences hostil to schedule time-tables. The railroad hands are without sunlight for several months in the year, but the Northern Lights supply so excellent a substitute that street-lamps are rarely lighted in Lulea. The snow rarely averages more than a foot in depth.

BENEVOLENT gent: "Your Ladies' Christian Charity Society must be a great blessing to the poor. I suppose you visit the poor creatures quite often." Member L. C. C. S.: "Visit the wretches in their dirty rooms—what a horrid idea! No, indeed. We hav nothing to do with their earthly wants; we save their souls by sending them Sunday-school tracts."

THE Boston Transcript prints the following church conversation: "Let's see, where do you attend church now?" "I go now to the Sixteenth Denominational church." "Do you? And how do you like it?" "Ever so much. We hav delightful social parties every week, and then, you should see what a splendid kitchen we hav!" "And what kind of a preacher is Mr. Selah?" "H'm! Well, fact is, I've never heard him preach, but he's a real pleasant man to meet, and a splendid hand at getting up games, amateur theatricals, and such things."

GAYTHORNE NAYLOR, a private in the Salvation Army, was charged at Leeds, Eng., a few weeks since with the manslaughter of his child, he having failed to call in medical aid during its illness. Naylor objected to medical assistance, saying: "I was asked to hav a doctor, but I saw no reason, as it was in God almighty's hand. That was the reason I refused to hav a doctor sent for. I knew of its [the child] having the fall. Our heavenly father is almighty, and none can pass away without his will, and, in that case, I did not think it necessary to call in a doctor to examin it as to the result of the fall. I do not think I hav neglected my duty to my child. I ought to obey the voice of God before that of man." As it could not be proved that a doctor could hav saved the child's life, the prisoner was discharged.

CONGRESSMAN CUMMINGS of New York, by request, has introduced a bill for the repeal of Section 3,893, Revised Statutes (the "Comstock law"), and amendments, relating to the circulation of obscene literaturc. The bill has a long preamble, reciting that it was not the intention of the Constitution to provide for the enforcement of morality by the general government, but that the states hav supreme authority in such matters.

WE judge from the subjoined quotation from its columns that the San Francisco Argonaut does not love the Irish: "Abram S. Hewitt, Democratic mayor of New York, son-in-law of Peter Cooper, who founded the Cooper Institute, a man of high intelligence, great wealth, great independence of character, has had the courage to declare to a delegation of Irish Roman Catholics, who waited upon him with a request that he review the Irish Roman Catholic procession that was to parade on St. Patrick's day, that he would not do it; that the 17th of March was not a legal holiday. He said: 'I may be a candidate next fall for mayor or president, and I may want votes, but I won't get down to the level of reviewing an Irish procession except I am officially required to do so.' Thank God for a brrve man! Thank God for one bold utterance from a person of national standing and reputation! Mr. Hewitt is a Democrat in the very center and hotbed of the pope's Irish. Thank God that there is one man in America who is not ashamed of the country of his birth and not afraid of the political Irish. We nominate him as the candidate of the American party for president of the United States."

Bible Morality and Evolution.

With its false science, its inaccurate history, its silly fables, its wonderful and incredible stories, laid bare, one would be disposed to say that such an indictment was strong enough without going further to demonstrate conclusivly the human origin of the Bible.

But proceed one stage further and make an examination into the morality of the Bible. What shall we find? We shall find that, on the assumption that the Bible is God's word, the moral difficulties are a thousandfold more difficult of explanation than all the scientific and historical ones put together.

We hav a God who sanctions and givs encouragement to the most horrible of crimes; who promotes wars against inoffensiv and defenseless peoples; who favors slavery, smiles approval upon polygamy, and connives at atrocities the most abhorrent and revolting that we hav any record of in the history of the world.

Let us look at these charges more closely and state the evidence upon which they rest.

Polygamy. Throughout the Pentateuch the institution of polygamy is not only sanctioned, but is regarded as the embodiment of virtue. For instance, Abraham had a wife and several concubines, and the latter were regarded in the light of "goods and chattels." Soon after Sarai had given birth to Isaac, she appears to hav had a wrangle with her husband concerning Hagar, "a bondwoman," and her child Ishmael, and the result of this little squabble was that Abraham turned Hagar, who was as much his wife as Sarai, and this boy, who was really his own child, adrift into the wilderness to die, and we find that Jahveh not only acquiesced in this conduct, but gave it his distinct approval. Nearly all the great patriarchs were polygamists, and all the writers of the Old Testament appear to hav agreed that this was an inspired institution. Now, can it be possible that an infinit and all-wise ruler of the universe was ever in favor of polygamy? Can it be possible that he ever regarded this as the purest method for the propagation of the human species? Even on scientific grounds he ought to hav known that such an institution was destructiv of the races that adopted it. On the ground of purity he ought to hav vigorously opposed it. But he did not. Why? Because the Jews were in favor of it; and the Jews accepted it as an institution simply because they found other races practiced it before them.

Slavery. Jahveh was in favor of slavery. If he did not originate this institution, he certainly commanded the Jews to practice it toward alien races. Can there be any doubt of this? Let us see. In Lev. xxv, 44–46, we find: "Both thy bondmen, and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt hav, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever."

And again, in Ex. xxi, 2–6: "If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve; and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing. If he came in by himself, he shall go out by himself: if he were married, then his wife shall go out with him. If his master hav given him a wife, and she hav born him sons or daughters; the wife and her children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself. And if the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children; I will not go out free: then his master shall bring him unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door-post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl; and he shall serve him forever."

To-day we revolt at this horrible teaching as much as the poor nativ Zulu who read the passage for the first time when he was assisting the late Bishop Colenso to translate the Bible into the Zulu tongue. But here we hav the inspired word just as it was written by specially selected amanuenses; and there can be no doubt that Jahveh at one time was in favor of slavery.

But why did he sanction this barbarous and brutal institution? Because the Jews were in favor of it. The Pentateuch was written by Jews, and merely expresses the opinions then current among the Hebrews, nothing more.

Witchcraft. That Jahveh believed in witchcraft, if he believed in anything at all, is clear enough from the following passage in Ex. xxii, 18: "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." Under this injunction for ages thousands of poor creatures hav been subjected to the most horrible treatment, nearly a hundred thousand being put to death as witches in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in Germany alone, not to mention the thousands in England and Scotland during the same period who were either burnt at the stake or drowned for the same alleged offense. Religious folk, who were the law-makers in all European countries, were careful to keep a law on the statute-book for the punishment of supposed witches. In the first year of the reign of James I. in England, we find an act was passed defining the crime of witchcraft as intelligently as an ordinary religious person can be expected to define anything. It ran thus: "Anyone that shall use, practice, or exercise any invocation of any evil spirit, or consult or covenant with, entertain or employ, feed or reward any evil or wicked spirit, to or for any purpose, or take up any dead man, etc., etc., such offenders, duly and lawfully convicted and attainted, shall suffer death."

If Jahveh was ever in favor of burning witches, he has been singularly silent on the subject since the repeal of those horrible laws. How is this? Can the immutable God change his mind? Can the all-wise make a mistake? Human beings can err in the treatment of their fellows; they can make mistakes in their opinions concerning deity, and it seems to me far more likely that the writers of the Pentateuch made a grievous blunder when they represented that Jahveh was in favor of killing persons who were supposed to be witches, than that any deity could hav ever uttered such a barbarous command.

The Horror of Horrors. In Deut. xx, and Num. xxxi, we find Jahveh commanding the Israelites to perpetrate unparalleled horrors; to go against the Midianites, or any weaker races, slaughter all the men without mercy, and the married women, but to preserve the maidens in order to satisfy the brutal and lustful natures of a horde of soldiers, and, in a parenthesis, Jahveh specially requested that a few maidens should be reserved for him.

What can any man with an elementary knowledge of just principles think of such morality as this?

He must believe either that God is not always good, or that he never gave such atrocious commands. If he is rational, he will believe that this command was the utterance of a bloodthirsty leader of an ignorant and savage race.

In the past the moral sanction in religious matters always consisted of an appeal to "God's word." No matter how bad an act was in itself, it was regarded as virtuous in the highest degree if it could be found to be the alleged command of deity in a so-called holy book.

For an ordinary man to murder his only son would be considered a very heinous offense, and justly so, but if, as in the case of Abraham, he was prepared to do it as the express wish of deity, then the action became the very embodiment of virtue.

The commandments of deity were imperativ injunctions. To disobey them was to be subjected to torture; to obey them was to be crowned with glory. "Thou shalt hav none other gods but me." Why? "For I the Lord thy God am a jealous God," etc.

"Thou shalt not steal." Why? Not because stealing injures our fellow-men, but because it is God's command.

"Honor thy father and thy mother." Why? "That thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

Herein we find that in the past the virtue of an act did not consist in the intrinsic merit of the act, or of its effect upon the community. The virtue of it was considered to exist in the fact that it was the supposed command of deity, or of one of his earthly representativs—the priests.

But as the ages hav advanced, and human beings hav become more and more enlightened, we find that their ideas of morality hav improved, until to-day we find that in civilized countries in all the affairs of daily life, and even in our jurisprudence, actions are accounted moral just in proportion as they tend to the general well-being.

A man must not lie, because he injures his fellows, and throws discredit upon all human testimony.

He must not steal, not because it is displeasing in the sight of deity, but because it is injurious to his fellow-man.

He must not murder, because it increases human misery.

The same holds good of every action. Every action that man performs either adds to human misery or promotes human welfare; and as each man's happiness is inextricably bound up with that of his fellows, he cannot injure them without injuring himself. Man obtains happiness, therefore, in proportion as he makes others happy. As Heine says:

> He who bends to himself a joy
> Doth the wingèd life destroy,
> But he who kisses the joy as it flies
> Livs in eternity's sunrise.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Spirit Prophecy.

A female correspondent of the Freethinkers' Magazine for February tries to convince Mr. Wakeman that departed spirits can prophesy. She says that in 1851 or 1852 her uncle put the question to a spirit, "Who will be the next candidate for governor [of New York] nominated on my [Whig] ticket?" and the answer was, "John Hale," a name that "neither had thought of or knew in connection with the state ticket." And she adds that "when the nomination took place John P. Hale was the candidate." but she believes "he was not subsequently elected," and says that the middle letter of his name was omitted by the spirit.

Brother Wakeman has doubtless been amused at the lady's effort to convince him of the power of spirits to prophesy what never took place. In 1852 John P. Hale was a distinguished United States senator from New Hampshire, and was nominated for president of the United States by the Free Soil party, as against Winfield Scott nominated by the Whigs, and Franklin Pierce by the Democrats.

At that time I lived in the city of New York, and I voted the straight Whig ticket, except for presidential electors. And when the ballots were counted there were only four votes cast for John P. Hale, one of which was by W. H. BURR.

Tricks of the Churches in Utah.

Realizing that THE TRUTH SEEKER is a champion of education and a stanch supporter of our common schools—the just pride of every American—I take the liberty of trespassing on a portion of your space for the double purpose of showing to your readers, first, that the legislature of the territory of Utah had the hardihood to recently pass a bill providing for the support of private schools; and secondly, to show that, in the person of Caleb W. West, we hav a governor with both the sense and courage to veto such a nefarious measure. The enacting clause of the bill referred to reads as follows:

> A bill for an act providing for the establishment and support of district and private schools, and for other purposes, etc.

To show how it was intended to encourage the establishment of private schools and to contribute to their support out of the public treasury, the following is copied from said bill:

> SEC. 13. All schools organized under the direction of the trustees in the respectiv school districts of this territory shall be known, in law, by the name and title of district schools, and all other schools shall be known as private schools. All schools, both district and private, shall be entitled to a just and equitable apportionment of any public school fund arising from the United States, or from legislativ enactments of this territory. Such apportionment shall be made to said schools by the trustees on the basis of the actual attendance of pupils, and the holding of four terms a year; and all such schools shall receive a distribution of funds in proportion to the number of terms held, and the attendance of pupils. Provided that no apportionment of any such public school fund shall be made to any district or private school, unless such school shall hold at least two full terms during the year.

When this pernicious measure was forwarded to Governor West for his sanction, he promptly and properly returned the same without his signature, or any recommendations for its alteration, and he did it with the following pertinent remarks:

> I herewith return H. F. 47, entitled, "An act providing for the establishment and support of district and private schools," etc., . . . without my approval.
> There are many grounds of objection to the enactment of such a law which it is unnecessary to enumerate, as there is one which is insuperable. That is the provision that private or denominational schools shall share in the public school fund.
> I can no more giv my assent to such a provision than approve an appropriation from the public treasury for the benefit of any other private interest or individual. I regard such a provision as a blow at the public school system which prevails in every section of our country, and, like our government, is of the people, for the people, and by the people.
> Under the proposed law, denominational schools may hav the aid of the civil power, by the means of taxation, to advance the tenets of the church. It seems a surprising fact that such a system should be proposed at this time. None of the reasons which can be urged in support of the general education of the youth of the territory at the public expense can, in my judgment, justify such legislation.
> The measure, while providing support for private or denominational schools, provides no means of supervision or control over them, and the probable, if not the certain, result of its becoming a law would be to destroy the imperfect system of district schools already existing.
> To attempt to estimate the beneficial results to the people which hav flowed from the public school system would be impracticable at this late hour of the session. I hav not the time to criticise or suggest. I will say, however, that in my opinion it would hav been more to the interest of the people if the assembly, instead of enacting measures which, if approved, would prove destructiv of the public schools, had endeavored to promote their progress and development.
> The benefits to be derived from all laws looking to the improvement of the public schools depend primarily upon considerate legislation. The measure before me does not meet this requirement. I am,
> Very respectfully, CALEB W. WEST, Governor.
> HON. W. W. RITER,
> Speaker of the House.

That the vetoing of such a bill was the wisest thing our governor could do will be fully appreciated by every Secularist in the country, especially when it is learned that there are several ecclesiastical schools in this priestly land where the dogmas of the respectiv churches under whose management they are controled are taught as a part of the daily course of instruction. Brigham Young, before his death, founded two such institutions of superstition, namely, the Brigham Young Academy, of Provo, and the Brigham Young College, of Logan, both of which were established, and are still maintained, for the avowed purpose of "instructing the youth of Israel in the everlasting gospel as revealed by God almighty in these the last days." Since Brigham's death, the Mormon church has established four other such hot-beds of creed and ignorance, one in this city and three in the southern part of the territory. All of these schools are crowded with Mormon youths, so one can readily see why a Mormon legislature should want such a bill as the one mentioned above to become a law. Besides the Mormon religious schools, the Catholics hav three colleges in Utah, which, by the way, are far in advance of any educational institutions in the territory as regards grounds, buildings, and furnishings. The Protestant churches, not to be behind, hav opened schools in all parts of the territory, which, in nearly every instance, are far better places of learning than are the Mormon district or common schools, none of which are free schools. The church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints has always been opposed to the free school system; the priesthood thereof has openly, from the pulpit, cried it down; and this bill, that the governor so graciously vetoed, was intended to undermine the public school system of Utah, and giv to the church school an advantage and prestige that it does not obtain anywhere else in the United States. Had this un-American bill become a law, the Mormons would simply hav opened, as fast as possible, church schools in every city and town in Utah; the best teachers would hav been engaged with high salaries; the priests would hav ordered their duped followers to send their children to the private schools, where they could be taught, not only all (?) branches of secular knowledge, but also the "principles of the everlasting gospel." Under such an arrangement the common schools would hav been thinned out and neglected; inferior teachers would hav been found therein, and consequently in a short time the public schools in Utah would soon hav fallen into disrespect and contempt among the majority of the people who inhabit these beautiful valleys. Could a scheme hav been more anti-American and dangerous to the commonwealth? Could a law hav been better intended to protect a church and aid in the perpetuity of ecclesiastical power and the shams of a sect which breeds traitors by the thousands?

Well, the American element throughout Utah, and particularly the Freethinkers, honor Governor West for the prompt and decisiv way in which he "set down" on that "educational" bill.

A. B. THOMPSON, Sec. Salt Lake Sec. Union.

Salt Lake City, March 10, 1888.

Those Humbug Missions.

An address before the Columbo, Ceylon, Theosophical Society, by Panait Gopi Nath, reported in the Sarasavisandaresa.

One thing that has surprised me very much during my visit to Ceylon is that I find so many good Buddhists called by purely Christian names. That shows, of course, that Christian influence has been at work among you, and I am informed that it is due chiefly to the tyranny of the Dutch and Portuguese governments of this island. But now, under the English government, this is quite unnecessary, and it should at once be changed. Do not for a moment imagin that you are more respected by the Europeans because you use Christian names or adopt the Christian religion—far from it. Indeed, just the reverse is the fact, and I will relate to you some anecdotes of my personal experience to prove what I say.

The Europeans sometimes denounce our caste system, but it seems to me—and I am speaking from observed facts—that they hav a much worse kind of caste among themselvs. Now, I am a Kashmiri Brahman, and every other Brahman, no matter how poor he may be. or how ragged his clothes are, is my brother, and I could never dream of treating him otherwise; but among Christians this does not appear to be so. At the installation of the maharajah of Kashmir some time ago at Jummoo, I was present, along with many other nativ gentlemen, some few Europeans, and some half-caste or Eurasian men—what you in this country call Burghers. Of course, the officers of the maharajah treated all the guests alike, and set them down to one table, but the Europeans, headed by the resident, refused to eat with the Eurasians, though they were all Christians, and these latter had to be driven away to another table.

I recollect another incident. When I went to the great exhibition at Jeypore, Rajputana, in the year 1883, I, and some other students, went to play cricket in the gardens. After a time a European gentleman came and asked if he might join us, and, of course, we were very glad to allow him to do so; but, after a time, discovering from the name of one of our companions that he was a Christian Eurasian, the European at once left the game, saying that he was perfectly willing to join with Hindoo gentlemen, but would not play with an Eurasian.

I once knew a leading Mohammedan pleader who was favorably impressed by Christianity, and, in fact, was about to become a Christian; but suddenly he broke off all connection with that faith, and retained his own religion. Upon my inquiring his reason for so sudden a revulsion of feeling, he told me that a few days before he had called upon a missionary, and been, as usual, hospitably received and offered an honorable seat. But while he was at the missionary's house an old and reverend-looking Mohammedan gentleman entered; and my friend at once rose to show respect to him and yield him the place of honor; but he was much surprised to see that no seat was offered to the old gentleman, but that he was allowed to sit on the floor among the missionary's dogs! On asking the reason of this unseemly neglect, the missionary carelessly answered, "Oh! he is a Christian!" This opened my friend's eyes, and he understood that the respect paid to him now was only to induce him to become a Christian, and would cease as soon as its object was attained.

Again, in Madras, a few days ago, I entered a Christian church in order to see its services, and took a seat on a chair. An official at once came and drove me away, telling me that the chairs were only for Europeans, and that nativ Christians must sit on mats in another part of the building! You see even in the house of their God they must hav their distinctions; and surely this is worse than anything in our caste system. I say that such a service of such a God is worse than useless.

So you see if you think you will be respected by Europeans for becoming Christians, or adopting Christian names, you are very much mistaken. Quite the contrary; if you abandon your ancestral faith and become a renegade for the sake of gain, they despise you, and they are right in doing so. What would you think of an old servant of twenty years' standing, if you found he was ready at a moment's notice to abandon his old master in order to make a little more money in your service? Of course you would feel that you could place no reliance upon him, since, if it suited him, he would be equally ready to abandon you in turn. No; if you wish to be respected, first respect yourselvs; if you wish men of other religions to respect you, first respect your own religion.

The missionaries often ask us why we should follow or obey our priests, since they possess no supernatural powers; yet we do not hear that the missionaries themselvs possess them, though the founder of their faith specially promised that various wonderful signs should follow all who believed in him. We need never shrink from a comparison between our priests and those of the Christians; at least, the former are not seen living like princes, and being guilty of all kinds of extravagance, as the latter are. In order to make our priests even more useful to us, let us notice those among them who are most learned, and who lead the best lives, and let us specially follow and reverence them. And never be afraid to speak boldly in contradiction to Christian falsehoods and to answer them fairly; remember you are now living under a government which is impartial to us all. A few days ago when I landed at this harbor I met two Christians, who asked me where I was going. I told them that I was coming to the headquarters of the Theosophical Society to see Mr. Leadbetter. They thereupon asked who he was, and when I told them that he had been a Church of England clergyman, but had now embraced Buddhism, they at once said that he must hav had some interested motiv for giving up his old religion—something connected with money matters, perhaps. Knowing how absurdly untrue such a suggestion was, I became annoyed, and replied, "If that be your logic, then every nativ Christian must also hav had interested motivs in giving up his old religion." This brought them to their senses, and they admitted that many rich men, to whom money could be no object, had given up Christianity purely for the sake of truth. By this you may see the effect of speaking out boldly to these slandering Christians; if you will but do that, you will soon cause them to moderate their pretensions.

I should like to say a word about the religious education of our ladies, which I consider a most important point. The child is influenced more by its mother than even by its father; if the mother be religious, then the child will be so too. The Christians know that well, and that is why they take so much trouble about their zenana mission, to teach our girls and women. Look at the primers they hav prepared for use in their zenana missions, and you will perpetually find hints as to how cruel the Hindoos are to women, how they treat them like slaves, giv female children fewer ornaments than the male, and so on; in every way endeavoring to make the girls hate their own homes and religion, and become Christians. My last and most special advice to you as your Indian brother is this: Don't trust your ladies, don't trust your children, in the hands of these foreign missionaries. These foreigners do not come here and spend money here for our benefit; no—they hav one, and only one, great object always in view, and that is to make proselytes. However fair may be the outward appearance of their work, that design underlies everything they do, like a snake hidden under a floor, and for this object they will hesitate at no misrepresentation of your religion. In conclusion let me heartily thank the Theosophical Society for having given me the pleasure and honor of making your acquaintance and the opportunity of thus addressing you.

Another Comrade for St. George.

It has been caused to be announced that England is about to furnish another saint for the mythological or ecclesiastical calendar, in the person of the Hon. William E. Gladstone, M.P., and disputant-general of the British islands. This time he is to come outside, and to cross the Atlantic, and inquire of Colonel R. G. Ingersoll why he does not correct his opinions as to the Roman Jupiter, the Jewish Jehovah, the Hindoo Brahma, and certain other characters that hav heretofore occupied, and still do occupy, much of the attention of mankind.

Just why he should make himself so much of a foreign missionary is rather difficult to determin. There are in the vast possessions over which he has heretofore been prime minister very many millions of idolators and pagans who entertain a very slight regard for the Church of England and the faith he entertains. If his zeal for the salvation of souls is so intense, why not exhort his own government to greater efforts in behalf of its own subjects? Still again, if these are too far off, or too inconspicuous for his attention, his aggressivness and propagandism, why does he look away from his own limited island? Why overlook the religious views of those two greatest historians of all time, and especially of the times when priests and popes were laying the foundations of the Dark Ages and the Christian system? Their volumes are on his own shelvs, and their names will be growing brighter, while his will fade, in the years of coming truth, not only among Englishmen, but wherever history is read. If Edward Gibbon and David Hume, two of the grandest and most faithful intellects of modern times, are unworthy of the corrections of the new aspirant, and disciple of the St. George who slew the dragon, it will hardly be expected that lesser names connected with blasphemous errors can be forced upon his weapons. But why should that profound and most thorough scholar, and philosopher, Henry Thomas Buckle, be run over, in order to reach a mere lecturer in America? Why not repeal some of the old, ignorant laws and take home again the "Rights of Man" and the other writings of Thomas Paine, the clearest head that ever wore a hat in England? Notwithstanding Bishop Watson's annihilating answer to Paine, the whole combined hierarchy of the British empire found it necessary to banish the young reformer, and burn and ostracize everything pertaining to him. We on this side owe to England the most of our unbelief, and thank her for it. Mr. Gladstone ought to stop the source.

But we will not object to the compliment he intends for us. We will not forget his willingness to admit Bradlaugh into Parliament, for we always hav felt a most profound respect for a free lance. If he thinks he will find a more easy victory in the fields of new thought in our country than he would among his own immediate countrymen, let him try it. No embargo will be interposed. We may ask him to withdraw the edicts passed against the works of Thomas Paine in England, and suggest that the influence they might now hav there, if circulated, would aid him greatly in some of his own measures of reform.

Lincoln and Temperance.

Of all the writers on the temperance question, none is more severe in his denunciation of the liquor traffic or more zealously in favor of sumptuary laws for its suppression than John Prescott Guild. Whatever we may think of his methods, his earnestness is to be admired.

In a recent article on "Lincoln and Liquor," Mr. Guild endeavors to show that Lincoln also was an advocate of the methods employed by him. But he was not. In the same address from which Mr. Guild quotes, referring to these very methods, Lincoln says:

> Too much denunciation against dram-sellers and dram-drinkers was indulged in. This, I think, was both impolitic and unjust. It was impolitic, because it is not much in the nature of man to be driven to anything, still ess to be driven about that which is exclusivly his own business. . . . When the conduct of men is designed to be influenced, persuasion—kind, unassuming persuasion—should ever be adopted.

This address was delivered by Lincoln in Springfield in 1842, and has been published in the "Lincoln Memorial Album." The passage quoted by Mr. Guild may be found on pages 96 and 97; the words I hav cited appear on pages 86 and 87.

In regard to the passage circulated by the Antiprohibitionists of Atlanta, and attributed to Lincoln, I am not prepared to say whether it is genuin or not. But if not the words, they are the sentiments of Lincoln. Every word of that passage he would hav indorsed.

Abraham Lincoln, like Mr. Guild, was an advocate of temperance; but, unlike Mr. Guild, he was opposed to sumptuary or Prohibitory laws.

Giordano Bruno.

As a general rule, I seldom favor the tendency of hero-worship as expressed in the desire to erect monuments to those who trod the thorny path of persecution for our welfare, feeling that to carry forward the thought and work of their lives and labors, we would by emulation accord them the highest possible recognition. But as all rules hav exceptions, the most notable exception in history is that of the grand proto-martyr of Freethought, Giordano Bruno. My reasons why Liberal Americans should honor Bruno's memory by contributing to this international fund are:

1. No true recognition has ever been given the bravest hero who ever died to benefit man.

2. The popular mind—especially in America—concedes to Galileo the honors which properly belong to Bruno, as the first public advocate of the plurality of worlds.

3. This monument project embodies the conflict between the papal and Secular power which has been waging in the Eternal City since the pope was stripped of his temporal power, and the erection of this monument will be a mortal offense to the now toothless lion who wags his imbecil jaws in the seat where his predecessors made fuel of Bruno's body to stop Freethought in Italy.

4. It will be a warning to those who desire to transplant the waning Romish power into the more fertil soil of our American republic that we know something of its history and diabolical acts wherever it has held sway.

It is a shame that the name of Galileo—after his inglorious recantation—is yet the most familiar, and attracts greater attention and esteem as the first public advocate of the Copernican system of astronomy than that of the intrepid martyr who preceded him to a terrible but honorable death at the stake—Giordano Bruno.

The sixteenth century was an epoch of marvelous intellectual activity—a rebound from the long-continued mental thralldom which preceded it. Never before had so many fertil brains thrown broadcast their thoughts, but the meteoric figure which now looms up higher than all his contemporaries is that of the fearless young orator, Bruno. He not only was the first during the Christian era to publicly advocate the plurality of worlds and show that the stars were suns shining by their own light, each having its revolving planets, but purposely placed that system in the most obnoxious light before the all-powerful ecclesiastics, by adding the assumption of their habitability and his own philosophical deductions thereon. This knight-errant of the now modern philosophy antedated Galileo over thirty years, and it was charged that the professor of Padua was reviving the heresy for which Bruno was burnt. Bruno anticipated many of the most "advanced" solutions of modern science, and he is still the source from whence several celebrated thinkers draw their inspiration at the present day.

The name of this Freethought champion rises from the sixteenth to illumin the nineteenth century by its unparalleled example of intrepidity. No country or race has afforded a more ennobling illustration of devotion to truth for truth's sake alone.

It was befitting that Bruno was born in the village of Nolau, under the flames and amid the throes and thunder of Vesuvius, for the mere question of erecting a monument to the memory of this astounding linguist, this enchanting, youthful orator, this profound philosopher, satirist, dramatist, and poet, has so agitated the Eternal City that it is now mooted that the holy father may move to Madrid. At last the municipal council of Rome has granted permission for the erection of this long-deferred tribute to the Freethought martyr on the Campo de Fiori, the sacred spot where the noble Bruno was burnt.

As the whole world was benefited by his dauntless life and honored by his heroic death, the monument partakes of an international character, and American Freethinkers are asked to contribute their quota. Let it be done quickly and generously, for the money is needed at once if the work is to be finished in May. Many will remember that the project was started some four or five years ago, but was delayed and additional expense incurred because of the refusal of the municipality to allow the monument to be erected. Among the European contributors were Victor Hugo, Herbert Spencer, Ernst Haeckel, Ernst Renan, Emile Castelar, Professor Büchner, and other eminent individuals in science and letters. The American committee are Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll, Thaddeus B. Wakeman, Daniel G. Thompson, Thos. Davidson. Colonel Ingersoll heads the new subscription with the following sentiment:

LAW OFFICE
ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, } NEW YORK, Feb. 8, 1889.
40 WALL STREET,

T. B. WAKEMAN, ESQ., Treasurer of the Bruno Monument Committee,

My Dear Sir: It givs me great pleasure to inclose my check for one hundred dollars ($100).

I shall never be quite satisfied until there is a monument to Bruno higher than the dome of St. Peter's.

Yours very truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

I am informed that the students of Rome had a grand procession on the day the decision was announced that the monument might be erected.

Bruno was a prophet as well as a paladin. At fifteen years he entered a convent of the Dominican order, but soon rebelled against the rules; later on, his imaginativ and speculativ mind began to work, and the walls of his narrow cloister became too circumscribed. He had been a close, indefatigable student; was master of many languages. Finally he began to disbelieve the dogmas of the church, and he found means of escape. He had studied books, now he studied men and nature more. He unlocked hidden treasures of truth, and gave his life rather than relinquish his self-imposed guardianship. Lecturing before universities in Geneva, Toulouse, Lyons, Paris, Berlin, or London, wherever he spoke he was at first greeted with outbursts of applause, but this was generally followed by shouts of fury and maledictions, for he was sure to be followed by the wily officers of the church. Nevertheless, he boldly proclaimed his "impious heresy" on the spot where Servetus was burnt and Vanini met his martyrdom. London was his only place of safety, and there he did the larger portion of his writing, and becoming the fast friend of Sir Philip Sidney, dedicated to him his "Spaccio dell Bestia Triumphante." The intellectual atmosphere of London chilled the fervid Freethinker. It was like planting the most delicate perfumed flower amid a lot of scrubby pines. He wandered back to the continent, was offered the hospitality of a Venetian nobleman (?), and this despicable host, through the manipulations of his priestly confessor, betrayed his guest to the officers of the Inquisition. Bruno was as bold, audacious, and unflinching before his accusers, as he was brilliant in propounding his philosophy. Add to his learning his extraordinary beauty of person, his gallant bearing, his black, kindling eyes as eloquent as his speech, a face of classic delicacy of outline, and what wonder his Romish persecutors dreaded his influence? He must be made to recant—that would be a triumph for the church better than his death. For seven, long, weary years this young, impulsiv, impassioned orator was kept in a dungeon, with no books, no companionship but the regular visits of his tormentors to see if he were ready to say the one word between him and the blue sky—recant. But this damp and death-dealing dungeon could not break or bend the heroic soul of Bruno. When finally brought for the last time before his accusers, while standing chained before them, arguing still on his theories with an impassioned eloquence almost irresistible, he was condemned to that most diabolical of deaths; he only turned with supreme indifference on his executioners, and said: "This sentence givs you more alarm than it givs me." This brilliant young philosopher felt himself at this supreme hour stronger than all the power of Rome. Contemplate such a character if you can without the throb of enthusiasm!

Most men may by circumstances be taught to be valiant, but it is generally when the blood is up and the eye flashes in response to the cannon's roar, the rattle of musketry, and the clash of battle, but to meet a most horrible death with a smile as Bruno did is the concentrated essence of heroism. The Christian martyrs were buoyed up by fond hopes of heavenly rewards. Not so Bruno. He expected nothing, hoped for nothing, and still he met his fate—the most adverse and terrible. This was the year of the Romish jubilee, when the holy city was thronged with pilgrims from all over the world, and the burning of Bruno was one of the attractions for this crowd of worse than cannibal Christians. See this valiant Freethinker, to whom life might mean so much, led to the stake! No consolation of companionship, supported by no followers, gladdened by no approving smile, inspired by no kiss, refreshed by no tear, here is a picture of sublime heroism never equaled in history. Bruno died that truth might liv. Will American Liberals do themselvs and their cause a perpetual honor by aiding this monument? Respond to T. B. Wakeman, 93 Nassau street, New York, or to E. A. Stevens, 16 Union Park place, Chicago.

UNANIMOUSLY REPUDIATED.

At a meeting of District Assembly 24, representing the various branches of the Knights of Labor, a resolution was adopted, unanimously warning the public against the alleged labor organ which attacked the Secular Union some weeks ago, and which, perhaps, had too much prominence given it. One by one the enemies of the Union fall into the soup, as it were. The resolution reads:

WHEREAS, It has become notorious that a certain publication is palming itself upon the public as the official organ of the Knights of Labor and organized labor generally; therefore be it

Resolved, That District Assembly 24 does hereby notify and caution all whom it may concern that the publication known as the Knights of Labor published in this city is repudiated, and is not the official organ of the order in this district.

We are becoming great on prophecy, and will venture the prediction that, after the spring election, the paper will die the death of the righteous, and its editor will be looking for a friendly lunch counter.

REFUSED TO OBEY THE COURT.

Mary Angelique, or Mary Clarey, mother superior of the House of the Good Shepherd, showed the animus of Romish influence by defying an order of Judge Tuley on a writ of habeas corpus. Notwithstanding that the bailiff explained the consequences likely to follow her refusal to comply with an order of the court, this bride of Christ concluded she would not act in the matter unless so advised by the attorney of the institution. The rest of the story is told by the Chicago Times:

Mary Schell, a sixteen-year-old lass from Elgin, Ill., was the party for whom the writ was issued, and William Corwin, the lover, also from the country, was the person who made application to Judge Tuley for the writ. These young people hav become smitten with each other's charms and on divers occasions hav tried their hands at elopements, but were successfully thwarted by the timely action of the girl's parents, who advised the police in Chicago of their movements. The last attempt was made about a week ago, when Mr. Corwin and Miss Schell came to the city. The police were on hand, however, and arrested the young lady, who was taken before Justice R. H. White. By request of Mrs. Schell the would-be bride was sent to the House of the Good Shepherd on a $50 fine. It was said by Mrs. Schell that her daughter had been ruined by young Corwin and she wanted her put out of his way.

The anxious young man remained in the city and worked hard to hav the fine remitted, but in this he was unsuccessful, even though he secured the aid of Ald. John Powers, who signed an appeal from Justice White's decision. Attempts were made to get Miss Schell's signature to the document, but the mother superior refused point-blank to let her charge be seen. Judge Tuley then issued the writ and instructed Attorney Allison to look after the case. Attorney Wolcy, for the institution, succeeded in having the case continued until to-morrow so that Mrs. Schell would hav an opportunity of hearing the proceedings. Judge Prendergast will be applied to by the young woman's parents for an order committing her to some institution.

It is safe to say that Judge Prendergast will do his very best to accommodate the interests of the church. That is what he was put there for.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. A. S. U.

Equal Taxation.

The organic act of Washington territory provides that "all taxes shall be equal and uniform, and no distinction shall be made in the assessments between different kinds of property, but the assessments shall be according to the value of the property." "No tax shall be imposed upon the property of the United States; nor shall the lands or other property of non-residents be taxed higher than the lands or other property of residents."

Under such an organic law, the exemption of public property from taxation is provided for, but the intent is that all private property shall pay taxes on the value of such property. In 1883 the taxation of church property was agitated, and the legislature submitted to a vote of the people the question. The vote was in favor of the taxation. The legislature of 1886 provided for a limited exemption of such property. The law of 1881 did not exempt it at all. The law of 1886 provided in clause 6, sec. 1: "And 'whereas religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary for good government and the happiness of mankind,' there is further exempted all buildings or institutions of learning, benevolent, charitable, and scientific institutions, and hospitals for the sick and infirm, including the lands upon which such buildings are situated, not to exceed two acres if within a city or town, and not exceeding eighty acres if not within a city or town, and all buildings used exclusivly for public worship and Sabbath-schools, with parsonages, and the lands upon which they are situated, not exceeding one-half of an acre if in a city or town, and not exceeding five acres if not within a city or town. Provided, however, that all such church property, including parsonage property, when valued at more than $5,000, shall pay a tax upon all above that value, and if any part of any building, being a house of public worship, shall be kept or used for any other purpose except for public worship, the part so used shall be assessed and taxed upon the cash valuation thereof. Provided further, that this exemption shall not apply to hospitals used exclusivly for profit."

These exemptions are not authorized by the organic act. The homestead of the mechanic is not used for profit, and if that principle is made the basis for taxation, it should be exempt if the parsonage of the preacher is to be exempt. The law taxes all homes for the people, because the government is put to expense to protect them. For the same reason all private property should be taxed.

But this law discriminates not only between the home of the poor man and the costly palace of the church, but even between the latter and benevolent institutions and hospitals. If a hospital has one free bed, so as not to be used exclusivly for profit, it is exempt from taxation. A Young Men's Christian Association may own a valuable lot, erect a magnificent building, and rent all but a few rooms at a high rental, and pay no tax. A mutual benevolent insurance company can hav no similar exemption.

Such was the answer of the legislators to the vote of the people.

The revenue article of the new constitution should provide for the equal and uniform taxation of all property according to its value, exempting only public property of the United States and of this state and its municipal subdivisions.

Church property was not always exempt. In the early centuries of English history, the clerical barons were assessed for military purposes, and either furnished their quota of armed men or commuted the service by the payment of money. The bishops and archbishops often led their retainers into battle. Hospitals paid taxes. Chief-Justice Holt decided: "Hospital lands are chargeable to the poor as well as others; for no man, by appropriating his lands to a hospital, can discharge or exempt them from taxes to which they were subject before, and throw a greater burden upon their neighbors" (Salkeld's Reports, p. 517).

An effort will be made by the corporations to tax them upon their gross earnings on the traffic within the state. The railroad attorneys will insist that they are building up the state, and as public benefactors should be favored. When they fix passenger and freight traffic, they do not grant the pioneer or the farmer any favors, though they too are building up the state and its industries. They insist that the fixed charges for dividends on their watered stock must be paid by the excessiv charges on local traffic. They demand all the favors, and claim the absolute right to make their own rates, to insist on such contracts as will free them from their common law liability as carriers, and to pay taxes according to their own returns of property and their own estimate of its value.

The question of equal taxation is one of the most important questions that will come before the constitutional convention, and it should be settled upon principles of justice. W. S. Bush.

Three Months' Lecturing.

I visited Lowell, Neb., where I gave two lectures before small audiences. In fact, there is not interest enough in religion, either pro or con, in Lowell to save a saint or singe a sinner; but wife and I did enjoy that English plum-pudding with our English friends, Mr. and Mrs. Gray and their daughters Amy and Kate. That is the way we celebrated Christmas. On the tree, the evening before, all the children, big and little, were remembered.

Olive Branch school-house, near the home of Jason Bloodgood, was filled with an attentiv audience. This was the first Liberal lecture ever delivered there. Bloodgoods are good-blooded Liberals. I gave my third lecture in Newbold's school-house. The building was packed at this place every time I gave a lecture. I really like to lecture in the country once in awhile, and particularly before such a wholesome, wide-awake audience as always greet me here. Some of the best thinkers liv in the country and try to be independent, and would be more so if the mortgage were lifted.

Newark, Neb.—small attendance, but best greenbacking grace up to that point. Mrs. Jones is postmistress of Newark. She and her husband are activ Freethinkers and splendid people. All along our journeying we met with many such. Mr. and Mrs. Hecox are hearty friends of Liberalism in Newark town. Dr. Hawkins is here, winning friends in her medical practice.

A journey of one hundred miles landed us in Wilber, Neb., where, I believe, I hav had the pleasure of addressing good audiences ten times. Mr. John N. Gouff and wife are very earnest Liberals. His health is not as good as when I saw him two years ago, but he is in earnest. Then there is H. Kilgore, one of nature's noblest men, whom it is always a pleasure to think of, and a joy to converse with. His excellent family, wife, two daughters, and son, reside about three miles in the country.

On to Shenandoah, Ia., where a warm welcome awaited us in the home of S. H. Holcomb and wife. The churches were under a high-pressure revival. I little dreamed that this apostle of heresy would shake those churches over hell, as events proved; and succeed in buying five columns of space in one of the most popular journals of southwest Iowa. O that I were rich! Giv me a thousandth part of the wealth of the churches and I really think I could capture Christianity.

Elder D. R. Dungan, president of Bible College of Drake University, Des Moines, Ia., was sent for to punish me for my Infidel impudence. It agrees with me. Dr. James Vincent was my moderator. During the debate the Opera House was several times full to overflowing.

Dr. Humphrey was called away during the progress of the debate to speak fitting words over the remains of Mrs. Ely, a Liberal lady whom the Christian people were anxious to claim for their side, for she was a noble, intelligent woman. She spoke of "angels" before she breathed her last. This was enough for the church, which was intently waiting to proclaim her renunciation of lifelong Liberal principles. News came with the swiftness of the wind—and like it—that she died a Christian. Mrs. Ely feared the church would claim her, and so she took extra pains to call the attention of her friends to the fact that she died as she lived—a Freethinking Spiritualist, having no use for Christianity, and so Liberal that by her special request Dr. Humphrey, an Agnostic Materialist, gave the funeral address. Beloved by all who knew her, a large concourse assembled. Plainly but kindly the doctor squelched the Christian lie which had already commenced to travel, and many that day listened to the fitly chosen words of the Agnostic. W. F. Jamieson.

Coryell, Col.

Mrs. Slenker to McArthur.

The rabble gather round the man of news,
And listen with their mouths wide open; some
Tell, some hear, some judge of news, some make it,
And he that lies most loud is most believed.—Dryden.

I am not at all disappointed that McArthur has "thrown up the sponge," though I rather deprecate the unkindly way in which he did it.

It is easy to accuse another of a want of "understanding" and to make a general fling at a woman, simply because she doesn't happen to be of the dominating sex. But the real question is, has McArthur furnished or "found" any actual argument toward proving that when a man dies he livs again, and is able to communicate with those still in the flesh?

He describes incidents of slate-writing and other phenomena, but how can we be sure it is not all sleight-of-hand? True, there is much one cannot explain philosophically, but time may bring the solution, as it has done in many other cases, and I, for one, prefer to continue the study and wait for developments, rather than jump to conclusions as far-fetched as those which would forever and forever keep in continued existence all the countless billions of millions of human beings who hav had birth since our planet was in a condition to generate or develop them.

Our friend did not quite "catch on" to my idea regarding the five wives.

I did not suggest that the husband would be obliged to "liv with them consecutivly or en masse," but that there would hav to be five of the husbands, and each of the five would hav to be identical in make-up and mind, so as to fill the bill for each of the five wives, and then each would hav her own. And there would need to be for each pair a separate heaven or home, so they would not get mixed up and create "confusion worse confounded."

You see it would not be heaven to Mary, if Susie and Sallie and Jennie and Lucy each claimed John as her special life-companion "over there."

And, indeed, it does rather look as if there was a multiplication of identities in the summer land, as it is not at all uncommon for some great personage to be at several séances at one time, i. e., if we judge from reports of them here and there. I hope, even if I am only a woman who "ever goes by the worse" in an "argument with men," that I shall be credited with honesty of purpose and a willingness to be taught.

Against the head which innocence secures,
Insidious malice aims her darts in vain.

My address will hereafter be as of old—Snowville, Pulaski county, Va, and I shall be there before this is in print, and hope to hear from friends far and near. I want my heaven now, and friendship is life's greatest boon. Elmina Drake Slenker.

Rhinebeck, N. Y., March 23, 1889.

Annexation of Canada.

Mr. Cockburn, a member of the Canadian Parliament, ironically advises his fellow-Canucks, who want closer trade relations with the United States, to accept the offer made by the American colonies in 1777 and become one of the states of the Union.

The offer referred to was made by Benjamin Franklin, who was sent on a mission to Canada in the spring of 1776 to endeavor to unite that country to the common cause of liberty. Two papers were printed and circulated extensivly through Canada, but if was found that not more than one person in five hundred could read. So the mission proved a failure, and Dr. Franklin suggested that if another were intended it should be composed of schoolmasters.

Canada is not now as benighted as she was a hundred years ago, and may yet become a part of the United States—perhaps within the lifetime of Mr. Cockburn. Burr.

Lectures and Meetings.

As soon as arrangements can be made W. F. Jamieson will start on a lecturing tour East, although business affairs may detain him for several weeks in Colorado. Address, Coryell, Col.

Mrs. Mattie A. Freeman will lecture during the second week in April at West Union, Maynard, Olwein, and Aurora, Fayette county, Ia. Societies or individuals desiring the services of this talented speaker near these places, or on the way to or from Chicago, will please address her at 324 West Madison street, Chicago, Ill.

Dates of W. S. Bell's lectures in Oregon: June 20th, Ashland; 21st, Talent; 22d, Jacksonville; 23d, Myrtle Creek; 24th, Roseberry; 26th to July 4th, Coos county; 6th, Coburg; 7th, Lebanon; 8th, Corvallis; 9th, Stayton; 10th, Scott's Mills; 11th, Silverton; 14th, Dayton; 15th, McMinnville; 17th, North Yamhill; 18th, McCoy; 19th, Balston; 20th, Forest Grove; 23d, Hillsboro; 25th, Portland; August 1st, Oregon City; 4th, New Era; 6th, Canby; 7th, Molalla; 9th, Union Mills. Mr. Bell's address is 248 State street, Chicago, Ill.

Samuel P. Putnam's lecture dates are: March 17th, Sacramento; 19th, 20th, 21st, Lemoore; 24th, 25th, 26th, 27th, San Jacinto and vicinity; 31st, San Diego; April 2d, 3d, 4th, San Pasqual; 7th, San Diego; 8th, 9th, 10th, National City; 14th, San Diego; 16th, 17th, 18th, Pomona; 21st, Los Angeles; 23d, 24th, Norwalk; 25th, 26th, Anaheim; 28th, Santa Ana; May 1st, 2d, 3d, Oleander and vicinity; 5th, San Francisco; 7th, 8th, 9th, Boulder Creek; 12th, 19th, 26th, San Francisco and vicinity. Mr. Putnam will be at Fresno Flats, Grub Gulch, and vicinity the first week in June. About the middle of June he will begin his Oregon trip, taking in Silverton, Canby, Molalla, Hillsboro, Shed's, etc. About the third week in July he will be in Coos county, Ore. Those desiring lectures will please write at their earliest convenience, addressing him at 504 Kearney street, San Francisco, Cal.

The Jesuit Oath.

The following is the alleged oath for publishing which the Jesuits of Canada hav sued the Toronto Mail for $50,000. The Mail copied it from Le Semeur Franco-Americain:

"I, N——, now, in the presence of almighty God, the blessed Virgin Mary, the blessed Michael the archangel, the blessed John the Baptist, the holy apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, and the saints and sacred hosts of heaven, and to you, my ghostly father, do declare from my heart, without mental reservation, that the pope is Christ's vicar-general, and is the true and only head of the universal church throughout the earth; and that by virtue of the keys of binding and loosing given to his holiness by Jesus Christ, he has the power to depose heretical kings, princes, states, commonwealths, and governments, all being illegal without his sacred confirmation, and that they may be safely destroyed. Therefore, to the utmost of my power, I will defend this doctrin and his holiness's rights and customs against all usurpers of heretical or Protestant authority whatsoever, especially against the now pretended authority and Church in England, and all adherents, in regard that they be usurped and heretical, opposing the sacred mother church of Rome.

"I do renounce and disown my allegiance as due to any heretical king, prince of state, named Protestant, or to any of their inferior magistrates or affairs. I do further declare the doctrins of the Church of England, of the Calvinists, Huguenots, and other Protestants, to be damnable, and those to be damned who will not forsake the same. I do further declare that I will help, assist, and advise all or any of his holiness's agents in any place wherever I be, and do my utmost to extirpate the heretical Protestant doctrin, and to destroy all their pretended power, legal or otherwise. I do further promis and declare, notwithstanding that I am dispensed with, to assume my religion heretical for the propagation of the mother church interest, to keep secret and private all her agents' counsel, as they intrust me, and not to divulge, directly or indirectly, but execute all which shall be proposed, given in charge, or discovered unto me by you my ghostly father, or by any of this convent.

"In testimony whereof I take this most holy and blessed sacrament of the eucharist, and witness the same further with my hand and seal, in the face of this holy convent."

Mr. Seaver Meant the Free Religious Preachers.

From the Investigator.

The Independent Pulpit has a long and bigoted attack upon the Investigator, which would hardly be worth noticing were it not that its editor misunderstands our remarks to which he takes exceptions. We say misunderstands, for we know of no motiv he can hav to quarrel with us, as we hav never spoken disrespectfully of him. His complaint is founded upon the following remarks of ours which we applied to a certain class of ministers:

It appears to be generally the case, however, that when ministers giv up preaching and take to Liberalism, they wish to "construct" the latter as they did the former. This peculiarity of ministers they never seem to outgrow as a class. They must be at the head of every organization, and "construct" to suit their wishes.

Our critic, who has himself been a minister, jumps to the conclusion that we meant him and the other friends now in the Liberal ranks who were formerly preachers, and whom he mentions by name. Now, if he had read our remarks more carefully—as he should hav done—he would hav seen that we were speaking of Free Religious ministers, and no others. They are the ones who wish to "construct" Liberalism to suit their views, but we expressed the opinion that every Liberal should "construct" for himself without any religious dictation.

A Wholly Accurate Statement.

Mrs. Freeman's Adventures.

At Rockport, Mo., I was entertained at the home of G. G. Beck. The people of Missouri are honest; they are orthodox, too. At Nebraska City, eastern Nebraska, I lost a fur collar while waiting in the depot. Couldn't be found anywhere. Took the train; changed at a junction; stopped at Phelps at 12 o'clock at night; left in cold, foggy air at 4 o'clock in the morning; rode nearly three hours to reach Rockport, which was only five miles distant, the driver said, in good weather, but with the roads as they were then it was fifteen; and after I had been there a couple of days a little parcel was sent to me by the mail-carrier, coming from the goodness only knows where, and sent by nobody knows whom. And so I say the people of Missouri are honest. They would almost rival the beggars of India. A basket is hung on a nail by the roadside, into which the rich drop pennies for the poor. Each beggar as he comes along takes out one penny. Our Chicago beggars would hav taken basket, nail, and all. And I am sure that a resident of this great city of the Sucker state would never hav been guilty of returning that fur collar.

I liked the people of Rockport. Although it was bad weather, yet they came out—that is, quite a number—to hear my lectures. Mr. Beck, who had been instrumental in getting me here, was very well pleased at the result. In a letter which I hav received from him and his kind wife, he assures me that he thinks considerable good was accomplished. Mr. G. G. Beck does all the hard work for Freethought in this place. Mr. Putnam is a favorit here, as indeed I find Mr. Putnam is a favorit wherever I hav been. If the East finds fault with the officers of the Union, the West does not. I sold quite a number of Mr. Stevens's Paine oration here, which it must be acknowledged is a splendid pamphlet for missionary work—carefully written, concise, and bristling with facts which every American should know. Mr. Stevens is thought well of by the people. They admire his honesty, fearlessness, and manly independence.

Among the Liberals at Rockport are M. N. Klein, O. B. Moore, Mr. and Mrs. John Grieve; Miss May Moore and Miss Vic Moore, two pretty, intelligent young ladies, and readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER; E. B. Barker, Dr. Whitmire, Dr. Chamberlain, Dr. C. V. Luja, Wm. Sutter, Charles Volkmann, N. Petry, Herman Seige, Geo. Hatchett, and Joseph Eubanks.

My next place was Graham. I was met at the depot by a wide-awake, well-posted Liberal of Maitland, B. F. Springs, and handed over to H. B. Lang, who was in waiting with his carriage, and driven two miles to Graham. The Liberals of Maitland and Graham join forces, and hav a lecture first in one place and then in the other. Two years ago they had Helen Gardener at Maitland. They assured me that they liked her very much. This last winter they had Mr. Reynolds at Graham. He pronounced it rabidly orthodox. A protracted meeting was in session, and the loving Christians prayed that some intervening providence would keep me away. Providence did not notice me, the heretic, but stupidly went to work and demolished all the churches down in Mount Vernon, Ill., going so far even as to destroy the preacher's house. One never can tell just where providence will strike. He holds the winds in the hollow of his hand, but they get away from him now and then, and when they do, it is just as hard for the saint as the sinner.

Professor Fletcher, of Kansas, happened to be here on a visit, and furnished very fine music, singing a number of Liberal songs, some of them very amusing. The professor also served as chairman, and introduced me to the audience.

The Liberals at this place are young men—"boys" they call themselvs. Nice-looking, intelligent young fellows they are, too. Quite a number take THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Those that I remember are H. B. Lang and G. E. Lang, brothers; E. A. Scheffskey; Joseph Long; E. D. Mursey; A. Kyle, Richard Kyle, and J. W. Kyle, brothers; Jake Ligrand; Jake Greulsh; J. R. Stone; Miss Ida McNeal, the only young lady Freethinker of the place, and her father, Alexander McNeal; also B. F. Springs and Dr. Maxwell, of Maitland.

All seemed to be pleased with my lectures, and wanted me to come again in the near future. A number of these young men take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and since Mr. Reynolds's visit here are following his journeyings with considerable interest.

The work that has been done in Liberalizing the people by those two old Radical papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Boston Investigator, is hardly to be estimated. Wherever these are taken, a community is found who are anxious to engage in Liberal work, hav lectures, and so forth. Wherever I went I urged the necessity of distributing Liberal literature and subscribing for the Liberal papers. "It is coming summer," said H. B. Lang, "and it will soon be warm enough so that the boys can steal out behind the haystacks and read their papers." The boys hav often to read by stealth, the wives, mothers, and sisters of this town being absurdly orthodox.

On nearly every train in Iowa and Nebraska I found priests of various persuasions, running up and down on the road, hither and thither, working the temperance question for all that it is worth, so anxious that the women should vote! Something new, that they who hav always preached long and loud that women shall keep silence in the churches should take such a sudden, lively interest in the question of her equality. The acknowledged aim of the Evangelical Alliance solves the problem. The women are to become the vast majority to put God in the Constitution. And so the priests smile placidly, assured that in the near future they will be rewarded with success.

At Shenandoah I was received by that stanch, well-known Liberal, H. S. Holcomb. Here Mr. Putnam and Mr. Remsburg had been before me. I lectured in the Opera House, speaking Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon and evening. It was very cold and windy, but quite a number were present. There are many earnest Liberals in this place: Mr. Holcomb, and his wife, a very intelligent lady, who writes for the papers on various topics, and who made my stay very pleasant at her house; S. A. Thomas and son, who liv at Bingham, but who came to hear the lectures; J. D. Laughlin, J. S. Ross, J. D. Brenk, G. B. Swift, Dr. J. W. Humphrey and wife, Dr. James Vincent and wife, B. Brubaker and wife, Mr. Hedgecock, and E. D. Van Pelt.

Dr. Vincent is a brother of the publisher of the Nonconformist, the Liberal, Radical, labor paper, and Dr. Humphrey has a very Radical brother residing at Galesburg, Ill., who has recently published a little work criticising the Christian scientists.

Here, too, at Shenandoah, my lectures were a success, and they want me to come back again.

At Guthrie Center I was met by E. B. Rigler, and taken to the house of James France. Mr. Rigler is a young man, earnest and enthusiastic, taking a great interest in all the reforms of the day, and he must be quite well known to THE TRUTH SEEKER, as he disposes of considerable Freethought literature. His wife is a pretty young woman, Liberal as himself, in perfect accord with his tastes and pursuits. Mr. Rigler does all the work of a Liberal character in this town. It was due to his persistent effort that I was enabled to speak here, which was the first Freethought lecture ever delivered in Guthrie Center.

James France is an old Freethinker, having taken the Boston Investigator for years. He came here twenty-eight years ago; owns a fine farm in the country, and an elegant residence in town, where he at present resides. Mrs. France is a woman of considerable independence and ability, and quite an original thinker. Their family of seven children are all Freethinkers. The girls are teachers; the boys farmers, that is, those who are grown. I had a pleasant visit with this family and bade them good-bye with regret.

Other Liberals in Guthrie Center and vicinity are Isaac Ausberry, Samuel Little, M. N. McMellen, Floyd Walters, and Carl Wilson and wife.

At Bassett I spoke in the school-house. I had a good audience, and they seemed to enjoy the lecture very much. Here, I found, Mr. Remsburg had been also. Mr. Brown, of Deerfield, had got him to come, but it was so stormy and the roads so bad that the people from that place could not attend my lecture. I regretted this very much.

Joseph Huffman is the only live, working Liberal at Bassett. He deals in Freethought literature; takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and gets subscribers for it when he can; has lectured on phrenology, receiving very fine notices from the press; is correspondent for several papers, and is fitting himself for an activ, successful future. He is a young man yet, only twenty-six.

From Bassett I came home to Chicago. In every way I regard my tour as a grand success. And in closing this letter, I wish to thank you gratefully, sincerely, kind friends one and all, for your loving, tender care of me in my journeyings.

Chicago, March 13, 1888. MRS. M. A. FREEMAN.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

CANON CITY, COL., Feb. 19th.—Having canceled my Utah engagements, with the promis that on my return via the northern route I would slip down as far, at least, as Salt Lake and vicinity, I returned from Delta to Canon City, where the friends had engaged the Grand Opera House for lectures on Sunday afternoon and evening. Despite the desperate efforts of the parsons, who—for this occasion only—united most lovingly in working the "stay away argument," I had good attendance, and very much interest was manifest. I had a most pleasant interview with noble old Father Pikard. The sturdy old veteran rallied from his sick-bed, came to the Opera House, and sat on the platform by my side during the afternoon lecture. The great ability and irreproachable life of the good Ex-Rev. Mr. Pikard make the Christians very anxious to claim him. During his recent severe sickness, when supposing, from his great age, he could not recover, they circulated the cowardly calumny that he had recanted and desired the ministrations of the clergy. When the brave old hero dies, and cannot propound those logical propositions with which he has in turn silenced each of the parsons, causing them to slink from his presence abashed and confounded, I fear they will induce his relativs—who are devout worshipers of Mrs. Grundy—to hav a fashionable church funeral, and thus afford them an opportunity of getting their revenge by insulting his memory.

I greatly enjoyed my visit with the dear friends, and shall be glad indeed to gratify their very earnest entreaty to return next year and bring Mrs. Reynolds with me, that she may deliver a course of lectures and thus giv renewed impetus to the good work.

LA VETA, COL., Feb. 24th, 25th, 26th.—La Veta is situated on the Cucharas river where the Denver and Rio Grande railroad leaves the valley and turns northwest to commence the ascent of the world-renowned Veta Pass. The country to the south and west of La Veta is considerably broken up by creeks and canons, yet there is much of excellent land for farms or grazing. Oats, I am assured by many reliable persons, hav yielded as high as sixty bushels to the acre, weighing fifty-two pounds to the bushel. Alfalfa is cut three times a year, yielding six tons to the acre. La Veta is a thriving, prosperous town, destined to become one of the most popular, as it will be the most pleasant and health-imparting, of summer resorts. It has a number of highly charged mineral springs, while its great sulphur spring is unrivaled in the cure of rheumatism and kidney troubles. There are now excellent hotel accommodations for all ordinary needs, but arrangements are just completing for the erection of a monster hotel expressly for health-seekers and tourists, where, at most reasonable rates, the very best of accommodations and most perfect cuisine will enable the invalid or pleasure-seeker to spend summer and winter in one of the prettiest spots to be found in Colorado.

The school-house is a splendid, commodious, two-story brick structure, one of the best in the state, and is under the superintendence of Fred Pischel. The schools of Huerfano (they call it whaf-a-no) county are fulfilling their glorious mission, and will not hav the time of the teachers or scholars expended in inculcating superstition. D. D. Ryus, one of the most energetic, enterprising business men in the West, and his brave, fair wife take the lead in all that tends to advance the material, social, or moral interests of La Veta. They are devoted Liberals and workers for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I delivered four lectures at the Masonic Hall to steadily increasing interest. I am confident of a glorious future for La Veta, not only as a prosperous and popular watering-place, but as a citadel of Liberalism.

On the train going to Albuquerque I found an unfortunate, poor, demented wreck who had gone crazy on account of the loss of all his property through the infamous trickery of some pretended Spiritualistic medium. Some of my very best and dearest friends are Spiritualists, and I am glad to acknowledge not alone their noble, useful, exemplary lives, but their intelligence and constant endeavors to do all possible to advance human progress. But these are the kind that, as my good friend Elias H. Gault says, are Spiritualists but not darned fools. I do not think Spiritualism should be held responsible for the silly vagaries and absurd course pursued by poor creatures whose overreaching schemes, having failed, hav produced softening of the brain. Yet it must be admitted the tricksters and frauds who, like barnacles, attach themselvs to Spiritualism, calling themselvs mediums, are too often upheld and permitted to work terrible evil on persons of nervous or excitable temperaments.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M., March 2d, 3d, 4th.—This city, from its geographical position and surroundings, must inevitably become the great commercial and inter-continental railway center of the plains. Founded in the spring of 1880, it has already developed into a thriving, thoroughly American city of ten thousand inhabitants. It is admirably situated on a level plain of the Rio Grande valley. The city is provided with street railways, gas, electric lights, extensiv water works, and ample hotel accommodations for all classes.

Aside from the fact that the accumulation of capital here to meet the demands of trade givs the city advantages which no other point can command, the people are possessed of the liberal, energetic spirit that prompts hearty and substantial aid to every enterprise which will advance the commercial importance of their city or afford employment to her citizens. They are at all times ready and desirous to afford every facility and bestow most generous subsidy on all reliable persons who will establish manufactories.

There is perhaps no city in the West or Southwest where bright, faithful, industrious women and girls willing to do housework can be so sure of good treatment and big wages. Hired girls receive from $20 to $40 per month. Here is a most desirable opportunity for the poor, struggling women of the East to quit drudgery and starvation for competence and independence. There is no show for dudes, loafers, the dissipated, or the shiftless. They hav already a full supply of barkeepers and drones. But brain or muscle desiring profitable employment is sure to find it here all the year round. Skilled mechanics are always in demand. The elevation of the country, dryness of the air, and proximity of the mountains produce here the healthiest climate in the United States.

Here extremes meet. Albuquerque has an old and a new town. The old is indeed quaint, antique. The Mexican houses—if houses such little, low, miserable huts can be called, are built of adobe, that is, blocks of mud and straw, and crumbling to pieces in every direction; the windows mere holes about two feet square, few and far between. Progress is a thing beyond the power of the ordinary Mexican mind to comprehend. If he can hav a mess of beans, and a chance to dance and smoke, all his wants are supplied. The women, most of them, are horrible to look upon—dark, swarthy, dirty, wrinkled old beldames. Young women are very scarce. They seem to suddenly jump from girlhood to being wrinkled old crones. Few of them can read or write, but they can tell their beads and say prayers. Notwithstanding this latter proficiency, they are, I am told, like the men, cruel, degraded, treacherous, lazy. No pen could describe the old town. It is situated about two miles from the new; a rambling, disjointed, unsightly huddle of dilapidated, broken mud walls, scarcely fit for pigs. The houses are about six to seven feet high; the roofs perfectly flat, made of mud and straw on rafters that project over the front wall; the rooms always dark, dismal, dreary, and dirty; their average sleeping outfit a dirty bundle of rags upon the floor.

Yet this old town has existed for over a hundred years, and once comprised the ancient city of the haughty Spanish dons. Of course, there is a Catholic church, a dilapidated old rookery with two primitiv little wooden towers or steeples. The priest rigidly exacts his tithes, one-tenth of all his people make or get; but that is not a very large amount.

The contrast between the old town and the new is very great—one all sloth and decay; the other all activity, bustle, progress. Some of the Mexicans of mixed blood evince advancement, and are in a degree Americanized. In the course of a few decades a new and very peculiar type of Americans will be developed. The Norse and Anglo-Saxon race located here in a land having all the characteristics of the home of the Saracen and the Moor, must evolve something of the racial points of those people, and losing the grossness of the Teutons, but retaining their vigor, will make a new race susceptible of the highest conceivable civilization.

New Mexico is a curious land, with a quaint and curious people. One catches glimpses of a strangely marvelous past, of prehistoric times, of a people passing out of existence, their monuments crumbling into dust, only a bare trace or so of former power and existence coming down to us. It is queer to contemplate distinct periods of race-life that here exist side by side—the Navajo just from savagery; the Pueblo with his primitiv village life; the Mexican with his methods of the dim past and profound indifference to progress, always content to leave all work and duties till to-morrow, and the eager, pushing, restless American, anticipating the future, crowding the work and duty of to-morrow into to-day.

Despite the six churches in the new town, there is a very large Liberal element. The very best people of the city are Infidels. I delivered four lectures at the Opera House, and sold a very large amount of Liberal publications. R. H. Greenleaf, one of the most devoted workers for and admirers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in connection with the genial Colonel Wells, made all the necessary arrangements, and insured the success of my efforts at Albuquerque.

FALL RIVER, KAN.—P. Van Hyatt, who tries to boom Fall River in the letter department of THE TRUTH SEEKER, March 3d, makes an egregious mistake. I can endure "blizzards," but I despise "blowers." It was not the little scrub village of Fall River I objected to, but the miserable shiftlessness of its pretended Liberals. In consideration of their pleading poverty, I delivered three lectures for the price of one; yet, when about to leave, even my board bill was not paid, and the landlord detained my baggage, being for some time unwilling to take the word of Mr. Van Hyatt for the two days' board. Despite imploring me to excuse their shortcomings, and the most solemn pledges to send the balance due me to THE TRUTH SEEKER office, it has never been sent. In my reports I describe persons and places as they appear to me—without fear or favor. I "nothing extenuate nor aught set down in malice." If the Fall Riverites will send me the pittance of which they hav defrauded me, I shall hav a better opinion of their common honesty and their claim to Liberalism. It is Christianity to contract debts, to swindle people out of their just dues, and hav "Jesus, or some other myth, to pay all the debt they owe." P. Van Hyatt and Company need evoluting.

My days of usefulness would indeed be numbered if I had to deal with many such shiftless folks as those of Fall River, Kan. C. B. REYNOLDS.

Sectional Differences.

The Missourians and Kansans regard each other with the kindly feelings that existed between the Jews and Samaritans, and for the same reasons. We came here, but Kansans were "assisted emigrants" planted there by "Emigrant Aid Societies," like the Assyrians planted in Samaria. They regard John Brown and his fellows as heroes; we as murderers and as having indistinct ideas about the title to horses. During the war they hauled off nearly every rail in the border counties of Missouri and fenced their treeless prairie farms with them. Their regularly enlisted troops burnt five towns in Missouri. Our irresponsible bushwhackers burnt one in Kansas—the historical sacking of Lawrence. Jim Lane once made a speech in Leavenworth and told about a paradise in this county called "Greenton Valley," and how he found a wicked slaveholder named Hook, and how he stripped him. Some one in the crowd called out, "Where is Hook now?" Lane answered, "In hell. I left him in the hands of the executioner!" I rode up the Missouri on the same boat with Lane, and both his temples were black with huge blisters put on to save him from the effects of his last debauch. I went on to Nebraska City; he got off at Leavenworth. The first paper we got on landing told how he had blown his own brains out. But the best is to come. Hook still livs in this town. He is old. but "fat and sassy," and as jolly as "old King Cole." His slaves hired to him after freedom and are working for him to-day, and, what is almost unparalleled, they all keep the name Hook. Nearly all the other freedmen took new names, to be sure they were not the same old slaves.

My older brother was flagman in a surveying party in Kansas when it was a territory, between Council Grove and Emporia. He kept notes showing the quality of the land, taking the best land in Lafayette county, Mo., as the standard. None of the Kansas land was over third-rate. It causes us to think of "poetical justice" when we see Kansans coming back through Missouri by thousands as they did last fall, many of them begging.

I can tell Mr. Reynolds why people skip Missouri and go to Kansas. The part of Missouri where there is the most room, and where there is still plenty of government land, is the southern one-third part of the state bordering on Arkansas. What is known as "Bald Knobberism" is prevalent there. When a new settler arrives, the old settlers take him out at night and whip him, as they do not want the purity of their community changed by foreign intermixture. This is discouraging to new settlers. If not, they kill them. The Bald Knobbers are a peculiar breed of men. They are the old John A. Murrell stock of people from the Tennessee mountains originally. Before the war they were horse-thieves. During the war they were Union men solely because they hated the rich slaveholders. After the war they became illicit distillers and murderers of United States marshals. The reason the Missouri Republican of St. Louis (Democratic) does not expose them is that they are in a Democratic state. The Globe-Democrat (Republican in politics) does not expose them because they all vote the Republican ticket. This is why people pass over Missouri into that natural and moral Sodom and Gomorrah, Kansas, and raise only one crop in three years.

I hav heard the theory advanced that the white inhabitants of the United States are becoming much like the Indians in their peculiar characteristics, section for section; for instance, there in Virginia, Carolina, Florida, and other Southern states, the most warlike; in New England the most intelligent, etc. The Konza (Kansas), or Kaws, were by common consent the meanest and most contemptible of all American Indians.

A financial circular of March 10th says that "vast amounts of real estate paper . . . especially in Kansas, are daily going to protest," so Mr. Reynolds is on the right track. Kansas is mortgaged to-day for more than it is worth—farm mortgages, county and municipal bonds, etc. It is now receiving some accessions of population from Missouri. When a Missourian swindles his creditors, he goes to Kansas and settles. "Birds of a feather," etc.

You may drink what you will and as much as you can in Kansas, if you will do it on the "whited sepulcher" plan.

In view of all these facts, when I read Mr. Reynolds's letter I "loffed and loffed" like an Englishman and rested awhile and then "larfed and larfed" like a Yankee. Mr. Reynolds evidently knows a thing when he sees it.

Time at last makes all things even.

Lexington, Mo., March 13, 1888. GEO. WILSON.

Our London Letter.

The necessity for the disestablishment of the Established church in Wales is becoming more apparent every day. The Welsh are, generally speaking, a hard-headed and practical, but, most unfortunately for themselvs, a very religious people; and it is not superstition generally against which they are fighting, but only one form of it. Being for the most part Methodists, they hav a very strong objection to paying tithes to the priests who are placed over them by the patrons of the church livings, few of whom are able to speak the language of the country, and consequently there is no feeling of sympathy between the shepherd and his sheep. Of course the priests represent themselvs as very hardly used beings, and instead of relying upon their deity to supply them with food and raiment, or soften the hearts of the rebels, they invoke the aid of the government, and saddle the country with the cost of collecting the tithes. The childlike faith in God that these hypocritical scoundrels are so fond of preaching is not considered of any practical good when the opportunity arrives for them to show how efficacious it might be, and then they express surprise that Infidelity (so-called) should be spreading so rapidly. If the majority of people would only think a little, and compare the precepts with the practice of the clergy, the Christian religion would be extinct in a very few years. But owing to the result of early education in supernaturalism, they come to the conclusion that the religion they profess is true, and that its paid exponents are in fault.

The bishops in convocation are sorely distressed "that there has of late been a very marked increase of the use of the afternoon and evening of the Lord's day for amusements of various kinds in the upper and fashionable classes of society." The real grievance appears to be, not so much that the rich classes fail to attach any sanctity to Sunday, but that their example is being followed by the poorer classes. For, although the wealthy may fail to trouble about such matters, still they subscribe handsomely to all the little swindles got up by the clergy, and that will fully compensate for their absence from the churches; but when the workers and toilers cease their attendance they also stop subscribing, preferring to spend what little spare cash they may possess on their own comforts, and a few million widows' mites make up a very large sum at the end of the year.

The bishops are graciously willing that the workers shall hav one day in seven to themselvs, but it must not be used for recreation, and consequently a strong feeling obtains that public conveyances should not be allowed to run on the only day on which so many thousands are able to find out that there is such a thing as fresh air. The clergy do not care whether the laity are sanctified, damned, or annihilated after death, but it is a matter of great interest that they should pay to keep them in idleness during life. To the truly pious man there is no god but Mammon, and Christians are his prophets. J. D.

A Fable.

A dog who had ever been remarked to watch all the doings of men with a sly, observing eye, at length was heard one day to exclaim in rapture: "I hav found it at last—the way to gain a dominion over the minds of the silly of one's fellows, and thereafter liv in an agreeable state of very limited work and quite unlimited favor from the females of the flock." He immediately assembled all the dogs of the neighborhood, and, getting on a stump, commenced leaping up and down, yelping madly, tearing out his hair, and flinging his paws about, meanwhile talking in a way from which all the dogs, after some deliberation among the old and sage, were forced to conclude he was mad. At which they all knocked him off the stump, gave him chase, rolled him in the mud, tore his hide, and finally brought him before a grave St. Bernard magistrate and charged him with hydrophobia. The unfortunate animal, now humiliated and fearful, tried to save himself by alleging that what he was doing was simply preaching Christianity, and could not help expressing surprise that its reception was so different from that which, from the observations he had made among their masters, he had had reason to expect. "But," exclaimed the judge with dignity, as he passed sentence of death, "we are dogs, not Presbyterians." "Besides," added several, haughtily, "we hav read the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1888!"

Colonel Ingersoll's Legal Style.

Gossip About Lawyers in New York Tribune.

Colonel Ingersoll is another member of the picturesque school of lawyers, and much resembles Mr. Conkling in oratorical propensitv. There is this difference, however, that no element of self appears in the breezy speeches of the colonel. They are heart and soul for his client. He is at his best when engaged in presenting his facts. His statements are lucid and full, his illustrations dramatic and ingenious, his manner frank and persuasiv. His speeches in court, like his wicked lectures, are full of humor, invectiv, and tenderness. I heard him in a recent case speak of his adversaries as "vultures sitting on the fence of expectancy." He alluded to them also as "lolling around the hole in the ground in which my client was digging, and when his spade unearthed the precious ore, they all with one accord jumped in upon him and attempted to rob him of the fruits of his toil." At this point his client, Edward Stokes, plucked the colonel's sleeve and whispered in his ear. With a genial grin, Mr. Ingersoll turned to the court, saying, "Please, your honor, my client says that my metaphor is beautiful and true except in so far as it represents him as finding anything valuable in the hole!" "Mortgage these wires!" he exclaimed, at another point; "why, you might as well talk of mortgaging the track left by the flight of a flock of geese through the air!"

Home Rule for Americans.

Mayor Hewitt of this city has set an exceedingly good example to the other politicians, and one which can be profitably studied in other cities and states, by everybody. The occasion was the receipt by him from the board of aldermen of two resolutions requesting the mayor "to cause the national, state, and municipal flags, and the Irish national flag, to be displayed on the flag-staffs on the city hall, on Saturday, the 17th instant, in honor of the celebration by the Irish civic and military organizations in this city of the anniversary of the natal day of Ireland's patron saint, pursuant to the power vested in him by Section 198 of Article XV of Chapter VIII of the Revised Ordinances of 1880," and "to place at half-staff a flag on flag-staff of the city hall on the day of the funeral of the lamented Kaiser William." The last request was granted by Mr. Hewitt, as the American flag was all the aldermen seemed to require; and he also put up the American colors on St. Patrick's day, but he peremptorily refused to fly the Irish flag. On previous occasions, also, he has refused to display the British, German, French, and Italian symbols when requested by citizens of those nationalities, and in a message to the board of aldermen he now givs his reasons for his patriotism. We cannot help thinking they are sound, and wishing that the revival of Americanism would spread. Mr. Hewitt says:

"This city is a political organization including and representing the interests and sympathies of all its citizens. Its charter does not know or recognize any other than American citizens, and by the law no distinction exists or can be established between those of American and of foreign birth. The whole policy of our political system has been to efface all distinctions between citizens on the ground of birth, and hence even in foreign countries the government of the United States throws the broad shield of its protection over the naturalized citizen who may visit the land of his birth. In 1868, chiefly owing to the able and persistent efforts of Hon. William E. Robinson, then a member of Congress from the city of Brooklyn, the following laws were adopted:

"Section 2,000. All naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign countries, are entitled to and shall receive from this government the same protection of persons and property which is accorded to nativ-born citizens.

'Section 2,001. Whenever it is made known to the president that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign government, it shall be the duty of the president forthwith to demand of that government the reasons of such imprisonment; and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, the president shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen, and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, the president shall use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate the release; and all the facts and proceedings relativ thereto shall, as soon as practicable, be communicated by the president to Congress (U. S. Revised Statutes).

"It will thus be seen that this country recognizes no distinction whatever between its nativ and foreign-born citizens. They are all under one flag, and owe allegiance to the same government. It would be a great injury, as it seems to me, to the rights of our citizens of foreign birth if any public officer should, in any official manner, recognize the existence of distinction in the nationality of American citizens. The flag is the symbol of sovereignty. The public buildings are peculiarly the home of that sovereignty. In them only one jurisdiction can be recognized and suffered to prevail. Over them should float only the flag of the country to which they belong. So sacred is this right that the flag of the foreign minister or consul, floating over his domicil in a foreign land, converts it into the soil of the country which he represents. The display of a foreign flag over a public building is, therefore, in direct contradiction of the fundamental principle of 'home rule,' which every intelligent citizen advocates, and which doubtless you intended to emphasize by your resolution."

This, we take it, is sound American doctrin, and appreciated and upheld by none more than by Liberals, whose chief political aim is to enforce American principles. All over the country, but especially in New York, the foreigners are clannish and do not readily assimilate with the American population. Though legal American citizens, their hearts are in allegiance to foreign countries and foreign rulers. Especially is this true of all Catholic people. In the Northwest, the German Catholics preponderate, and they seem to care more for the authorities at Rome than for their state or national officers. In New York the pope is supreme ruler of something like a third of our population. With this message to the aldermen, Mayor Hewitt sent a table showing the proportion of people here who are foreign-born, or of parents one or both of whom are foreigners, to be 80.15 per cent. The nativ-born Americans, with both parents nativs, are only 19.85 per cent.

The pure foreigners number 39.68 per cent. And of nativ-born, with one or both parents foreign, there are 40 47 per cent. The English-speaking people of this city are only 80.624 per cent of its total population, leaving 19.376 per cent who cannot talk the language of the country which protects them. Considering these facts, Mayor Hewitt wisely says:

"What a change has been produced in sixty-five years! The patriotic traditions of the Revolutionary forefathers, by whose labor and sacrifices this country was made the refuge of the oppressed of all lands, are thus preserved as the direct inheritance of less than twenty per cent of the population of this city. Considering that since the time of Monroe 14,000,000 of immigrants hav come to our shores, our power of assimilation is indeed little less than miraculous, but in the presence of this vast tide of foreign influence it is indispensable to erect every safeguard and to preserve every muniment of free institutions. Of these, nothing is more potential than the flag of the country, which is associated with memories altogether American. Its supremacy should never be diluted by any suggestion of divided allegiance. Let it be remembered that fully twenty per cent of our population do not speak the English language, and must necessarily be ignorant of our laws and incapable of understanding the genius of our institutions. To them the flag is the emblem of power, and if the spectacle is habitually presented to their eyes of promiscuous flags floating from our public buildings, they cannot be expected to recognize the fact that the only source of power is the whole people, whose unity and sovereignty are symbolized by the flag of the Union alone.

"It will thus be seen that, if my views are correct, the display of foreign flags on the public buildings appropriated to legislation and to the administration of justice cannot be defended. To their use in the private or public festivities of the nativs of foreign countries there can be no well-founded objection, and so far as they tend to keep alive the ties of family they serve a useful purpose, but whenever it is sought to put them on an equality with the ensign of our common citizenship, the claim must be firmly resisted on the ground of public policy and of true patriotism.

"I observe with regret that my action has been thoughtlessly denounced in some quarters as the outcome of an unfriendly disposition toward the Irish people in their struggle for national independence. A very little reflection will serve to show to these complainants that in my action I hav only been giving effect to the principles upon which their cause is advocated by all lovers of civil liberty, myself among the others, and that if it be right that Ireland should be governed by Irishmen, as France is governed by Frenchmen and Germany by Germans, then it is equally true that America should be governed by Americans, and that so far as the flag is the symbol of home rule, it, and it alone, should float from the seat of sovereignty.

"I invite your careful study of the facts presented, which will serve to show why candidates for office are so anxious to secure the foreign vote, and to prove also that the danger line has been reached, when it must be decided whether American or foreign ideas are to rule in this city. If the warning which I hav been constrained to giv shall hav the effect of arousing public attention to the good, old-fashioned American idea of home rule, homesteads, and home products, I shall feel that I hav not made a mistake in the official action which my sense of duty has required me to take."

To the American the facts presented by New York's mayor are significant and humiliating. They mean that the metropolis of America is under the rule of a population who do not understand the meaning of the word liberty, and who never will until they become free from the domination of the pope. They hav, too, brought to our shores their petty feuds and ridiculous religious customs; they are clannish, and vote for doubtful candidates who are of their own nationality in preference to better candidates who belong to the hopeless American minority. This they do largely at the dictation of their spiritual rulers. Such a course must finally be fatal to our institutions, ending in their surrender to foreign potentates.

Mayor Hewitt's message is the most statesmanlike document that a New York politician has lately evolved.

Facts and Speculations from Italy.

The Rev. Alexander Robertson, writing from San Remo, Italy, upon the religious condition of that country, incidentally divulges a matter of interest to the Freethinkers who subscribed to the proposed monument to Bruno at Rome. It will be recollected that the municipality of Rome, when asked for a site upon which to erect the monument, refused to grant one. It appears that this refusal was due to the opposition of Torlonia, syndic of Rome, helped by other Catholics. It is in connection with this that Mr. Robertson tells an interesting story of retribution. Signor Bonghi was one of the most virulent opponents of the monument project, and aided Torlonia in many ways. Signor Bonghi is professor in the University of Rome, and one morning upon entering his class-room a hundred and fifty students hissed him for over an hour, so that he was unable to deliver his lecture. The explanation of their conduct was that on the day previous he had spoken against the erection of the monument. After some conferences with the university senate and the authorities it was believed that the affair had ended, and that he might resume his lectures. To minimize, however, the importance of the demonstration against him, Professor Bonghi wrote a letter stating that they were not bona-fide students who had hissed him, but only a handful of roughs who had gained admittance to the lecture-room for that purpose. The students again showed their patriotism and opposition to clericalism, and disapproved Professor Bonghi's words by hissing him out of countenance a second time. Their action led to other complications, and, says Mr. Robertson, things hav not yet settled down. The university had to be closed altogether for a day or two, whilst the students of other universities throughout the land took up the matter and sent addresses of sympathy and support to their fellow-students at Rome.

Torlonia, the syndic, has been punished also, though not for his action in this matter. In the recent jubilee of the pope, Torlonia presented his homage to Leo, and was promptly dismissed from office therefor by the Italian government. This was done because the government regards the clericals as enemies of the state, and other syndics who signed addresses to the pope shared the same fate. The elections, however, in Rome last year, as was reported to the congress of the English Secular Society last May, resulted in the selection of so many Christians that the desired site for the monument will probably not be obtained at present, though funds for the structure are in hand.

The Rev. Mr. Robertson relates that the relations of the state and church in Italy are more strained since the pope's jubilee than ever before, which must soon, he thinks, inevitably lead to a decisiv contest. That celebration gathered the dignitaries of the church, lay and clerical, round their head. They were thus enabled to consult together, to measure their strength, and to determin on their future course of action. Previous to this they were anything but united. Personal ambition, family differences, and jealousies of various kinds kept them apart. Now there is at least a temporary agreement to sink these petty causes of estrangement and quarrel, and to unite their forces to make a stand and fight for the restitution of the temporal power. The clerical party has received instructions to take an even more activ part than they hav hitherto done in municipal and senate elections, and to do everything in their power to secure the election of clericals to all public offices. These instructions are already being carried out with a measure of success in various provincial towns and villages, where the people are ignorant and do not know their rights, and where, consequently, the priests are nearly all-powerful. Hitherto the clerical party has been disloyal, now it is rebellious. Friendship with a priest is regarded as almost treason to the state, and anyone seen in company with a clerical is suspected. The pope is denounced as Italy's worst foe; the priests as disloyal to the core; they are accused of being against the king, against the government, against real education, against civil liberty, against all the rights as men and citizens which Italy had fought and bled on many a battle-field to secure. A town councilor of San Remo said to Mr. Robertson: "We shall never make our young men honest and patriotic until we deliver them from the influence of the priests. Any offense against the state the priests not only condone, but often commend."

In many towns in Italy the positions of schoolmaster are held by these disloyal and traitorous Romanists, and a strong effort is being made to remove all priests from the public schools, and to declare that the priesthood, as a body of men, is disqualified to hold the office of government teacher. School-books written by priests are not allowed to be used as text-books in the schools, but the priests hav been in the habit of giving them as prizes. Signor Crispi has just sent out a circular to all the municipalities, and to the principal libraries, and editors of scholastic books, in which he warns them that the ministry cannot longer permit such books to be so used. "Books of this class, so-called religious," he says, "are an offense against liberty of conscience which can no longer be tolerated," and he adds "that henceforth the scholastic provincial councils will examin all books intended for prizes, and that the government will punish any attempt to infringe these regulations."

Mr. Robertson adds that he might multiply these skirmishes, which are regarded in Italy as the forerunners of the actual battle soon to take place there between the church and state. In demanding and intriguing for a restoration of temporal power, the pope has set up as a rival to the king; his success means the downfall of secular government, and the state can no longer refuse to act. Mr. Robertson professes to see in the coming struggle much good for Protestantism; but if he has paid close attention to the history of the Latin races he knows that when they abandon the superstitions of Catholicism they are not apt to acquire those of Protestantism.

Let's All Be Hypocrits.

Judge Kilbreth has rendered his decision in the case of Knoedler, the art dealer, and his clerk. The arrest was made some three months ago by Anthony Comstock, the pictures complained of numbering thirty-five. Judge Kilbreth finds only two of them obnoxious to the charge, and these only technically, owing to the narrow definition of obscenity laid down by the courts. Among those pronounced chaste by Judge Kilbreth are the ones upon which Mueller was convicted, while one of the two adjudged possibly salacious is of clothed figures. The judge said that the question of obscenity was largely a question of training; the defendants were morally guiltless; and that "the minds of the young" and the morals of such men as Dr. Dix would hav to take care of themselvs, for, said the judge, there are many other things to be taken into consideration, and if we conduct ourselvs only with consideration for the minds of the young we wouldn't do a good many things we do.

On Monday Mr. Knoedler and his clerk and Comstock went into court, where the art dealer and his sevant pleaded guilty, were fined fifty dollars each, which they paid, and went out free men.

This disposal of this celebrated case only complicates the situation, and leaves the ordinary individual lost in dumb amazement at the beauty of the scheme which places every art dealer at the mercy of Anthony, a police justice, an old legal definition, and twelve men. The pictures which convicted Mueller are pronounced chaste by Judge Kilbreth, and a clothed picture is declared vicious under the decisions of the courts, though the judge himself could see nothing injurious in it. Some other judge might regard these as all right, and hold an art dealer on copies of the biblical pictures, such as Joseph and Potiphar's wife, exhibited at the Metropolitan Museum; while the right sort of a jury, gathered from a Presbyterian church, would condemn the Venus of Milo and every representation of femininity without its winter wraps on. The only safe and practicable plan, therefore, is for the world to eschew art, grow hideous and deformed, and revive the puritanism of morals of two hundred years ago. It is no longer safe to possess the beautiful.

All we can say is, that if New York likes this sort of thing, it is just the sort of thing New York ought to hav. How a city of a million and a half of hypocrits will shine in the progress of the world!

Two Christians.

Every now and again some fellow comes to the surface with some real old-fashioned ideas, proving that the race of Christians is not yet extinct, and that despite the innovations made in religion by modern science a real Christian, so far as his brain permits, does exist. Two of this kind poked their heads up recently.

The first was Professor Malcomson, of Dallas, Texas. His specialty is astronomy, and in this science he is an ally of the Rev. John Jasper. The present accepted system, he says, is decidedly antagonistic to scripture, as is easily shown. That the earth is a plane, instead of a sphere, agrees with biblical accounts, which plainly indicates that the inspired writers held that view. The sneers of Atheists (so affirms Mr. Malcomson) and the jeers of the scoffers at religion receive a certain force from our present astronomical theories, and the harm so done to Christianity is incalculable. Upon this subject Mr. Malcomson proposes to lecture, and maintain the following points: 1. That the earth is a plane surface; 2. That it is motionless, as regards rotating on an axis or revolving around the sun; 3. That the sun and moon are smaller than the earth; 4. That the moon has a light of her own and does not reflect that of the sun; 5. That eclipses of the moon are not caused by the shadow of the earth. All of which he proves by scripture.

The other Christian is the Rev. A. A. Robinson, pastor of the Franklin avenue Methodist church of Cleveland, Ohio. On the Sunday following the Mt. Vernon, Ind., cyclone, Mr. Robinson preached a sermon in which he considered, scripturally, what the devil has to do with tornadoes. When Satan struck, and was ejected from heaven, he became the prince of the powers of the air. And with him are legions of the fallen, imprisoned in our atmosphere, awaiting the day of judgment. These persons are ceaseless in their activity. They control the air, by permission of God, who, for his own wise purpose, lets them do it, as he lets cyclones of immorality sweep over the land. Instances proving the devil and his legions to be the moving cause of tornadoes are the death of Job's children while feasting, with which Satan was directly connected; the storm on the sea of Galilee, wherein the devil thought to drown all the fishermen while Jesus slept; and the cyclone at Mt. Vernon, which, though full of mystery, becomes clear when the previous two instances are remembered. For when Satan, a free moral agent who has not yet been brought to final judgment, as man has not, operating in a region of greater power and vaster responsibility than man, spurs the wind into a cyclone and by the abuse of the blessing of God wrecks a city, he simply shows the nature which works everywhere in those who abuse the blessings of God.

To find how far the world is to-day from real Christianity we need men and preachers of this sort. They bring the milestones of progress more distinctly into view. "In this age of fact and demonstration it is refreshing to find a man who believes so thoroughly in the monstrous and the miraculous, the impossible and the immoral—who still clings lovingly to the legends of the bib and rattle—who through the bitter experiences of a wicked world has kept the credulity of the cradle, and finds comfort and joy in thinking about" the prince of the powers of the air, and the cyclones he stirs up by God's permission. "How touching when the learned and wise crawl back in cribs and ask to hear the rhymes and fables once again! How charming in these hard and scientific times to see old age in Superstition's lap, with eager lips upon her withered breast!"

Editorial Notes.

"An exchange wants to know 'why it is, with so many negroes dying, nobody every sees a black ghost.' It is for the same reason that, with so many white people dying, nobody ever sees a white ghost."—Norristown Herald.

Just wait till Mr. Colby, of the Banner of Light, sees this dogmatic declaration of the Norristown Herald!

A friend sends us a pretended "death warrant" of Jesus Christ, copied from a Spiritualist paper, which prints it as genuin. The thing is a humbug and forgery, the work of monks, and only the most ignorant can be deceived thereby. The mendacity of superstition is wonderful, but not more so than the credulity of the people.

Why does not Anthony Comstock suppress Dr. Dix? His late Lenten sermon is so obscene that a lady told a writer for the Evening Post that she had "hidden all papers having a report of Dr. Dix's late lecture from her daughter;" that she "would not for the world hav such ideas put in the mind of this young girl," adding that "she believed every pure girl who listened to the lecture left the church less pure than when she entered."

Judge Bookstaver has refused to grant an injunction restraining the Fifth avenue stage company from running their vehicles on Sunday. In a sedate and judicial way Judge Bookstaver poked considerable fun at Elliott F. Shepherd, telling him that if he did not want to be identified with the irreligious action of the stage company he should follow the Bible injunction, "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins," by selling his stock.

A reverend gentleman who has devoted his life to religious work, but who through all has been more man than minister, writes to us: "I hav worked forty years among rich and poor, an ecclesiastical nondescript. Much of my time has been given to the lowest classes, for whom, outside the churches, I hav had schools and missions, and arrangements for supplying the young and old with work. My regular parishioners in the city hav at the same time been of the rich—'first-class,' foolishly called—and while personally friendly to their pastor, yet regarded my best work as not respectable.' Bishops and clergy hav openly opposed and derided my work." Comment upon these comments is superfluous.

The National Baptist says, in an editorial on trusts:

"Of course, the bad pre-eminence in all this matter belongs to the Standard Oil Company. This corporation has, by ability, by boldness, by utter unscrupulousness, by the use of vast capital, managed to control every producer, every carrier, to say nothing of the legislatures and courts."

The Examiner, also a Baptist journal, comments:

"The four most prominent men in the Standard Oil Trust are eminent Baptists, who honor their religious obligations, and contribute without stint to the noblest Christian and philanthropic objects. The four leading men in the 'trust' are John D. Rockefeller, William Rockefeller, Jabez A. Bostwick, and Charles Pratt, and all of them illustrate in their daily lives their reverence for a living Christianity."

Further remark would seem to be uncalled for, not to say unkind.

One of the St. Johns, Mich., papers just after Christmas, last year, referred to our old friend Babcock this way: "M. Babcock's Christmas-tree this year bore the sunny fruit of charity in the shape of envelopes containing $5 bills for several poor widows of St. Johns, and several dollars for poor boys. Mr. Babcock's theology is not up to the orthodox standard, but when it comes to the solid religion of clothing the widow and feeding the orphan, his record outshines that of many who, neglecting to scatter sunshine in the paths of their less favored fellow-mortals, hope to mount to joys celestial on the clipped wings of creed and dogma." Mr. Babcock is a bright and shining example to the Christians of his neighborhood.

Chuckling over the confiscation of Mormon church property, the Independent says: "A fairly successful raid has been made upon church property long held in defiance of federal statutes, such as temples, tithing houses, church farms, and the like, and even upon snug sums invested in stocks and bonds. Thus the sinews of war hav been seriously touched, and as a result, propagandism has been largely paralyzed." So! Supposing the government next tries its hand on the church structures in Washington worth over fifty thousand dollars each; will the Independent applaud that? How about that two or three million dollar Catholic university to be built in our national capital, which is subject to the same laws as the territories? Will the Independent demand its confiscation? If not, why?

A correspondent of the New York Tribune waxes sarcastic in the following short letter: "Sir: With reference to the attempt being made to tax the institutions in charge of the governors of the New York Hospital, I suggest that if these gentlemen had worldly wisdom enough to tack on to these institutions a little religion, to call them Saint Somebody's Retreat, or adopt some name by which they may pass for 'religious institutions,' then our pious legislators would let them alone, on the tax question not only, but make them generous appropriations besides. I make this suggestion by reason of the fact that institutions controled by religious organizations hav not only been free from the operation of our tax laws and from assessments, but appropriations for their support are annually made. True, all this is against the 'spirit of our institutions,' in conflict with the theory of our government, a rank injustice to many, and in open violation of law. But what of that? say those who claim exemption for churches and other religious organizations. Is not religion of more importance than justice, than right, than principle, than obedience to legal enactments? Instead of a civil government, with the church separate from the state, with religion paying its own expenses, we hav 'a theological government, supporting religious creeds and sects.'"

Letters from Friends.

NAPLES, N. Y., March 20, 1888.

GEO. W. BARNES, Dear Sir: You are mistaken, sir. I do not ask Brother Shoemaker to wear shoes that pinch his feet. But I do not want him to prohibit from wearing them another whose feet they do fit.

More than all, I do not want him, because he gets a misfit, to kill the shoemaker, and thereby compel us all to go barefoot. Because there is a dish on the table which you do not relish, do not kick over the table. It is not in good taste. Besides, the dish which you dislike may tickle the palate of another. But if you kick the table over, all must go hungry. Do you understand? "Only this and nothing more."

Let Brother Barnes hav his say; it suits me exactly. My ship will steadily pursue its course even though the trade winds blow. "Variety is the spice of life." We naturally look for it to be a little windy about the time of the vernal equinox. JOHN PECK.

ST. PAUL, Feb. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been an occasional reader of your valuable paper for several months past, and I wish to say to you that I am quite pleased with it. I consider it one of the ablest prints that it has ever been my fortune to meet. The cartoons by Mr. Heston, I think, are just immense, and there is in some of them more truth than could be told in a volume. I am satisfied that the pictures can hav no other effect than that of doing good. Those who cannot read print can read the pictures. It is the belief of many that the cartoons in Harper's Weekly, which Nast made, had as much to do with the breaking up of the Tweed ring as any other influence, and, perhaps, more than any other. At any rate, we hav "Boss" Tweed's own words to this effect. He said: "I do not care what they print, for my constituents cannot read, but damn those pictures! They can see." By all means continue the cartoons, and as Nast was such a power in breaking up the Tweed ring, so it may be that Heston will be a great power to help break up the Christian superstition. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER! Long liv Heston! I hope to be a subscriber to your paper in the near future.

Very truly yours, J. MONROE.

FOSTORIA, O., Feb. 17, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: At the recent plenary council at Baltimore the bishops agreed on regulations for their slaves and dupes in regard to what they shall eat and what they shall drink during the season they call Lent, and they are to be binding for fourteen years. These poor dupes, who are called citizens of the United States, bend the knee and giv up their manhood at the command of a lot of Italian foreigners, headed by the pope of Rome. Ye gods! what a sight to see! American citizens submitting to these foreigners to the extent of receiving their commands when they shall eat eggs, when they shall eat meat, and when they shall fast altogether. The use of white meat is "tolerated" by these foreigners, and the American citizen can use fat to fry with, under the toleration of this foreign element. If the head of the church and these bishops were American citizens, it would not seem quite so bad, but for Americans to suffer and obey such language is too much. Such citizens are not fit to be in this republic, much less enjoy the franchise of freemen. When will Americans see that to giv votes to the dupes of the Roman hierarchy is giving a stab to the very heart of the republic? They cannot be good American citizens and at the same time owe their allegiance to foreigners, to the extent even of allowing these Roman tyrants to dictate even what they shall eat and what they shall drink. O that the eyes of the people may be opened in time to save this glorious republic from becoming a mere tail to the Roman kite, and sunk in ignorance as low as all countries are where this Italian hydra gets into power! J. DOWNES.

SPANISH FORK, UTAH, Feb. 20, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: Thinking it might be interesting to some of the readers of your paper to hav a word from this part of the Lord's vineyard, I write a few lines to say that both saints and gentiles hav enjoyed a rare mental treat by a course of lectures delivered by Dr. York. This county—that is, Utah county, Utah—is the stronghold of the Latter Day kingdom, and although the doctor has been having great success in Salt Lake City, I was afraid that it would be hard for him to make an impression on the Saints in the country towns. However, we hav been gloriously disappointed. The doctor delivered two lectures in Provo City, on the 7th and 8th of February, in the court house. The first night the house was full, and the lecture, "Evolution; or, Are We Man or Monkey—Which?" was delivered by the doctor with such force and eloquence that it was pronounced by all the best lecture ever delivered in this city. The next day the doctor's friends got together and proposed that he should deliver two other lectures, and they would rent the Opera House for the occasion. The doctor giving his consent, Mr. Morwick was delegated to wait upon the managers of the Opera House to see what the house could be got for, and make arrangements for the lectures. The managers being blue-blooded Mormons, Mr. Morwick was informed that we could not hav the house at any price. So much for bigotry. The next night the court-room was full to its uttermost capacity. The doctor gave the managers of the Opera House a little of his mind, and then delivered his lecture: "Inspiration and Revelation; or, How God Speaks to Man." The doctor seemed at his best, and he did shiver the timber of the old ship Zion in fine style. At the close the doctor asked his audience if they wanted him to come again on the 7th and 8th of March and speak to them. Said the doctor: "If you do, please hold up your hands." The vote was unanimous. The doctor has also delivered three lectures at Payson with equal results, and by request he lectures there again on the 29th of March. The doctor delivered one lecture at Springville, and is engaged to deliver two more on the 27th and 28th of March. I was with the doctor at these lectures. I never dreamed of such success. The doctor held his audience spellbound for over two hours every time. Thus the strongholds of Zion are being bombarded by this great champion of Freethought. The doctor is very suitable for this country, and I think it would be wise if the Utah Secular Union could secure the services of the doctor for another term at an early day.

H. S. BROOKS.

ROCKPORT, Mo., Feb. 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. M. A. Freeman, whose equal is not in the United States, or in Europe either, for that matter, has been here and delivered three lectures in the Opera House—first, "Orthodox Problems;" second, "Men and Their Gods;" third, "His Satanic Majesty." She awakened an interest in Freethought and universal mental liberty that will spread and expand and go on and on.

The logical reasoner and solid, sedate iconoclast, Remsburg, has lectured here; and the poet-laureate and indefatigable lecturer and worker, Mr. Putnam, has lectured here, but the majority decision is that the noble little lady, Mrs. Mattie A. Freeman, is the best Freethought speaker that has lectured in Rockport. We hope Brothers Remsburg and Putnam will share the laurels with Mrs. Freeman, for we think she justly deserves all the praise she gets, and more.

There is another subject I wish to agitate, and I wish all Liberals to take an interest in it, and that is a lecture bureau. Let every Liberal pay into the fund $1 per annum, and hav a treasurer, said treasurer to giv bond and security for the safe-keeping of the funds. With the establishment of such a bureau we would hav funds enough to send our Freethought lecturers to every hamlet in the land.

Agitate, friend Liberals, agitate. Let us start the ball rolling. There is not a true Liberal in the United States who cannot raise one dollar a year for such a grand work.

Yours, as ever, for the right, G. G. BECK.

FORESTPORT, N. Y., Feb. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hereby acknowledge the receipt of the books ordered by me. To say I am satisfied with them would only giv you a very inadequate idea of my state of mind at the present moment, in which I hav just finished cutting open the leaves in "Bible Myths." Before long you will receive another order.

Although a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for about a year, I hav not seen among "Letters from Friends" a communication from the backwoods from Black river country. I hav been a resident of Forestport for about two years, and am therefore pretty well enabled to giv an opinion as to the state of mental activity and Freethought in said place. The fact that the people of Forestport—about four hundred—and vicinity support and keep in a prosperous state four churches, two hotels, two saloons, and three restaurants, will suggest to every intelligent human being the supposition that the good people, taken as a whole, are by gracious providence destined to serve as a link in the chain of arguments produced in favor of evolution. We are the only two outspoken Freethinkers here, Mr. Jeremiah O'Brien and your servant, and both of us are looked upon as being God-forsaken cranks. Of skeptics there are quite a number, but these all lack the necessary moral courage to avow their opinions, and are consequently no better, but even worse, than orthodox Christians, who at least are honest. If I cannot promis to secure you any new subscribers, I can at least comfort you by pledging my continued subscription. Even if I cannot always agree with sentiments published in your paper, I am not so "Cretorial" as to wish them smeared over with printer's ink, nor so "Shoemakerial" as to stop my paper. I will close for this time. GUSTAVE NELSON.

HANNIBAL, Mo., Feb. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I see that some of your correspondents are still exercised over Colonel Kelso's question: "Is there any such thing as Liberalism?" Answering for myself, I should say certainly there is; and I wonder that such a question should be asked. According to my view, there are with reference to this but two classes, Liberals and sectarians; and the two are as separate and distinct from each other as day and night. The sectarian adheres to a creed which he believes to be given by divine inspiration, and which hence must be accepted by all mankind. He cannot consistently admit freedom of opinion. He logically denies man's right to investigate. He simply says, "Accept the divine truth revealed in our holy book, or be eternally lost." The Liberal, or Infidel, rejects all so-called divine revelations. He regards human reason as the highest tribunal known to man, and hence holds that every rational being has an inalienable right to investigate and decide for himself all questions pertaining to his present or future welfare. But it must not be inferred that he is a milk-and-water man ready to acquiesce in everybody's views. A Liberal has as good a right to his opinions as any other person, and it is not only his right, but his duty, to advocate that which he believes to be good and true, and oppose that which he believes to be false and pernicious. The term "Liberal," as I understand it, has reference only to the difference between those who assert the authority of so-called revelations and those who advocate the right of Freethought. It has no reference to the moral character of either. As a rule, I hav found outspoken Liberals honorable and benevolent, but there are genuin Liberals who are the personification of dishonesty and villainy.

I believe I am the only subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER in this place. We hav a good many Liberals here, both Agnostic and Spiritual, but only a few of them subscribe for any Liberal paper. The Independent Pulpit, Ironclad Age, Investigator, and Religio-Philosophical Journal all hav subscribers here. Our Brotherhood of Agnostic Moralists is growing. We now hav members in nearly every state; and among them a number of prominent Liberal writers and speakers. A. R. AYRES.

VINELAND, N. J., March 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to respond openly to the account of a Liberal organization named the Rice County Scientific, Moral, and Reformatory Association, started at Morristown, Minn. The accounnt is on THE TRUTH SEEKER letter pages of Feb. 11, 1888. Approval on those pages of the effort may call more attention to the nature and plan of work, which appears more practical in these unsettled times than previous attempts at adult improvement; that is, if, as looks probable, the work bases the reformatory sufficiently on physical reform, which it must to be scientific, moral, and durable; and if, to promote temperance, it keeps clear of the church union and Prohibition cause. These points assured, and the integral culture advancing, Minnesota will be the monitor state pointing to the long-delayed practical education that endows body and character with energy and principle to uphold personal justice and national honor. What Rice county can do, other counties in any state, having radical, intelligent, and enterprising citizens, may do; and a general movement of the kind might ere many years perceptibly rectify the features of society, and show favorably on commercial and political affairs. The influence would act on labor and capital as arbitrating leaven, for manufactures must partake of the spirit that actuates any considerable number of inhabitants. Auxiliary Secular Unions might adopt this method of scientific culture in counties, augment their usefulness tenfold in cherishing noble individualities to stanchly face the frauds of the age and act only for the pure in public affairs; possibly might induce many to take worthy positions who now barter their liberty for exemption from ostracism. What rasping bondage! This method will quietly favor truly improving unions; the good in Socialism, autonomy, and majorityism will peacefully favor the method; and tyranny will learn not to assail it. Will liberty-lovers bethink them of the petty, sickly, and stupid masses whose acceptance of frauds reduced them to poverty of purse and principle, subjected them to the respectable scourge, the fashion fiend, the Grundy myth, of the epoch, empowered with the popular verdict and decision? Will they consider the fatal effects on the sanitary, state, and business relations in a nation of a general acceptance of this all-prevailing and everyway betraying and enslaving influence? Affirmativ answer requires clear thinking and fearless examining of results. Are not the summed-up abnormalities, countless oppressions, vices, vanities, cowardice, restraint, desperation, etc., that these constant tyrannies hav wrought on both sexes sufficient to deplete the vast majorities and concentrate the wealth and power? Then, if the thousand little falsenesses in habits and customs aggregate the mighty wants and wrongs, let us commence displacing the defiling and spurious by substituting the sanitary, scientific, and truly ethical. Only this substitution can relieve the submissiv multitudes and cultivate to comfortable soundness their abused functions. The plan here contemplated, this lyceum method of central officers with clubs and agents in a given circuit, appears practical for the present. If counties or towns commence the reformation, states may follow, and insure large benefits and ample success.

I will send packages of literature to distribute, as called for by the pioneer society, as doubtless many others will, wishing it much usefulness and wide imitation.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Swail says he is not an Anarchist, and is worth $8,000, and will take my bet. Mr. Swail's boodle sizes my pile; I cannot call him. If he is not an Anarchist, I will take his word for it. But it seems to me he is enthusiastic over the fate of those misguided men who were hanged at Chicago. He seems to be honest, and is certainly humorous. His reference to the Christian murders is correct. But those men who were suspended between the firmament above and plane below in my opinion deserved it all, and it is the only way to deal effectually with such creatures. They merited all they got, and more of the same ilk will hav to get a dose of the same. I do not fear Anarchism, or any other ism, and will doff my beaver to the hanging of all such cut-throats. We hav no use for such elements.

Anarchy: synonym, confusion. It is a creed without conscience, promulgated by thieves, robbers, and advocates of equal sharing of honest labor's fruits with non-working thieves, murderers. They are a bad element generally, without any honor or other feeling than for themselvs. Notwithstanding they affect to feel for their copartners, their regard for each other is like that of a gang of wolves; on one becoming wounded, the others tear and rend him. Should one of their members become possessed of more of this world's goods than his neighbor, he must disgorge or lose his blood. No law is recognized except force—the big dog chew the little one. Anarchy is somethiug for nothing, as advocated by these disturbers of all law and order. They know no moral principles; are totally without the finer instincts of humanity. They are strangers to conscience, hav no scruples, and acknowledge no equity. Blood, rapine, plunder, is their motto. They are too cowardly to face their subject, but take a secret course to ply their devilishness.

Anarchy—the word interprets itself, and those who advocate it are disturbers of good government. In a review in the Freethinkers' Magazine for November, 1887, by John W. Truesdell, is shown its true inwardness. The Anarchists hav no excuse except a desire to plunder society and undermine our institutions. They hav no moral convictions.

They could not liv in their own country, and thought to disrupt this land with their unreasonable demands. An Anarchist will not fight for the maintenance of his own government, or the land that has adopted him. He is a secret assassin. He reminds one of the story of the farmer and the frozen snake. After being warmed by the farmer's fireside, the snake attempts to bite him. Thus with the viper Anarchist; he would plunge the dagger into the bosom that gave him birth. You cannot trust him; he is treacherous, and would be a murderer. It is all bosh, that those Chicago men had not a fair trial. Anarchists and their admirers will not be satisfied with any verdict except acquittal, no matter what the offense may be. Their trial was impartial, and their punishment just. Such elements must be subject to the influence of a heavy hand of suppression. An honorable foe is entitled to respect for his attitude, but the secret missil-thrower, with vengeance and forethought in the act, is an enemy who is lost to all sense of humanity, and should be classed with the vilest criminals. Good government is maintained by its loyal subjects; disruption is brought about by factions. As to nationalities who immigrate to this country, the Irish are the most loyal. If there is a stratum of Anarchy in their composition, it is incipient. As a rule, they are a large-hearted people, and wish for peace; and at home they ask to inaugurate their own system of government, and that is but just. The more turbulent elements of other nations emigrate to this continent, where they hav more scope for their devilish agitation, or, more plainly speaking, their more congenial practice, murder and arson, accompanied by theft, to appropriate their peaceable neighbors' belongings to their own rascally and unconscionable use. Sooner or later, unless it is throttled, it will assume gigantic proportions, and cause a worse condition of things than the late attempted secession of a portion of the United States. Look to it, ye who are in authority—suppress this hydra-headed parasite, or its insidious coils will cause infinit trouble.

Those people who land in this country who are disaffected expect to jump into a competency on their arrival. They are disappointed in not realizing their dream of wealth, and, being of a non-laboring disposition, commence to show their venom by inciting to equal rights without a particle of merit to their demands. They are chronic disturbers, and nothing but free plunder will satisfy them. To be sure, the wage-worker's lot is arduous, but honest labor is always rewarded in one's mind, if not in plethoric competency. This country is broad, and open to all, with a reasonable assurance of moderate success. There are a plenty of broad acres that can be had by occupancy. With health and a reasonable amount of perseverance, a home for everyone can be carved out. I see no reason for any trouble in this liberal country. Every man can be a prince of a household, with something to call his own, instead of leading a life of wild, disloyal disaffection. My fellow-workingmen, be wise, and show yourselvs men. Factions will never aid you. I hav been a laboring man myself; worked many a day for inferior pay, although a skilled mechanic. I feel for all honest workers. They hav my true sympathy. I passed through the late war crucible and came out scorched. Am a cripple to-day; hav not walked for years, and cannot hope for any more of this life's pleasures. Will soon be summoned to the great roll-call.

I do not fear the future estate. If we hav a conscious future, so much the better. It will not be attended with the orthodox solution for weal or woe, but a grand eternity. If no immortality, then all is well. The hope or fear of the future should not influence our duty to each other or to ourselvs. We should be men and women, whether an orthodox hell or the Liberal future is before us. It is, in my mind, very fallacious to advocate an endless punishment for our unknown appearance here and short probation. We are not to blame for our existence, and not responsible.

O. S. BARRETT.

FOSSIL, ORE., March 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Possibly there are some so-called Liberals who will think that my letters are somewhat out of place in the columns of an Antichristian paper. I can only say to all such—do me the justice to read my letters in the same spirit in which I do yours, always keeping in mind the universal brotherhood of man.

Liberals, who profess to be so much better than their Christian brethren, should practice what they preach. Modern epicureanism should show a decided improvement on that of ancient Greece. History tells us that Epicurus was a man of pure morals. "He recommended virtue for the sake of its happy results, but his doctrins were so perverted by his followers that the word 'epicurean' has become a synonym for loose and luxurious living."

When I was an unbeliever I was not at all backward in declaring my honest convictions, and now I should be a double-dyed coward were I to hold my peace. If at any time you should find that I am wrong in any of my conclusions, explain it to me in a kind and friendly manner, and I will thank you for it. The man who would not thank the physician for restoring to him his eyesight would certainly be an ungrateful being, even though the instruments by which this was accomplished were sharp and cruel.

I shall never cease to thank that grand and noble old man who by dint of kind and patient reasoning led me to see wherein I had been mistaken. The struggle was long and hard, but my better nature conquered. Having once arrived at the conclusion that I had been in the wrong, it did not take me long to acknowledge it. The feelings that prompted me then are the same which actuate me now to expose myself, through the columns of this paper, to the ridicule of those who desire to look only on one side of the question.

My main object in writing this letter is to giv a few of the reasons why I cannot accept the theory of the evolutionists. I do not want to be misunderstood in this matter, for I believe in a process of evolution, which, although in some respects apparently similar, yet, under the microscopic eye of truth, is by no means identical with the theories propounded by Darwin, Spencer, Huxley, Tyndall Vogt, and others. Before I proceed, however, I would like to ask those who believe in an unintelligent and unthinking nature one question. It is this: Why should an unintelligent nature decree that, whereas the law is everywhere else universal, cold contracts and heat expands, in water this law should be reversed and cold be made to expand? We with our limited human intelligence can see the wisdom and importance of this, but how was it possible for an unthinking nature to do so? This is only one of the many questions we hav a right to ask, but time and space forbid.

As it would be impossible for me to giv in one short letter all the objections I hav to the evolutionary theory as a whole, I shall for the present confine myself to that which lies nearest us, the Darwinian department, leaving the rest for some time in the future.

I find that those who accept this theory must admit that, according to this hypothesis, there was a time when the laws of inheritance as they now exist, by which like produces like, were not in existence; else how could the simple giv birth to the differentiated? How could that which has no spinal column giv birth to the vertebrata? They must also admit that the laws of variation, upon which this theory depends, and of which Darwin himself confesses to be profoundly ignorant, hav ceased to be, for never since man began to observe the works of nature hav any of these laws been found in actual operation. Whereas, none are more emphatic than unbelievers in declaring that the laws of nature are unchangeable.

Further, they must admit that this theory is unsupported by evidence. It is unscientific. When men attempt to revolutionize the world with such theories as this, they ought to be able to furnish evidence that will support them, or at least they ought to be able to prove that science furnishes no facts in opposition to them. The followers of Darwin cannot even do the latter, for science is against them. Unless they would hav us to understand that the laws of nature are not unchangeable, and that during, as Mr. Powell says, "that enormous period of which we are, by the conditions, precluded from knowing anything whatever," certain laws of variation, of which they are profoundly ignorant, were in operation that hav since ceased to exist—unless this is the case, science is against them.

Even Huxley, in his address before the Geological Society, in 1862, says: "Obviously, if the earliest fossiliferous rocks now known are coeval with the commencement of life, and if their contents giv us any just conception of the earliest fauna and flora, the insignificant amount of modification which can be demonstrated to hav taken place in any one group of plants and animals is quite incompatible with the hypothesis that all living forms are the results of a process of necessary progressiv development, entirely comprised within the time represented by the fossiliferous rocks."

I should say it was incompatible when I remember that science teaches us that, instead of the different species being introduced by small and weak beginnings, and with dimly defined and confused distinctions of species, the giants came first and the distinctions were as clear and well defined then as now, and we know they are so well defined now, in the animal kingdom at least, that they are known even to the animals themselvs.

Even if such a thing as a change in the laws of nature could be demonstrated to hav taken place in the remote ages of the past, here would be another question for Atheists to meet. A miracle is a miracle, no matter if it be propounded by Darwin instead of Moses. As to the supposition in which evolutionists take refuge, that such a miracle might hav happened in the unlimited period of time preceding the formation of the earliest fossiliferous rocks, while we might well refuse to discuss "might be's" in the study of science, we must deny them even that privilege, for geologists hav calculated that this earth has not been in a fit state for plants and animals long enough for this hypothetical system of evolution to accomplish its work of development.

It is not necessary for me to go on enumerating the facts which prove the contrary to this hypothesis. Suffice it to say that this theory is unsupported by evidence. On the other hand, as far as my knowledge extends, I find that no fact in nature, rightly seen, is contradictory to any part of Genesis, rightly interpreted.

This reminds me of a statement C. B. Reynolds made in his letter from Colorado, published February 18th. He said: "Thus geology exposes the absurdities of Genesis. Genesis locates fish, birds, and whales on the fifth day, and declares reptils (creeping things) were not created till the sixth." It may be that my Bible is different from anyone else's, but this is what I find: "And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life," on the fifth day. Now, unless Mr. Reynolds can prove that reptils do not belong to the class called "moving creatures," I shall consider it my duty to respectfully inform him he is mistaken. Respectfully, MRS. H. A. RITCHEY.

NEW YORK, N. Y., March 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The letter of Converse Close in your issue of February 11th is certainly a very strange production to emanate from the brain of a professed Liberal. At the age of threescore and ten, spent in New England, and always a toiler for my daily bread, I do not know but I may possibly be an Anarchist in the sense I understand it. I think my respected grandfather was one, for he, with others of like stamp, defied the laws of his country, when it included such Anarchists as George Washington, on whose head the government of England set a price. I hav reason to believe my father was one, for, though a lawyer and a magistrate, he defied the Fugitiv Slave bill, which denied him the right to harbor a slave on the road to freedom.

I am inclined to believe the late Wendell Phillips was an Anarchist. I recollect hearing him assert that every Molly Maguire hanged died a martyr for the freedom of labor. He also, long before the seceding of the Southern states, advocated the seceding of the Northern states. The founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER went to prison a violator of the laws, as construed by the powers that be, and died a martyr to disease contracted during confinement. I might go on enumerating, but this is sufficient for my purpose—except to claim that the government itself is Anarchistical when it violates the sanctity of the mails and privacy of homes at the bidding of believers in the supernatural. I do not share Mr. Close's confidence in the integrity of the judges. The judge who presided at the trial of the Chicago victims complimented the jury on rendering their verdict of death against the prisoners "as having done their work well." Certainly it is out of place for one supposed to hold the balance to make a jury compliments. Again, he says: "I never hav expressed, and do not now intend to express, an opinion as to the justice or injustice of the conviction and punishment of the seven Chicago Anarchists. But I will say that the judge who presided at the court, and the jury who pronounced them guilty, were in a position to know more and better in regard to the guilt or innocence of those men than any or all of those who think and talk merely as impulse or preconceived opinions dictate." I think Mr. Close's opinion is expressed in language unmistakable. I feel sure the mayor of Chicago must hav known something —when he testified he was at the Haymarket meeting and ordered the police to retire—"that there would be no trouble." I am not writing from impulse—yet I hav a high estimation of that quality.

From Mr. Close's reasoning the verdict of that great jury, the people, is wrong when after the lapse of one hundred years they denounce the verdict of the judge and jury that hanged men and women as witches.

Again: "And then, when their appeal for a new trial went to the supreme court of the state of Illinois, shall we assume that the judges composing that court were actuated or governed by any motiv not in accordance with justice under the laws, and with a preference for mercy?" I know nothing personally of the supreme judges of Illinois, but the late Jim Fisk could, and did, buy the judges of New York; and Daniel Webster in his lifetime claimed that all men could be bought. Their "preference for mercy" is not apparent in the sequel.

"And finally, when the great high court of last resort in our nation took the matter of a new trial under advisement and decided against it, it seems the hight of egotistical presumption for irresponsible individuals to say that it is all wrong." Now, as to "the great high court," what was law at that court in Roger B. Janney's day is not law there at the present time. In view of the fact that one of the judges of the present court was placed there by the money of a prominent capitalist, I cannot share Mr. Close's confidence in that tribunal. "Egotistical, irresponsible, presumptuous individuals," as Mr. Close seems to understand them, constitute a large class at the present time, who are beginning to think for themselvs—hav they that right?

"We hav boasted, and rightly too, that America was and is an asylum for the oppressed of all lands. But in view of recent events, it may be necessary to modify that expression, when men who flee from oppression in the Old World come here and while yet aliens proclaim their intention to destroy our Constitution and laws, and to do it by revolution that shall drench our land in blood." Well, they place themselvs in the same category with Thomas Paine, the apostle of Freethought, who claimed the world as his country, as his countrymen all mankind. Paine was undeniably the real founder of the American government. Is it the ideal government he intended? I think not. Will the ballot change it? We hav worked the ballot one hundred years and not advanced socially.

It does not come with a good grace for anyone to cant about foreigners in a country undiscovered four centuries ago and which has had government but one century, and really at this day has not an identified nationality, excepting Vermont and North Carolina. In the commencement of Anarchism in America foreigners were a convenient necessity, as, for instance, Lafayette, and in the last war for perpetuity they were a still greater necessity, to place in front as substitutes for rich men's sons.

One word for THE TRUTH SEEKER and I am done. I simply wished to cover the objections in Mr. Close's letter. The press of this country has become very debased at the present time, and unreliable. THE TRUTH SEEKER has maintained its supremacy as a lofty, pure, and high minded journal, the medium for the oppressed. The objections of a few to its caricatures I think are not well founded. It is illustrating the ridiculousness of the sublime. Should THE TRUTH SEEKER become a journal of one idea, though that idea should be the breaking up of religious intoleraunce, its tendency would be toward bigotry, and this is to be avoided in a family paper.

Mr. Close speaks of the Nine Demands of Liberalism, which he favors, as do we. The Infidel does not wish to pay all the taxes. He does not believe in paying for prayers, knowing nothing comes of it. He does not believe in charity, but demands justice. He does not wish the Bible in the public schools; neither does the Catholic. Here is where extremes can meet. He demands that Thanksgivings and fasts shall be done away with. I agree to that. He demands no special privileges for anyone. This is democratic.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

My Loom.

I spun my woof of dewy sprays
When prairies were in bloom,
And tried to weave a fairy web
Upon my little loom;
Wild roses in their sheen of leaves
To twine the misty threads,
And, drifting from the summer skies,
Such blue and tender shreds.

The evening rain on prairie grass
Brought chains of crystal gems,
And morning glories in and out
Along their twisted stems,
And birds, and bees, and reaching vines
Between and to and fro,
With every sweet thing near or far
Where summer blossoms blow.

My skeins inwrought with lilies pale
That I had laid away
Were rent by care and toil and pain—
My roses fell to clay;
My pattern floated from my hand
While yet it was so new.
I could not sing the song of rain
Nor stay my scraps of blue.

Along the hills my pattern lies,
Kept green by fleecy snow,
And care is kinder now to me,
And blossoms soon shall blow.
Through crimson bars and gates of gold
The days are growing long,
And some small shred I yet may find
Within my loom of song.

His Mother's Boy.

A mother once owned just a commonplace boy,
A shock-headed boy,
A freckle faced boy,
But thought he was handsome, and said so with joy;
For mothers are funny, you know,
Quite so—
About their sons' beauty, you know.

His eyes were quite small, and he blinked in the sun;
But she said it was done
As a mere piece of fun
And gave an expression of wit to her son;
For mothers are funny, you know,
Quite so—
About their sons' beauty, you know.

His nose, one could see, was not Grecian, but pug,
And turned up quite snug,
Like the nose of a jug;
But she said 'twas "piquant," and gave him a hug;
For mothers are funny, you know,
Quite so—
About their sons' beauty, you know.

The carroty lovelocks that covered his head
She never called red,
But auburn instead;
"The color the old masters painted," she said;
For mothers are funny, you know,
Quite so—
About their sons' beauty, you know.

Now, boys, when your mothers talk so, let it pass;
Don't look in the glass
Like a vain, silly lass,
But go tend the baby, pick chips, weed the grass;
Be as good as you're pretty, you know,
Quite so—
As good as you're pretty, you know.

An Interesting Letter.

Editor Children's Corner: I would like to say a few words to the little readers of the Corner.

One would hardly think that an old man would be interested in the letters each week in the Corner from the various correspondents, but I read every one of them.

At the longest, my time is short, and at no distant day some of the little writers must take my place. I regard them as a bow of promis, and it does my old heart good to see so much intelligence manifested in those letters from boys and girls so young. They are really bright and spicy, and many of them contain ideas which would be a credit to much older people.

But it must be considered that these bright little pets are mostly children of Freethinkers, and their minds hav been properly directed. And, what is more, they hav not been compelled to spend their time in committing to memory passages from an old obsolete book, nor in answering dull and useless questions asked by the Sunday-school teacher which nobody knows anything about, and which would be of no benefit if one did know.

On the contrary, they hav spent their time in reading good and useful books, and their minds hav not been dwarfed by dogmas and creeds, but left as free as the birds of the air to explore every hight and to descend to every depth in search of truth, and the result is that a brighter lot of little boys and girls are nowhere to be found. I am proud of them, and would not be afraid to pit them against an equal number of boys and girls of the same age who hav been educated in the Sunday-school.

But, my little friends, it is not enough for you to be smart; I want you to be good, and show to the world by your every-day conduct that it is not necessary to build costly churches, and pay indolent priests and ministers vast sums of money every year, to hav the people good.

Every boy and girl who writes such bright letters for the Corner knows that he or she ought to do right. It would grieve me to think there were any among them who would knowingly do wrong. I want to think of them only as bright and pure, like drops of dew which fall from heaven.

"There is a road to goodness, and the aggregate of happiness to the race will mainly depend upon the number who strive to walk therein."

Every morning when you wake from sleep, before you get out of your warm beds, form a resolution that during the day you will do nothing amiss; that you will be kind to all, and obey your parents, and show a proper respect for those older than yourselvs, and treat with tenderness those who are younger and look to you for help and protection. Each night after you lie down, before you go to sleep, think of what you hav done through the day, and if you find that you hav done what you ought not to hav done, or hav neglected to do something which you ought to hav done, promis yourself to do better on the morrow. This will be far better than saying silly prayers, which can effect nothing, and do nobody any good.

Neither let superstitious people impose upon you by telling you that it is wicked to be cheerful, and vivacious, and merry, and that the old black man, or some evil spirit will get you if you indulge in innocent games and pastimes. For the young to engage in innocent sports is but the prompting of nature, and is not wicked or bad. Reasonable people will not expect the young to look as solemn as the grave, and act as if they thought it a duty always to be in mourning.

I used to teach boys and girls to read and write and cipher, and a merry time we had of it. At proper times I would giv them a loose rein, and frequently joined in their sports, but rarely spoke a harsh word to them or punished them. Many a time I hav carried a little boy or girl home from school on my shoulder.

Though many years hav passed by, yet my mind reverts to the happy hours I hav spent with the children by joining in their sports and conversation, and by the cheerful songs we used to sing. It seems that I can almost hear their merry voices while I am writing. It was inspiring in the morning when all voices joined in singing:

Behold, our happy band appears—
Away, away to school!
The shouts of joy now fill our ears—
Away, away to school!

And another, quite a favorit, had the following:

Oh, how swiftly! how swiftly!
The bird flies away
To her nest in the tall forest tree.
Oh, how sweetly! how sweetly!
She sings all the day,
And is happy as happy can be.

Oh, these were golden hours! and they left a lasting impression upon my mind.

Still o'er these scenes my mem'ry wakes,
And fondly broods with miser care.
Time but the impression deeper makes,
As streams their channels wear.

Sometimes, while reading the letters in the Corner, my old head turns to a camera, and before I know it I am taking fancy pictures of my little far-away friends. One has golden locks and blue eyes; another is dumpy and rosy; and so, as I read each letter, there is a picture formed in the mind of the one who wrote it.

Sometimes my fancy takes wings, and I imagin myself on some beautiful lawn, surrounded by all the children of the Corner, having a gala day, happy and joyous.

I wish I could induce every little truth seeker to start in the morning of life with a full determination to make the world better by his or her example and influence. And I would hav them understand that goodness is the real foundation of true greatness.

Now, I hav written my little friends quite a long letter—so long that I am afraid that Miss Wixon will think the letter is not worth the space—and I would like to hav each one write to me. Of course I could not find time to answer all of them, but I should be delighted to receive their letters.

Hoping that I may hear from many of my little friends, and that I may be able in the future to giv them many useful hints, I send greeting, my sincere regards, to all the little truth seekers. John Peck.

Correspondence.

Axtell, Tex., March 3, 1888.

Miss Wixon: I am a little girl five years old, and hav been going to school some this and last year; can read some, but can't write. My papa takes The Truth Seeker. I like the pictures, and the letters in the Children's Corner. I am studying spelling, reading, and arithmetic. I hav a little baby brother. You must put this in the Children's Corner, it being my first letter. Your little friend,

Laura Walters.

(Written by her papa.)

Murray, Ida., March 1, 1888.

Dear Madam: Our teacher wants us to write to somebody, so I thought I would write to you. I would like to correspond with some of the children of the Corner about my own age, which is eleven. I go to school every day, and I am in the Fourth Reader. I hav two brothers; one is nineteen years old, and the other is eight. And I hav two sisters, one sixteen years old, and the other will be one year old the 4th of March. The snow is nearly all gone, and we hav had a few sunny days, but to-day has been very windy. There were two dogs poisoned here, and the boys buried them on the hill, and some of the girls went up and sang three songs, but I did not go. For fear I should take up too much space, I will close for this time.

Yours respectfully, Theresa Ervin.

An Hour With the Glass-Blowers.

It was at Madam Rieth's glass-blowing rooms; and the madam herself, a handsome, dark-eyed lady, is an artiste in her line of work. With her dainty fingers she pulled, twisted, and curled strings of glass into many fanciful shapes and images. And Professor Rieth, too, like a Bohemian magician, seemed to change whatever he touched into glass animals, ships, flowers, etc. And so also did the several assistants deftly turn and blow bits of glass into all sorts of pretty and attractiv articles, to the amazement of the lookers-on. I am not sure that the gentlemanly agent of the concern, J. S. Clark, could not, with a twist of his hand, and a Hocus-pocus, presto, change! make a little piece of glass turn into a gazelle, a goblet of wine, or a Cinderella slipper, at a moment's notice.

The children were perfectly delighted with the beautiful doll, all dressed in blue glass, made in the latest style of dressmaking. Her shawl was a marvel of beauty in spun glass, with glass fringe that looked like finest silk. But the greatest attraction was the "Fairy Queen," the largest glass steam-engin in the world, under full headway, puffing and blowing, glittering and gleaming, like some jeweled thing of life.

Now, let us talk a little about glass and glass-making. Glass is in all our homes and in all civilized places. Take a glass salt-cellar or other article in common use—what is it? Why, only a little extra fine sand, some lime, some water, a pinch of soda or some other alkali, all melted together, and fashioned into shape.

We seldom pause to think how much we are indebted to the discovery of glass, or into what general use it has come. It is one of the greatest servants of mankind.

Pliny tells a story about the discovery of glass in this way: Some sailors of Phœnicia were cruising up a river in Palestine one time, and landing, they sought a spot on which to place their dinner-pots, preparatory to cooking dinner. When they had found a suitable place they gathered some white stones, as they supposed, upon which they placed their kettles and made a fire. The white stones proved to be nitrum, or soda, and, fusing with the sand, it produced a running stream, very clear and beautiful. And this was glass. But this tale is not accepted as genuin.

Glass has been in use a long time, and the art of making it was known to the ancients, especially the Egyptians, who were apparently familiar with the art as early as three thousand years before Christ. Pictured upon the ancient tombs at Thebes are men with blow-pipes, very similar to those now used at Madam Rieth's establishment, blowing glass over the representation of a fire. A glass bead was found at Thebes, bearing the name in hieroglyphics of the queen of Thothmes III., and she lived about fifteen hundred years before Christ. The most elegant work was done in glassware painting, gilding, and cutting by the ancients, and we hav discovered among the ruins of Nineveh many lovely designs. The Greeks knew of its manufacture, for many fine specimens of their workmanship hav been found in their old tombs, some of which, taken from the island of Cyprus, may be seen in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York. Glass cups and vases of glass were put in the tombs to hold the tears of surviving friends when they visited the resting-places of their dead. It is not known that glass was generally used for windows until the close of the third century, but St. Jerome says it was not thus used until the end of the fourth century. And at first glass was only used for church windows, and even so late as the sixteenth century in England it was only the very wealthy who could afford to hav glass windows in their houses. It is said, however, that window-glass was found amid the ruins of Pompeii, but the houses there generally had a kind of talc for windows.

It is less than three hundred years since mirrors were made, before that polished metals being the only "looking-glasses" known.

The art of glass-making has been brought to great perfection, as may be seen in the almost numberless articles made with it and now in use. The sciences are greatly indebted to it, and could make little headway without it, more especially in astronomy and chemistry. The lenses in the telescopes bring other worlds to nearer view, which could not be were it not for glass. Indeed, we can scarcely turn any way that we do not see the necessity and great use for glass.

The utensils for making glass are very simple—a blow-pipe, shears, pucellas, a pair of spring tongs, and a battledore, together with compasses, calipers, and a yard-stick.

The finest and purest sand in the world used in the manufacture of glass is found in Massachusetts among the Berkshire hills. It is exported to Europe and is called there "Berkshire white sand." The grains are white and clear like quartz crystal.

There are other ingredients besides those named above added in making the different kinds of glass, but they are all of a simple nature. Lead is used in making flint glass, and black bottles are made from rock salt and sand from the river-bed, with carbonate of lime from the soap works at Newcastle, England.

In ornamental glass, the Bohemians and Venetians take the lead, but America may compete with the older nations in the manufacture of the useful articles of glassware. The lenses for the great Lick observatory in California, the best lenses and most powerful in the world, were made in Cambridge, Mass.

Last summer the writer went through the great glass manufactory in the quaint old town of Sandwich, Mass., and witnessed the process of making glass in all its various stages. It was interesting to see a workman pick up, with a long tube, a lump of melted glass, looking for all the world like a little batch of dough, draw it out of the furnace, pull it, pinch it, work it into shape, and, in less than five minutes, produce a beautiful glass tumbler. The furnaces are heated with oil, and must be very hot to melt the ingredients. In fact, the heat is so great in the large manufactories that men cannot stand it to work there long at a time. In the fancy glass-blowing, as so skilfully done by Madam Rieth's troupe, ordinary burning gas is used, and sand, sulphur, and water are the principal articles used, with some other substances for coloring. S. H. W.

Questions.—Of what is ordinary glass composed? Relate the story that Pliny tells of the discovery of glass. Is it supposed to be correct? What can you say of the use of glass in olden times? How long before Christ was it in use? What of the glass bead found in Thebes? Where is Thebes? Where hav many beautiful designs in glassware been found? What may be found in the Metropolitan Museum in New York? What did the ancients place glass cups and vases in tombs for? When was glass first used for windows? Was it used in Pompeii? Tell what you know of Pompeii and Herculaneum. When were mirrors first made? What answered for mirrors previously? What special sciences are greatly indebted to glass in the pursuance of science? Where were the lenses for the great Lick Observatory made? Name the tools used in making glass. Where is the best sand found for manufacturing glass? What materials are used in flint glass? in black bottles? What nations take the lead in ornamental glass-making? in the useful glass articles? Describe the making of a tumbler. With what are the furnaces heated in glass-making? Must the heat be very great?

Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Poetry.

Song of the Southern Pines.

I stood alone 'neath mountain pines,
Where the mountain air was blowing,
And the mountain pink was a red, red flame,
While the laurel leaves were glowing;

The lone pines singing a choral hymn
Of a lost and silent ocean,
And keeping time in the morning wind
With an almost eager motion;

While the canebrakes waved in the aisles below
And the cactus bells were gleaming.
Only the breeze from the mountain caves
Might awake me from my dreaming.

The pine-tree's harp that swaying sang
Breathed low of the lapsing ages
That intervened while the mountains rose
And wrote their stony pages.

"Out of the heart of an old, old sea
Upborne on the blue waves ringing,
These rocky walls and the leafy glens
Our morning song were bringing.

"The chanting song repeating to-day
Re-echoes the older dirges—
Creation's voice of the wailing dawn
That dwelt in the mountain surges."

Upon the steeps of the mountain wall
White lily-cups were waving.
"Though sweet," I mused, "ye but re-bloom
As of yore 'neath billows laving."

A cluster of pale anemones
Where the woodbines were in blossom,
But reproduced the garden's glow
Once hid in the ocean's bosom.

The ivy twining the cedar hill
Near the mountain's torrent foaming,
Recalled the morn when ocean halls
Were clad in the primal gloaming.

O mighty hills of the Cumberland!
Enthroned on granit bases,
With a crown of pines, and sands of gold,
And a thousand blooming graces—

Your interwoven song reveals
The line* on the lofty mountain,
Divorcing the crest and golden sands
From the granit's lower fountain.

Frenchtown, Neb. MARY BAIRD FINCH.

*The base of the Cumberland mountain is of limestone, extending half-way up the sides, where it joins the sandstone forming the upper half, the two strata making a line as level as though it were two books, one lying on the other. The opinion of geologists is that it has been done by gradual upheaval from some inland sea.

That Badger Boy At Sunday-School.

THE LESSON OF ABRAHAM, WITH SIDE-SHOWS.

The teacher read of the tower of Babel, and of Abraham's bloody intention to sacrifice Isaac, when the Badger boy opened out as usual, his inquiring mind as alert as ever.

"Don't you s'pose, mum, that Ike was offle scart when the old man tied his hands and feet and laid him on the woodpile to burn, and yanked out his cheese-knife to stick him?"

"Undoubtedly, James. But I do wish you wouldn't talk so slangy. I don't suppose you mean bad [she was throwing bait, as it were, for taffy], but it sounds bad, you know."

"Yes'm. How bully he must a felt, mum, when the angel got in and choked the old man off, eh?"

"James, please don't talk of sacred things in such a worldly, coarse way."

"No'm. S'posin' that angel had been late, mum. It would a been all up with Ike, wouldn't it, mum?"

"There is no supposing anything of the kind, James. Angels are never late."

"Don't never get left, do they, mum?"

"No, James, never."

"Golly! wish I was an an—no, I don't, mum. I'd rather be a boy. It's lots more fun, I guess."

"James!"

"Yes'm. Old Abe was a tuff, wasn't he, mum, to get all ready to do up his son by stickin' and burnin' him? If I thought pop wood roast me 'cos God told him to, I'd scoot, you bet!"

"James, don't talk so slangy, please."

"No'm. What made all the generals of Noah liv eight or nine hundred years, mum? Warn't there no doctors then?"

"Because they were good, child. What do you mean about the doctors, James?"

"Why, pop says they kill a dozen where they cure one, mum."

"Oh! Well, I don't know—I hope not."

"Yes'm. Ain't there any good folks now, mum? You're offle good, I know." (The taffy had taken hook, and the teacher gently blushed and sweetly smiled.)

"Oh, yes, James; there are good people now, besides—oh, there are many good people, James."

"Why don't they liv eight or nine hundred years, then? That would be bully, you know. Wouldn't Parson Cain like to liv and mash the girls and old maids eight or nine hundred years?—whew!"

"James—James! You must not talk so."

"No'm. Did them old roosters hav their own teeth and hair, mum?"

"No doubt of it, dear."

"Crackey! that was nice. Do you like false teeth and hair, mum? Ma says yours is——"

"You James Badger—you hateful boy, you—you go home this minute!"

"What for, mum? 'Cos ma says your teeth and hair is nat'ral? [The hectoring little rascal knew what his ma had said, but he 'played policy' for peace, the teacher being mollified at once.] Them's lovely teeth and hair of yourn, mum, and I guess the super thinks so, too, 'cos I seen him lookin' sweet at you, mum." [The teacher perked and smirked, and softly sighed, looking tenderly at the taffy-giver.]

"You are a curious boy, James—a sort of rough diamond."

"Yes'm. Did them duffers that was bildin' that Babel chimney think they could bild it up to heaven, mum?"

"That's what they thought, James."

"They was chumps, 'cos 'fore they'd got up ten miles it would a tumbled. Was God 'fraid they'd git into heaven, mum?"

"Well, it looks—er—that is, the—er—no, I don't think he was, James."

"Why didn't he let the chumps bild it then, and take a tumble, mum?"

"I guess he wanted to spare their lives, and so confounded their speech, and put a stop to their work."

"Then's when he made Irish, Dutch, Chinese, English, French, and all other kinds of talk, wasn't it, mum?"

"Yes, dear."

"It was funny how that old ram got sot in the bushes, wasn't it, mum?"

"No, James; it was God's doing."

"It was ruff on the ram, though—don't yer think so, mum?"

"Oh, we mustn't think anything like that, James."

"Was Beer-sheba, where old Abe and Ike went to liv, a big beer-shop place, mum?"

"Oh, no, James! You mustn't think such things, my dear. There weren't any beer shops in those days, thank the Lord!"

"What do you thank the Lord for, mum? You didn't liv there and hav to pass the shops, did you?"

"Do I look as old as that would make me, dear?"

"No'm—not half so old. [This was equivocal taffy, but she swallowed it, with a wry face.] Wonder if old Abe carried the roast ram home for dinner, mum?"

"Oh, no, dear; it was all burnt up—a burnt offering, you know."

"Did God like the smell of burnt mutton, mum?"

"Oh, I don't know, James! I suppose he—er—don't ask any more such questions."

"No'm. Old Abe's brother, you read, mum, had a conkerbine. What's that, mum? Something like a carbuncle?" (This query overwhelmed the teacher with confusion, but the too curious lad left a precious way out of a hole as deep as a well, and the teacher, leaving truth at the bottom thereof, availed herself of the grateful outlet.)

"I think so, child; but you mustn't speak of Abraham as old Abe, dear. It is unholy!"

"Huh! didn't we hav an 'Old Abe' for president, mum? I'll bet he was a bigger man than that old snoozer——"

"James! James! You mustn't."

"No'm. That old woman, Sarah, was ruff on the gal, Hagar, wasn't she, mum? Would you liked to been Hagar, mum?" (This was too, too much for the teacher.)

"You little, measly wretch of a James Badger! You get out of here, quick! You are the wickedest little wretch living! The class is dismissed now." And thus terminated the Abe and Ike séance. SI SLOKUM.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.
The Present and the Future Republic of North America.
BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

FOR

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury: statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE NINE DEMANDS

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS THE LAMP OF THE MIND.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

AN exchange says: "Sandwiches of grated turkey, the bread cut in the form of crosses, were served at a New York reception of a semi-religious character a few days ago." Why not carry out this idea at other entertainments? Sandwiches cut in the form of harps or grand pianos would be appropriate for receptions of a semi-musical character. Sandwiches in the form of bats would be a go for balls of a semi-athletic character. The ordinary ham sandwich will still be served at free lunches of a semi-theatrical character.

The gentleman replied that he did not, when the girl looked at him a moment and said: "What's de matter? Do yez drink hard?"

"ISN'T it wonderful, Jonas," said Mrs. Pudgson to her partner as they sat at their evening meal, "how acute a dog's sense of smell is? Why, Fido can track you all over the house, no matter where you are. I would giv worlds for such a nose. Suppose I wanted to find—you, for instance. Why, I should catch your trail as soon as I struck the street and could track you to any part of the city." Jonas looked thoughtful, and rising, began to put on his overcoat. "If I were you, Maria," he remarked somewhat pettishly, "I'd be content with the talents the Lord had given me." And he jammed on his hat and went down to the "office."

ELDER BERRY had come out of prayer-meeting a little before the close, and the sexton noticed that he had a worried look and a corrugated brow as he fumbled among the few umbrellas that remained in the vestibule. "What's the matter, elder?" he inquired, sympathetically; "cain't find yer parryshoot?" "No, I cain't, Jim," said the elder, somewhat testily; "who's been here takin' other folks' umberellers?" "There ain't no one come aout sence you went in," replied the sexton, "'ceptin' Deacon Graves, f'm up your way, 'n he got his'n all right, I know, fer I seen his name outer th' handle." "Sho!" said the elder, as he straightened up stiffly from his search; and the puzzled look, slipping from his face, was succeeded by one of deeper speculativ gloom. "Sho! Wall, I swow, I hadn't no idee thet the deacon was comin' ter meetin' to-day. Sho! Jim, ain't it most time you went daoun an' seen to them furnaces? The haouse ain't more'n half het up."

Gems of Thought.

Do not suffer yourself to be hurried away by the impetuosity of your passions, but, in all your pursuits, hav a regard to justice, and, in all your speculations, let truth be your aim. Whatever is agreeable and consonant to thy system, O universe, is so to me. Nothing is either premature or too late, in my apprehension of things, which is seasonable to nature and conduciv to the good of the whole.—M. A. Antoninus.

YET be it less or more, or soon or slow,
It shall be still in strictest measure even
To that same lot, however mean or high,
Toward which time leads me, and the will of heaven;
All is, if I hav grace to use it so,
As ever in my great Taskmaster's eye.—Milton.

IT is graceful in a man to think or to speak with propriety, to act with deliberation, and, in every occurrence of life, to find out the truth and to stick to it. On the other hand, to be imposed upon, to mistake, to falter, and to be deceived, is as ungraceful as to rave and to be insane. Thus, whatever is just, is graceful; whatever is unjust, is as ungraceful as it is criminal.—Cicero.

I HAV made up my mind that, if there is a God, he will be merciful to the merciful: upon that rock I stand! That he will forgiv the forgiving: upon that rock I stand! That every man shonld be true to himself, and that there is no world, no star, in which honesty is a crime; and upon that rock I stand! The honest man; the good, kind, sweet woman; the happy child, hav nothing to fear, neither in this world nor in the world to come; and upon that rock I stand!—Ingersoll. [Ingersoll is, I think, safe and immovable on his "rock," and yet he does not surpass, if he comes up to, the sublime dignity of the old heathen philosopher Cleanthes (b. 300 B.C.), who stood and prayed thus: "O God! be merciful to the wicked, for to the good thou hast done everything in making them good."—C. W. C.]

MY own opinion is, that those whose lives hav been spent in doing good, and endeavoring to make their fellow-mortals happy, will be happy hereafter.—Thomas Paine.

GOD will not punish with eternal thirst the man who has put the cup of cold water to the lips of his neighbor. God will not allow to liv in the eternal nakedness of pain the man who has clothed others.—Here is a shipwreck, and here is some brave sailor who stands aside and allows a woman whom he never saw before to take his place in the boat, and he stands there, grand and serene as the wide sea, and goes down. Do you tell me there is any God who will push the lifeboat from the shore when that sailor wishes to step in? Do you tell me that God can be unpitying to the pitiful, that he can be unforgiving to the merciful? I deny it, and from the aspersions of the pulpit I rescue the reputation of the deity. Ingersoll.

O WRETCHED old man! who in so long a time of life hast not seen that death is a thing to be despised! Which either ought altogether to be regarded with indifference, if it entirely annihilates the mind, or ought even to be desired, if it leads to a place where it is destined to be immortal. Yet no third alternativ certainly can be found.—Cicero.

FOR mystics, as such, there is a surely waning respect. Swedenborg may hav given a sublime system to the world, but for him in his supernatural aspect and for Jacob Boehme, for Fox in his dreaming days and for the hysterical convulsionists who afflict themselvs under certain ministrations of religion, there cannot be a sentiment that rises much above pity. It is true, we are not all intellect. We hav emotions, but it is the part of reason to control them; they are not to control us: otherwise a wayward child, a savage, or a Southern negro at a camp-meeting, would be a better model for imitation than the mystic himself.—Francis H. Underwood.

THOUGH love repine, and reason chafe,
There came a voice without reply—
"'Tis man's perdition to be safe,
When for the truth he ought to die."
—Emerson.

THEOLOGIANS calmly assume that the destruction or radical transformation of the old symbols is equivalent to the destruction of the things symbolized, and the alteration of the human nature which created them. For my part, I cannot even understand the doctrin that the conscience (for instance) was created by a belief in hell and will perish when hell ceases to be credible. It seems to me clear that the conscience created the old hell and will presumably create a new one, sufficient for practical purposes, whenever the ancient mythology decays.—Leslie Stephen.

ONE would suppose, from the claims which are frequently made, that there was no morality before the Christian era; that men were entirely wanting in knowledge of what is right, and the disposition to do it; in short, that all were thieves and murderers before knowing Christ.—Underwood.

The Church of Practical Religion.
BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

Notes and Clippings.

A NUMBER of influential citizens of Montreal hav petitioned the council of that city to authorize the erection of a statue of the Virgin Mary in a public square. They think that if the Virgin Mary is thus honored, the city will escape such disasters as floods and small-pox. It doesn't take much to make "an influential citizen" in Montreal.

DR. WILLIAM S. BRYANT, of Boston, completed his course at the Harvard Medical School last year. Young as he is, however, he has made a discovery in anatomy which has profoundly impressed the few scientists who hav heard of it. He has found that in the portal veins of very young infants exist valves which disappear as the child grows in years. These valves are found in the portal veins of the lower animals, but science makes no mention of their existence in children. Dr. Bryant's discovery is important in that it offers one more proof of the truth of the evolution theory.

THE new emperor and empress of Germany are skeptics. The empress, a daughter of Queen Victoria, was a constant friend of Strauss when he was most denounced for impiety. Dr. Parker, the minister for revenue only who lately visited this country, in sermonizing upon the death of Kaiser William remarked that his successor had "proved himself a true Christian." The way he made this out was by adding: "In form, ceremony, and ecclesiastic relation, one need not inquire what he was; but in docility, in resignation, and in cheerful submission to a trying situation, he had surely been an example to all men." The London Freethinker thinks this is pretty cool impudence.

Life doesn't know where Dr. Dix got his impressions about the better grade of New York society, but if we were he, we would choose our associates with more care. If he preaches from what he sees he has fallen into very bad company indeed, and if he has preached about what he hasn't seen, some one has been imposing upon him. We almost fear that Dr. Dix has read some of the sensational morning papers.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK has lost all his suits against the Philadelphia newsmen that he had arrested for selling New York Evening Telegrams containing copies of some of the pictures Comstock complained of in the Mueller and Knoedler cases. The jury acquitted the men, by recommendation of Judge Reed, without leaving their seats. The seized papers were returned to the dealers, who went out and sold them on the street at twenty-five cents a copy.

THE London correspondent of the Evening Post of this city writes to that paper: "The present session of Parliament bids fair to be known in English history as Bradlaugh's session. Not a week has passed since he induced the House to accept his proposal to abolish the religious oath in certain cases, and already he has succeeded in carrying a resolution in favor of reform of the pension list, for which he has striven all his life. It is evident the relations of the two great parties, Tory and Liberal, are in a transition stage. The Tories, since 1884, hav had to appeal really to popular suffrage. This explains why the government accept Bradlaugh's motion about pension abuses, which has powerful support in the country. Mr. Jennings, who seconded it, went further even than Mr. Bradlaugh, and caused much amusement by calling attention to some of the more shameful instances of waste of public money on disreputable or undeserving persons and their descendants, although Jennings is a Tory, and notoriously a strong party man."

THE Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese of Newark has approved a rule of the priests that before any children shall be "confirmed" they must attend a parochial school for two years preceding such confirmation. The reason given for the adoption of this rule is that the parents in the church preferred that their children should attend the public rather than the parochial schools, and it was felt necessary by the church authorities to adopt stringent disciplinary measures to subdue this rebellious spirit.

SAYS the Sun: "Mr. Anthony Comstock's attention should be and is hereby called to the sickening and solemn report that the king of the Belgians is going to visit the Hon. Mr. Carnot, of France, for the purpose of getting up a lottery loan in aid of the Congo scheme. Is it not Mr. Comstock's duty, upon the bare mention and exposure of this report, to hie to Paris? It may be difficult to proceed against King Leopold, but Detectiv Comstock should consider the picnic he would hav among the exhibitions of French art."

OF the passage of his Oaths bill Mr. Bradlaugh says: "There was a big House for the division on the Oaths bill on Wednesday. I sent out a whip to all members, without distinction of politics, about three weeks ago, and three days before the debate every member, whether for or against, received an urgent reminder, together with a careful statement of reasons which I had drawn up in favor of the bill. On Tuesday night the government whips sent out a four-line whip to their own men, and Wednesday opened with conflicting rumors, not only as to the line the debate would take but also as to the official action of the government. It was stated that Mr. Smith, and most of the ministers, would vote against me. That proved to be accurate. It was said that the rank and file of the Tories would vote solid against me. That I did not believe. It was said that many of the Irisb members would vote against me. That I could not believe. Then it was told me officially that there were about fourteen of our own Liberals, who were away addressing public meetings, who were unpaired. This was true, and would naturally reduce the majority. Everyone who came to me had some specially pessimistic information. Some even suggested that I should be beaten. When I spoke, about two hundred members were present, the larger portion being Conservativs. On the whole, the debate was very creditable to both sides, although there were one or two exceptions of members who were exceedingly personal, and there were two who were shockingly unfair. The new closure rule came handy—without it the bill would hav been talked out—and, with rare exceptions, even those members who were most opposed to the bill justified and indorsed my action in moving the closure. The grand majority of one hundred givs the bill great authority for the other House." The bill will come up for further action on April 10th.

A Protectiv Tariff.

I will commence this article in the words of James W. Stillman, in his article on a "Revenue Tariff" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 24th: "Of the various questions now agitating the public mind, perhaps there is none of more importance than the proposed revision of the tariff." I will not, however, propose to consider the question as a non-partisan and then giv you a free trade lecture, "in the interest of truth," as that gentleman does, but I will say at the start that I propose to offer a few ideas on the subject for the express purpose of offsetting his partisan views.

He says: "The first question presented for consideration is, What is the primary object and meaning of a tariff?" and then adds that "it is designed to raise a revenue to pay the expenses of government, or for protecting the home manufacturer against the competition of his foreign rivals." We hav a correct definition of the purposes given for which a tariff is raised, and hence can hav no controversy about that, but the difficulty seems to be about what kind of a tariff will best subserve the interest of Americans.

Let me call your particular attention to the fact that not one person in a thousand knows what a revenue tariff is or what a protectiv tariff is.

The usual custom is to argue that a revenue tariff must be so arranged as to consist of low duties, and a protectiv tariff must consist of high duties. There never was a greater mistake in the world than this, and I shall attempt to illustrate this. Suppose that the foreign manufacturer can furnish an article, including cost of carrying to New York, at one dollar, and the market value here is one dollar and fifty cents. By free trade absolutely it would giv him a profit of fifty cents. If an American party cannot produce the same article for less than the market price, one dollar and fifty cents, it is evident that the foreigner will hav an advantage of fifty cents on each article, and can control the market by selling the article at one dollar and forty cents, one dollar and twenty-five cents, or less; but as the government needs money to carry on its expenses, it proposes in accordance with its constitutional provisions to levy a duty upon the foreign article. The proper amount of that duty is the question to determin. The American can furnish it for one dollar and fifty cents and pay his labor and capital. The foreigner can furnish it for one dollar and pay his labor and capital. Hence to place both countries on an exactly equal chance in our markets, the government should levy a duty of fifty cents on the article, and this would giv each country and the labor and capital of both an equal chance, and if the product was equally good, we think each party would sell about half of the required product. This seems clear.

The protectionist says, however, that in order to build up the nativ product and increase the labor of the country, we ought to levy a higher duty than the above difference, and so he succeeds in getting a law to levy a duty of sixty or seventy cents; and what is the result? Why, simply this: The foreigner can only realize a profit of twenty cents or less after paying such a duty and he accordingly will not send an equal amount into our market, thus giving the American product the advantage in the home market.

It will be seen that, while it does this, the higher duty has had the effect at the same time to cut down imports about one-half, while the extra twenty cents has not diminished the amount of duties received into the treasury, but now, in order to diminish the revenue to the actual needs of the government, a still higher duty must be levied, say eighty cents, and that would produce a genuin tariff for revenue only, while it would at the same time afford the best possible protection to the American manufactures, and that, too, without raising the market price one cent If it did, however, hav the effect to raise it, the natural competition would soon bring it to the original price, or below it, as has often been the case. It will be seen, then, that a tariff levied so high that only the necessary expenses of the government would be met by the imposts would at the same time be the best possible tariff for protection.

A revenue tariff, or one for revenue only, may be so arranged that it will afford the best kind of protection, or it may be so low that it would ruin our manufactures, and giv the whole market to other nations, while the amount received by the United States government would be practically the same.

The low revenue tariff would flood the country with goods, and take all our gold out of the country to benefit European labor and capital, while a high revenue tariff would prevent the influx of goods and afford protection to Americans, and at the same time keep all the money in the country, as our present tariff, to some extent, is doing. Who is to be benefited by a low revenue tariff, and what class is to be benefited by a high revenue tariff? These are simple questions. The man who has wealth, and who does not depend on an increase of his capital or labor, wants to buy his fineries at the lowest price, and is the one to be benefited by the low revenue duties and cheapened goods; and the poor man, who has only his labor to sell for the highest price he can get, and the manufacturer who needs to increase his capital and promote labor, they need a high tariff for revenue only. There is no dodging these questions. The influx of foreign labor, and other questions that are usually dragged into the tariff question, hav nothing to do with it, only as they affect the amount of production. It is a fact, however, that the influx at present, as in the past, creates a demand for necessaries that is an equal offset to their increase, and leaves the question as it is. That is, when many immigrants arrive, they bring with them both production and demand, which offset each other. This talk about the surplus held by the government being money kept out of circulation, and thereby destroying trade, is the worst kind of stupidity. The truth is, it is simply the amount of gold that under a low revenue tariff would be circulating in Europe, instead of being held by the government, and it shows that in the main the tariff was not high enough to restrict importations so as to produce the revenue only which was needed, or else the government would not hav it to store away.

Under no circumstances will a low revenue tariff cause a circulation of money in America, as the cost of imported goods, together with all profits, go out of the country. When President Cleveland, in his free trade message, advised the laboring man to work for cheap goods by means of a low tariff, he advised him to quit work and finger the bottoms of his empty pockets for the pennies to buy his necessaries with. But to the wealthy class who need no work, and hav their pockets full, it was a message of great encouragement. The labor of the poor man is his capital. He has no money laid by to purchase Mr. Cleveland's cheap goods; hence, what we want in America is such a tariff as will stimulate labor. We cannot afford to let America's workmen hang out their tongues for food and drink simply to support the aristocracy of Europe. Nor do we want to turn the twenty-five millions of laboring men and merchants into farmers, so as to produce that for which there is no demand. In fact, Americans want something besides bread to liv on. They want houses and clothing, education and home comforts, and so do the farmers.

There is one argument that ought to put every sensible man to rights on this question. We hav never heard clamoring by the free traders for low tariff except when the tariff had made the times good; and the president put his argument on the ground that, "inasmuch as we hav been prosperous, we ought to be willing to share our prosperity with the nations of the earth"—thus begging the whole question.

J. R. PERRY.

Wesley, Paine, Shakspere, and Bacon.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: What I wrote about John Wesley was in response to an inquiry of a correspondent, seconded by yourself in the heading, "Information Wanted About John Wesley." I quoted from a recent work of the historian Lecky to show that Wesley was not indicted for adultery in Georgia, but for defaming a woman's character. If there is documentary proof that Lecky is mistaken, let it be produced.

In regard to Thomas Paine I profess to hav some knowledge, having carefully studied his works and written much about him. Few people are aware how secretiv he was. He was scarcely known as a writer until more than eight years after the close of the Revolutionary war. In 1791, when he was fifty-four years of age, he burst forth like a meteor in the literary and political world by the publication of the "Rights of Man" in answer to Edmund Burke's attack on the French Revolution. All through the American war he signed himself "Common Sense," and his only open publication prior to his return to England was a "Dissertation on Government, the Affairs of the Bank and Paper Money," in 1786.

His first acknowledged essay was a Plea for the Excisemen, in 1772. This was anonymous, and the officers of the excise all contributed to pay the expense of publishing four thousand copies.

His next known literary work was a few brilliant contributions for the Pennsylvania Magazine in the early part of 1775, signed "Atlanticus." A year later he surprised his friend, Dr. Franklin, by the publication of the revolutionary pamphlet, "Common Sense." Its authorship was attributed to various statesmen of the time, and every edition was anonymous. So it was with "The Crisis," sixteen numbers, beginning in December, 1776, and ending December, 1783. They were all signed "Common Sense," and so they stand to-day in "Paine's Political Works."

Until recently no trace of any writing of Paine has been found between March, 1775, and January, 1776. In January, 1775, while Franklin was yet in England, a weekly paper was started in London, called, "The Crisis," the principal object of which was to oppose the British ministry in their conduct of affairs, especially in America. The writers were anonymous and audacious. The principal contributor, beginning April, 1775, was "Casca," who was unknown to the publisher, and was certainly about London from April or May until November or December.

In October, 1880, I first saw in the Congressional Library a bound copy of "The Crisis" of 1775, or rather, an American reprint published in New York in 1776. At once I detected "Casca" as Thomas Paine. Four days later I was happy to find that Librarian Spofford had anticipated me in indentifying "Casca" as Paine, his discovery being based, not on the contents of "The Crisis" of 1775, but on a separate publication of an extra paper in pamphlet form, entitled, "A Crisis Extraordinary," dated August 9, 1775, signed "Casca," and all about General Gage's proclamation of June 12th. Taking a text from Horace, Projecit ampullas, the writer gave it a free translation thus:

> On souls, of slavery more than death afraid,
> Gage wastes his pardons and his gasconade.

"The Crisis" was published in London from January 21, 1775, until after the Declaration of Independence. The first number of "The Crisis," by "Common Sense," is dated December 23 1776.

In 1796 a volume was published in England containing all the numbers of the American "Crisis" except two which could not be procured by the printer. And prefixed to these, as "Crisis No. I," was "Casca's" "Crisis Extraordinary," of August, 1775, signed "American C. S," i. e., "Common Sense."

This was such a puzzle to Paine's biographer, Sherwin, in 1819, that he attributed its insertion to the ignorance of the person who furnished the copy.

But Librarian Spofford, having detected "Casca" as Paine, made this marginal note in Sherwin's book:

> It is by Paine, but does not belong to the Crisis.

Mr. Spofford was not yet aware that "Casca" (i. e., Paine) was the chief contributor to "The Crisis" of 1775. And it is quite possible that Paine himself, who was in France in 1796, authorized the English publisher of his works to insert that "Crisis Extraordinary" as introductory to his later papers in America, it being specially suited to English readers.

When Paine returned to England in 1787 he immediately published a pamphlet entitled, "Prospects on the War." It was anonymous. Four years later, when he became known as a writer, some critic detected his authorship of that essay, and it was republished as his work.

Paine's success as a pamphleteer was unprecedented, and he now openly acknowledged himself as the writer "Common Sense." But yet he says in Part II of his "Rights of Man:" "Had not Burke urged the controversy I had most probably been a silent man."

Paine continued to write anonymously all his life, frequently signing himself "Common Sense" or "C. S." And shortly after his return to America in 1802 he wrote a series of political articles signed "Plain Sense," which I happened to find republished in an anonymous pamphlet at "Washington City" in 1803. The writer supported Jefferson's administration.

Having proved so much in regard to Paine's secret work, I will only add that his identification as "Casca" removes the last shadow of doubt that Paine was Junius. "Casca," like "Common Sense," was Junius come again pursuant to promis.

In regard to the Bacon Shakspere question, you, Mr. Editor, know that I introduced my late article with an apology for inflicting it upon your readers, which apology you kindly suppressed. There was no allusion in it to the correspondent who now assails me. Out of at least a dozen palpable and important errors in his first communication I corrected only three or four, very gently, in a very few lines, and with no allusion to the writer. He now comes again with so many blunders and repetitions of exploded falsehoods about Shakspere and Bacon that I will not undertake to point out a single one. I will only say that I hav at hand the latest and best biographies of Bacon and Shakspere, and ought to know what is fact and what is fiction concerning them. But to point out and answer the multitude of important mistakes of my assailant would only be a bore to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and would not improve the temper of my adversary.

I will, however, crave the readers' indulgence while I relate an incident in regard to Mr. Donnelly's work. One of his ablest colleagues in Congress was Judge Shellabarger, of Ohio, now a practicing lawyer in Washington. Judge Shellabarger had Mr. Donnelly at his house to dinner three years ago, and Mr. Donnelly disclosed to him some features of the cipher. The question soon after came up before the Classical Society for discussion. The Shakspereans did most of the talking, and seemed to triumph over the Baconians. Judge Shellabarger, as president, made the final speech, and it was to this effect, as I heard it:

Mr. Donnelly is a man of ability and scholarship, and though it is very difficult to believe that the world has been hoodwinked for nearly three hundred years, yet it is prudent to suspend our judgment until Mr. Donnelly's book comes out. The whole cipher he cannot, of course, disclose in advance, but from what I hav learned of it through him, I would illustrate it in this way: Take the old folio, and on a particular page the 50th word is, say, "our;" the 100th word, "father;" the 150 h, "which;" the 200th, "art;" the 250th, "in;" the 300th, "heaven." Now, if something like that is the certain result of the cipher, it would be folly to deny that Mr. Donnelly has made a great discovery. W. H. BURR.

Blue Laws.

The People's Cyclopedia says that the term Blue laws was a derisiv name given to the very rigid enactments of the early settlers of New England; that these were recounted in England and some of the other colonies with many laughable exaggerations and some malicious additions. The Blue laws never existed as a code, but the term "Blue laws" has been applied to those portions of the Body of Liberties, the old Body of Laws of 1646, and the decisions of the courts, guided by a rigid interpretation of the scriptures. So much for the non-existence of the Blue laws as a legal code.

The authorities I used in writing my former article on the Blue laws were several brief histories of the United States, Barnes's Popular History of the United States, and Bishop Spaulding, and to this last-named authority I am principally indebted for the quotations of the laws. Coming from so orthodox a source, I should, perhaps, hav made the quotations with some reservation. Though the bishop was Catholic, and wrote with considerable acrimony, I found that he was sustained by other authorities, excepting where he says that a woman was forbidden to kiss her child on the Sabbath, and where the husband and wife were forbidden to kiss each other on the Sabbath, and that the death penalty might be inflicted for striking or reviling parents and Sabbath-breaking. Yet, as the Bible was the supreme authority in matters of law, the courts would hav been justified in inflicting the death penalty on Sabbath-breakers and stubborn and rebellious children, though I know of no instance in which it was done.

Mr. Barr says that the Body of Liberties reduced the number of capital offenses to ten, while Barnes's History says the number of capital offenses was twelve. The Body of Liberties adopted by Massachusetts was substantially adopted by Connecticut. But it is probable that the Connecticut code did not include the striking or reviling of parents or Sabbath-breaking as capital offenses; the number of capital offenses then in Connecticut would be reduced to ten.

As to the laws concerning a husband kissing his wife, or wife her husband, or a mother her child, on the Lord's day, Mr. Spaulding givs Barber for his authority. But the only Barber I can find any reference to in any cyclopedia is in the People's, which merely mentions a Francis Barber, who was an officer under Washington during the Revolution. It might be that Spaulding had in his possession some review of the early colonial laws, by some humorous writer named Barber, which cited the traditionary story about the gentleman of New Haven being fined for kissing his wife on Sunday, which might hav had its origin in the case cited by Mr. Burr, of Goodman Hunt and wife and William Harding.

As to the blue-covered pamphlet recently republished in San Francisco, I never had the slightest knowledge of it until I read Mr. Burr's article. But regardless how the prohibition of the use of tobacco may be caricatured, the fact still remains that the law prohibited anyone under twenty years of age using tobacco, except when a doctor certified that it would "be good for him," and no other person could use it but once a day, and then not within ten miles of any house.

How the Sabbath may hav been observed in Connecticut when Mr. Burr visited there would by no means apply to the time of which I wrote. As strict as they were in the observance of the Sabbath not more than forty or fifty years ago, and even at the present time, we may form some idea of the observance of the Sabbath two and a half centuries ago, when at the tap of the drum on Sunday mornings every house in Plymouth opened, and all the people assembled in front of the captain's house, and there formed in line, marching three abreast to the meeting-house. "The services began with a long prayer, which was followed by reading and expounding of the scriptures, a psalm—lined by one of the ruling elders—from Ainsworth's version, which the colonists brought over with them, and the sermon. Instrumental music was absolutely proscribed, as condemned by the text (Amos v, 23): 'I will not hear the melody of thy viols;' and one tune for each meter was all those good old fathers needed. . . . The approved length of the sermon was one hour." After listening to a very long prayer, expounding scripture, hymns, and a sermon of an hour's length, it must necessarily hav become somewhat fatiguing. But it was an unlucky moment for the youngster, as he was perched upon the pulpit stairway, or in the gallery, if his eyelids drooped in slumber. The watchful constables with their wands, tipped on one extremity with the foot and on the other with the tail of a rabbit, brought the heavier end down upon the little "nodding flaxen head." And if the care-worn matron was betrayed into a like offense, she was gently reminded of her duty by a touch on the forehead with the softer end of the same stick.

Certainly Mr. Burr, or the historian Palfrey, will not contend that the laws and court decisions by which Quakers were flogged, had their ears cut off, tongues bored with hot irons, and were executed on Boston Common, are a mass of fabrication by a dishonest writer. It is no fabrication that Roger Williams was forced to leave the Salem colony, or that witches were imprisoned and hanged. It is no fabrication on the part of historians when they say that the swearer was made to meditate over his sin, standing in a public place, with his tongue in a cleft stick; fined twelvepence, set in the stocks, or imprisoned, "according to the nature and quality of the person." In exaggerated offenses of this kind, the unruly member was bored through with a hot iron. It was hardly a canard on the part of Josselyn, writing of the old Body of Laws of 1646, when he says that scolds were gagged and set at their doors for certain hours for all "comers and goers to gaze at." Ducking in running water is also mentioned as a punishment for this class of offenders. We can hardly say that it was a ludicrous exaggeration when we are told that Philip Ratcliffe was sentenced to be whipped, hav his ears cut off, and be fined forty shillings and banished out of the limits of the jurisdiction for "uttering malicious and scandalous speeches against the government and church of Salem."

It is not likely to be a "malicious addition" when the historian tells us that the "prophanely behaved person, who lingered without dores att the meeting-house on the Lord's daies," to indulge in social chat or even to steal a quiet nap, was "admonished" by the constable; on a second offense "sett in the stockes," and if he was still perverse, he was cited before the court; or when we are informed that "if any man dare interrupt the preacher or falsely charge the minister with error, 'in the open face of the church,' or otherwise make God's wayes contemptible and ridiculous, every such person or persons (what soever censure the church may passe) shall for the first scandall bee convented and reproved openly by the magistrate at some Lecture, and bound to their good behavior. And if the second time they breake forth into the like contemptuous carriages, they shall either pay five pounds to the publique Treasure or stand two hours openly upon a block or stoole four foote high upon a Lecture day, with a paper fixed on his Breast, written with capitalle letters, An open and obstinate contemner of God's holy ordinances."

But the Puritans had one redeeming trait that covered a multitude of sins. Next to their religion they prized education. They established the public schools, which hav an influence for good which, let us hope, will long survive the effects of their founders' evil influence on the country. In Connecticut each family had to giv a peck of corn or a shilling in coin for the maintenance of the teacher, and in villages of a hundred families a grammar school had to be maintained. Thus the Puritans established the very institution that was sure to become an enemy to their superstition and giv the death-blow to their theology. Let this redound to their credit.

Stopping German Idolatry.

In announcing the death of the emperor William I. to the German Reichstag on the 9th of March, Prince Bismarck closed his speech (according to the cable dispatch of the Associated Press, which was corroborated, two days later, by a special cablegram of the Illinois Staats Zeitung) as follows:

I received this very day from New York a telegram of sympathy, showing what confidence the dynasty of the imperial house has acquired among all nations. This is the legacy which the emperor's long reign bequeaths to the German people. The confidence which his dynasty has won will be transferred to the nation, despite anything that may be attempted against it.

I do not remember any statesman in the world who would hav dared so sillily to abuse his own people, a people of fifty millions, ranking among the first in science and art. I do not remember that any statesman could hav dared to say to his people: "You are worth nothing but for the confidence your dynasty has won, which confidence may, perhaps, be transferred to you."

There exists, indeed, among those Germans in America who deserted from their military duty and kindly left to others the mission to be shot or mutilated for the dynastic interests of the Hohenzollern family a belief that the respect in this country to Germans has increased since or in consequence of the German victory over France in 1871. But I never remarked that a nativ of the small republic of Switzerland or a nativ of Denmark had to complain of either "disrespect" or "less" respect on account of his mother country playing only the fifth or tenth fiddle in the European fuss-concert.

That childish belief that we, Germans in America, are enjoying more "respect" the more hundreds of thousands of bayonets and helmets are glittering in the sun of Germany, has become a pet legend among German monarchists on both sides of the Atlantic, and is cultivated with the utmost care by monarchistic editors of some of the most prominent German-American papers.

To this class of German monarchists in America, to those identifying their mother country with the Hohenzollern family, Bismarck's language as quoted above properly may apply. But all Germans who, republicans by innermost convictions, know how to discriminate between the German people and their dynasty voluntarily will renounce all "confidence transferred to them on account of the Hohenzollern dynasty," and so much the more as they solemnly swore having "renounced all allegiance to the emperor of Germany."

As to the German Reichstag, and to the courage of those two hundred representativs, who gratefully accepted, in behalf of the people, that language with which Bismarck graciously treated them, history will never forget that the German people on the 9th of March, 1888, suffered an infamous insult—on account of a dead idol.

[The foregoing lines were written on the 10th of March and sent to the Philadelphia Press, but refused admittance to its columns.]

On Sunday, the 25th of March, the German Socialists of Philadelphia held a mass-meeting in the Knights of Labor Hall, and editor Louis Werner, of the Philadelphia Tageblatt, the Socialistic daily of Philadelphia, delivered a speech on "William I., his Life and Deeds." The following resolution was offered and unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, Some German-American citizens, in Philadelphia as in other great cities of the country, hav indulged in noisefully celebrating the memory of the dead Emperor William I; and

WHEREAS, Said memorial celebrations were assisted in by both monarchical German-American newspapers and unscrupulous nativ politicians of this country;

Resolved, 1. We, American citizens, nativs of Germany, republicans, not by chance of birth, but by innermost conviction, and having taken the oath of allegiance to this republic and the Constitution of the United States, and having "absolutely and entirely renounced and abjured all allegiance and fidelity to every foreign potentate, prince, sovereign, or sovereignty whatsoever, and particularly to the emperor of Germany, of whom we were before subjects," denounce any memorial celebration in this republic of any foreign sovereign whatsoever, as contrary to law, to sense, to taste, as hateful to upright republicanism, as insulting to mind and feeling of true citizens of this republic.

2. We love our fatherland, as, by nature, all men do, but we discriminate between Germany and her oppressors; we hold that the honor and dignity, the strength and power, of Germany is represented by the people, not by the bloody Hohenzollern family or their feudal surroundings.

3. We denounce, as a lie in the face of history, that monarchical flattery that Germany was indebted for her unity to William I. The unity of Germany arose not from, but against, the will of the Prussian monarch, who violently resisted for twenty-five years all efforts of the people tending to unity, and who, in 1848 and 1849, had massacred or imprisoned hundreds of the best sons of the fatherland for their mere demanding "the unity of Germany."

4. We remember that in 1849 many scores of popular heroes were executed in Rastatt, Mannheim, Freiburg, and Landau, by order of the "Cartridge Prince," the late Emperor William, he faithlessly rescinding the "parole" by which said heroes were induced to surrender.

5. We suggest that all Germans who enjoy themselvs in displaying in this republic allegiance to the monarchical government of Germany should return at once to the mother country, and serve out their military terms, to which they were bound by duty, but from which they fled.

6. We condemn particularly the action of Mr. Carl Schurz, who delivered in New York the eulogy of the dead emperor; we deem it inconsistent with the duties of a former high officer of this republic to promote monarchical ideas in the United States. We denounce his anti-republican course and the course of those high officers, of the governor, of the mayor, etc., who sent letters of sympathy to that lawless assemblage.

7. We finally invite the people of the United States to check that idolatry in this republic to foreign sovereigns, and to sever their connection from both the monarchical German-American press and the unscrupulous American press that indulge in fostering such idolatry.

Of this resolution a copy was taken by the reporters of the Press and the Ledger. But the writers of those papers, who supported the William idolatry, refused the publication. The Press devoted, however, a few lines to the resolution, and reprinted in full No. 5 only. ADOLF HEPNER.

Judiciary Clap-trap.

Amid all the strife for "Jeffersonian simplicity" and "Jacksonian democracy" that we read so much about in the newspapers, there stands, firm as a rock in its conservatism, that bulwark of antiquated tomfoolery, the Supreme Court of the United States.

Think, plain American citizen, of twelve men in their right minds, and, as far as you can perceive, constructed of about the same quality of dust that enters into your own composition, think, I say, of twelve such men going about their public duties clad in black silk—what shall we call them?—yes, sir, by Jove, Mother Hubbard dresses! How dignified! how awe-inspiring!

If the object of these grave clothes is toward impressivness, the judges had better complete the spectacle and wear sun-bonnets.

When the highest tribunal in the land must supplement its dignity by such vulgar clap-trap as it now does, its dignity must indeed be in a bad way.

As is his custom, ex President Palmer presents his check for $50, and will forward the remainder in the fall. It would be obtrusiv in me to reiterate the many obligations the Union is under to Courtlandt Palmer. Suffice to say, it will not be able to redeem them in words, but he will ever hold a warm place in our hearts. Born to be distinguished for possession of wealth, he has gained the grander distinction of being endowed with brains. No dilettante of the literati, but possessing the aspirations of a sterling reformer, he has labored earnestly and intelligently for the removal of man's most powerful oppressor—ignorance. We can point with pride to the disinterestedness of his motivs. Not for wealth, reputation, nor amusement—all these were within easy reach—nor for the sake of combating popular theories, for he is not of the belligerent mold, but with a strong, altruistic sense of duty which stamps the intellectual and moral hero, he proclaims truth when others who perceive tremble to lend their lips to its utterance. These acts hav become characteristic of his life, and show how well he learned the lesson, Honos habet onus. Such duties as concern the right or wrong of institutions, as deal with the formation of character, as forward the welfare of humanity, as substitute for dogmas and creeds social conditions conduciv to self-culture, and which would inaugurate economic arrangements favorable to long-forgotten justice, are the duties to which he earnestly devotes himself. Courtlandt Palmer seeks to abolish the pride, reserve, and contempt for labor and the laborers prevalent among the higher classes, and to displace the envy, hatred, and jealousy of the lower by a system of social equity which, without agrarianism, would demolish class distinctions. When we remember that, reared in the luxurious ease of a favored class, he braves their conservatism, and virtually "carries the war into Africa" by founding the Nineteenth Century Club, where these serious ethical, religious, and philosophical subjects are discussed in the light of reason—where the usual frivolity and debasement of club life is displaced for sober reflection among those of influence in society—we think Courtlandt Palmer has proved a lasting claim to the gratitude of Liberals and reformers and of all who appreciate those who would make this world some better for their having lived in it.

The Chicago Secular Union has undertaken considerable expense, but is not unmindful of its pledge of $100 to maintain the national society, and as an earnest of its good-will for our success in the present struggle liquidates $50 of its indebtedness. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 24th our current expenses are placed at $1,500. That would hav been the case had we rented Madison Street Theater, but it is hoped our new quarters will return us a handsome revenue.

From far-off Oregon the desire of the secretary is seconded by the Molalla Secular Union with a donation of $6 "to the campaign literature fund." Its live secretary, Reuben Wright, hopes that "this little mite may help keep the good work going." This is a good example for other Unions to follow.

M. H. Woodbury, an earnest, intelligent, outspoken Liberal of Rockport, Ohio, furnishes $5 for ammunition to demolish the walls of the modern Jericho—assumptions of priestcraft. Rams' horns are no circumstance to Secular leaflets.

My good friend, Dr. W. L. Willis, of Kokomo, Ind., has been an invaluable assistant, and seems as interested in the welfare of the Union as though responsible for its success or failure. His suggestions are eminently practical, and I am more than pleased to hav the benefit of his experience. He offers something more than suggestions, as will be observed by his donation toward the leaflets, and writes: "I hope to be able to increase my work in this direction, revising old and getting up new articles. Keeping things stirring is the only way to defeat the sanctified in their schemes of villainy." With this proposition of Brother Willis the majority of Liberals will fully agree: "Colonel Ingersoll is the man the Union Labor party should nominate for president. The mere fact of his nomination would arouse thousands to thinking. The world is too far advanced to take any permanent backward step, so I look and work for victory."

Prof. D. G. Crow, of Fort Bayard, N. M., sends some reports of illustrated popular astronomical lectures published in the Silverton (N. M.) Enterprise. That journal highly commends them editorially "for their simplicity and clearness of style. With the aid of those even a child may locate the heavenly magnates that are now visible." They show the author to be a profound student, a clear, strong, and convincing writer. Professor Crow contemplates entering the Freethought lecture field, having four lectures on Freethought and several on astronomy. As principal for many years of various public schools in Illinois and New Mexico, the professor is well qualified by nativ tact, education, and experience to treat these themes in an able manner.

Brother F. Zipp, who is as brief as his name in his communications, forwards $2 "for humanity" from Deadwood, Dak. Brother Zipp is an old campaigner in the cause of mental freedom, and his heart is in the right place.

Geo. H. Dawes, of Pittsville, Wis., another brilliant, educated school-teacher, will soon take the rostrum in the interest of the Secular Union, science, and reason. We are pleased to add his name to the roll of membership. His terse and pungent articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER hav already attracted wide attention.

Brother Kraft, of Grantfork, is an enthusiastic admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, an energetic worker in spreading the light of mental liberty. He has all those Liberal mottoes and Mr. Eckhard's design of the Nine Demands framed and hanging in his place of business. In consequence of which a minister recently made a copy of the mottoes and Nine Demands and had them printed and circulated—of course, with the intention of injuring our friend Kraft, but he survived their opposition.

We extend to Messrs. Wahl and Fuchs, of Quincy, Ill., our thanks for their interest, and regret that our activ worker, I. S. Lee, is about to leave, but what is their loss is St. Louis's gain, where Secular work is practically dead, but where Mr. Lee can enlarge his field of usefulness and do as faithful and effectiv work as he did in Quincy.

To the Farmdale friends we extend our gratitude for their donation; and doubtless they will regret with us that Miss De Cleyre is quite ill. It is to be hoped that her brilliance and genius will soon again be employed in the career for which she is so well adapted.

Professor Crow, whom I mentioned above, sends an article setting forth in his own way the claims of the American Secular Union. It is a timely article; read it. E. A. STEVENS.

MR. CROW'S LETTER.

FORT BAYARD, N. M., 1888.

MR. E. A. STEVENS. Sir: Through you, as secretary, I desire to pay my regards to the American Secular Union. Being convinced that it is through the American Secular Union that the greatest and most substantial work can be accomplished for Liberalism, I desire to lay my small offering upon the Secular altar and join you in your efforts to make our government and its laws accord with the principles of our Constitution.

I hav watched the progress of this institution with much solicitude, for I felt that its success or its failure would be the turning-point in the Secular crisis which will end in a triumph for Freethought or a victory for the church.

If the management has been unwisely conducted, let us improve it; if wrong, let us right it. Wisely or unwisely, right or wrong, he who has kept pace with its work must surely see that, with the force employed and the amount contributed, a vast field has been opened up, and a quality and quantity of seed planted which is already yielding a most surprising harvest.

You should not expect those who do the hard labor as pioneers, and those who devote their time and energies in the office or at the editor's desk, to show the self-sacrificing, starving spirit of salvationists. The clergy are willing (?) to exchange their pleasures and comforts of this life for the prospects of a better show beyond. Liberals entertain quite a different notion about the economic relations between a present and future life, and it is not at all surprising that they demand their pay as they go. I hope your officers, lecturers, and journalists are well paid for all services rendered to the American Secular Union. If they are not, they should charge it to the want of business sagacity, and make new contracts. If they are overpaid, the cathedral they will build or the monument they will erect with their "ill-gotten gains" will not be likely to excite the jealousy of their more pious contemporaries.

The noble work done by your president on his tours through the West, both with voice and pen, as time wears on will become more and more apparent. The true courage displayed by the secretary and his able colleagues in their recent contest with the wily craftiness of Chicago's saintly parasites, is a precedent for others to follow who are compelled to witness a like outrage of justice in the state being used as an instrument to extract money from public funds for sectarian ends.

The success of the late Paine celebrations forms a most pleasing feature of the Secular movement, and especially so to those old pioneers of Freethought who hav so anxiously waited for the time to come when this could be done without incurring the danger of bodily injury or social ostracism.

The erection of Liberal halls, the organization of Secular societies, the publishing and circulation of Liberal literature, and the cordial reception our lectures are receiving are signs the indication of which requires no schooled prophet to explain. These, together with the cringing fear displayed by the divine expositors of God's word and will, when viewing the "awful desecration of the Sabbath," "the great tendency to Infidelity," and, worse than all, "the empty pews of the churches," are encouragements such as should move every lukewarm Liberal to determined action, and every real worker to greater energy.

The West is as full of Free thinkers in 1888 as the East was of Freesoilers in 1848, and they are as ready to show their colors in behalf of "equal rights and impartial justice."

All they want is to be mustered, trained, encouraged, and given an opportunity to apply their nativ talent in the great struggle against superstition. It is to the West that we must look for our greatest help. The brave, generous, and thrifty sons of the daring pioneers who faced the perils of burning sands and savage foes in search of fortune and freedom, though "Infidel" to Christian faith, possess a fidelity worthy of the noblest of their race.

I do not come, my friends, to criticise or find fault, neither to bring advice, for of these articles I presume you hav a plentiful supply. I desire to encourage you in your noble efforts to baffle the encroachments of the ecclesiastical upon the civil power.

It must be expected that traitors and Tories will abound in every struggle for freedom; but it is a matter of fact that these ingrates lose their influence as the dawn of the success of the cause draws on, and as the tide of free thought, speech, and action rises irresistibly before them.

One masterly effort, such as the American Secular Union is now able to make, would establish a precedent for the Secular cause which no "bull" anathema, nor curse of priest, nor indignant blast from Protestant pulpit or pious press can overthrow or cause to shake.

Now, dear friends, I send you herewith my kindest wishes, which I hope will include many of earth's, if not all of heaven's, choicest blessings. D. G. CROW.

Sham Candor.

At this period of bold inquiry into the foundations of institutions till now exempt from sacrilegious questioning, it becomes necessary to the church that there should be minds who will pose in the attitude of umpires, disinterested investigators, welcomers of free discussion, and so on; but carefully selected by the church, and pledged beforehand to discover just what is wanted and nothing else.

Before this tribunal the Freethinker is invited to appear, as Luther before the Diet of Worms.

In older times, there was no need for concealment, for masks; bigotry stalked abroad and openly crushed whatever insubmissiv head appeared.

But public sentiment, crystallized in laws protectiv of human rights, has put an end to this, so that the servants of the ghost-God hav to submit like anybody else to the authority of the people.

All the ascendency which they are to hav hereafter must therefore be maintained by diplomacy.

The lion has changed into the fox. The spirit of the age must be recognized. The spirit of the age must be catered to; the people must be humbugged, since they are too mighty to be terrorized.

The church must masquerade as a scientist. She must surround herself with geological specimens; she must repudiate past methods. She must mount a pair of great goggles, and having slyly first "salted" the mine, must successfully enact the role of a discoverer of the "salt."

Scientific men (or would-be such, or such as are magnetized by the great church power) are starting up all the time whose candid minds (or candied minds) hav led them to the feet of Christ. They "discover" that the world is only six thousand years old; that the world was the first created of all stars or planets; that geology proves the truth of Genesis; and the church "points with pride," etc.

The church's appeal to force having failed, she has no resource left but the appeal to reason, despised reason! How humiliating! Paine was damned for appealing to reason. But necessity knows no law. After all, our predecessors who condemned human reason were wrong. When any mistake has been made we can always put it off on the fallibility of individuals; the church itself can make no mistake.

So here goes for reason, says the church. Damnation—on paper—bellowings of a priest concealed behind a brass Jehovah hav no effect to keep back the crowd from peeking. Some one must go into the audience and seem to be moved to philosophical speculations. At first he must seem hostil to the church; he must "giv away" a great deal. He must then gently settle down into the class which Jesus—in the early stages of his ambition—referred to when he said, "He that is not against us is for us," and so by imperceptible degrees pave the way to that state of mind in which Jesus found his followers when he uttered the directly opposed statement that "he that is not with us scattereth abroad."

The conjurer's tricks derive all their glory and dazzling effect from the confederate in the crowd, who, while having been carefully subsidized and coached, and his interest enlisted beforehand, is willingly vanquished by the magician's skill.

If the church has the selection of the umpire, she can afford to throw open the gate of free discussion.

But mark the magician. He seems to invite any one in the audience to "come upon the stage," to take the pack, or to hold the handkerchief. But there is a way to do a thing and not to do it. The church knows how to seem to do it and not to do it.

Offer yourself, a perfect stranger to the conjurer, the great Christian conjurer, to "go upon the stage." Strive to put questions leading to an intimacy of knowledge against which he has drawn the line, and see if you can get in a word edgewise. You will never get his eye; no, no. he knows better! If you could, it would "rattle" the whole show.

No pulpit orator is ever contradicted. He can say anything. The pews hav to take it all in dumb silence. Once a lady whose character was assailed in a sermon felt impelled to "kick" then and there, and the press all over the country combined to condemn her for "interrupting the exercises."

The writer, at that time an honest believer, sent questions to a paper whose editors professed that they desired "candor," "openness," in dealing with religious doubts. This profession, however, was for the ear of the public solely. They admitted to their columns only what they thought proper. The one whose eyes were opened to the hollowness of that profession had no show, no voice. How different the candor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which admits Theistic and Christian articles! In no better way can its earnestness, its honesty—and the impregnability of its positions, too, it may be said—be demonstrated.

Where is there a Christian paper willing to let the truth of its cause be made apparent by printing the other side? Theology is confessedly a muddle. An ex-minister of the true fold is telling tales out of school, saying that not one minister in a hundred believes what he preaches, what he is sworn to preach, what he must preach on peril of seeing his family starve. The church ought to be a unit, and honest seekers after truth should be relieved from false positions. Why, then, not court free discussion? Why not be candid in fact, and not merely seek an unearned reputation for candor? Why? Because—because—it would blow the whole business to where it would never come back.

FREEMAN.

Religious Persecution.

The case which I am about to relate, although known to thousands all over the country. may be new and of interest to many others. Mrs. Elizabeth W. Packard was the wife of Rev. Theophilus Packard, pastor of a Presbyterian church at Manteno, Kankakee county, Ill. She was also the daughter of a clergyman residing in Massachusetts, and was the mother of six children. She was a member of a Bible class in her husband's church, in which biblical questions were discussed. It was here that her mind began to unfold. She had been educated and trained in orthodox methods, and knew nothing of Infidels or Freethought literature except as they were referred to by preachers or in the literature of religious publications. According to the record which has been made in this case, Mrs. Packard disagreed with her Bible teacher, first on the interpretation of scripture, and secondly as to the truth of the scripture itself. On one occasion the class was wrestling with the text that "Godliness is profitable in all things." The teacher went on to show that God would prosper all those who loved him; that if they continued to serve him and worship him in spirit and in truth, they would all get rich. Mrs. Packard's clear and logical mind repudiated this absurd doctrin even from a Bible standpoint, and when it was insisted upon, then Mrs. Packard went into the neighborhood for illustrations that some wicked sinners were raising better crops and getting rich faster than the teacher or even some of the most devout of the congregation. The moment they were beaten in the argument they got mad and declared that Mrs. Packard was a heretic and scoffer, and some of the members complained to the pastor that if Mrs. Packard was not stopped in her mad career she would break up not only the Bible class but the whole church. Mr. Packard in the goodness of his heart would not believe that his wife was a heretic and therefore he kindly suggested that she was insane. She was all this time doing the work of the house and caring for her six children. But it seems a new light was dawning upon the mind of this highly intellectual woman. The expounding and explaining of scripture in the Bible class had awakened in her mind new thoughts and new ideas. She had no disposition to conceal her thoughts. She was inherently honest, and naturally supposed other people, especially church-members, also to be honest, and was willing to talk with them and be reasoned out of her heresy if she were in error. Members of the congregation called in to talk with her, but her reason and her logic were beyond their capacity, and they sided with her husband that she was insane. The law of Illinois then was that if any person was supposed to be insane the natural guardian of such supposed insane person could call in two physicians and upon their certificates such person would be received in the insane asylum. Mr. Packard called in two physicians, both members of his congregation, and they readily gave their certificates, and a sheriff was then called in and Mrs. Packard was torn away from home and children and locked up within the gloomy walls of the Jacksonville insane asylum.

This was about the year 1860. Some three years afterward, her eldest son became of age, and he applied for her release, and she was discharged as incurably insane. She was taken to her home at Manteno, and her husband immediately locked her in a room and began to make preparations to send her to an insane asylum in Massachusetts, her nativ state. When she discovered this design, she managed to attract the attention of a passing neighbor and had him convey to an attorney a letter in which she gave an account of her three years' incarceration in an insane asylum, and that she was now restrained of her liberty by her husband, and that she was not now insane and never had been. This letter reached its destination, and the lawyer, Mr. S. W. Moore, still living at Kankakee, sued out a writ of habeas corpus before the judge of that district, and the sheriff proceeded to bring Mr. and Mrs. Packard into court The trial lasted three days, and crowds were in attendance. Mr. Packard was unable to produce one fact, or even the shadow of any evidence, that his wife was insane, except the fact that she repudiated many of the teachings of the Bible. She had never committed the first act of violence. She could hav broken out of her window and escaped. but she refused to do so because it would be an act of violence, which she was determined to avoid. She was discharged by the judge and a jury of twelve men, with a certificate of her sanity, and from that day never lived again with her husband.

I had vaguely heard of these facts through the newspapers when in January, 1867, I met Mrs. Packard at Springfield, Illinois, the capital of the state. I had been elected a clerk in the legislature. I bought of Mrs. Packard a book giving an account of her three years' imprisonment, with the circumstances preceding and succeeding her incarceration. I don't remember when my indignation was more thoroughly aroused than when I read these facts. I could scarcely believe that they were true. I wondered that those in charge of the insane asylum would permit a lady of Mrs. Packard's kindly and gifted nature to remain there three years as an insane woman, and then to discharge her as incurably insane. But I had not at that time, as I hav since, been brought to realize how Bible beliefs blunt the intellect of man and transform him into a demon.

I became the friend of Mrs. Packard. I discovered that she had a mission to perform. She was in Springfield for the purpose of reforming the laws of the state relating to the insane. Her bills were already prepared, and she wanted them introduced and passed. I knew something of the machinery of legislation, and I rendered her all the aid possible.

Judging from my own feelings, in the simplicity of my mind, I thought the members of the legislature, or a large majority of them, at least, would be glad to recognize Mrs. Packard as an injured woman, and make haste to enact such laws as would prevent a repetition of the wrongs she had suffered. In this view I was mistaken so far as the alacrity of the members was concerned. I discovered a disinclination on the part of many to become her champion, and then I discovered some who declared their belief that she was still an insane woman, basing their belief wholly upon their confidence in the authority by which she had been so declared, and notwithstanding her discharge by a court as a sane person. The superintendent of the insane hospital, Dr. Alexander Macfarlane, was a thoroughgoing Presbyterian, and stood high in the church and in society, and in the confidence of his political friends. Back of him were the trustees and other officers of the hospital, and to espouse the cause of Mrs. Packard was to impugn the honesty and the capacity of these officers, and besides, it had a look of bucking against the church. I induced Mrs. Packard to consent to speak before the members in a room of the capitol building, and I had hard drumming to get twenty-five members out of more than one hundred to attend. There were some who willingly espoused her cause, and the more they saw of her and knew of her case the more earnest they became in efforts to carry forward her bills. At length Dr. Macfarlane and his friends were obliged to put in an appearance to counteract a growing influence in her favor. They seemed to rely wholly upon "influence" and "respectability" to support them, as they showed an unwillingness to grapple with the facts. In conversation with Dr. Macfarlane, I remarked to him that I could discover in Mrs. Packard no symptoms of insanity. His reply was, "She has a very shrewd way of concealing it," and this reply well illustrates what manner of man he was. But Mrs. Packard succeeded. Her bills were passed, and the law governing the examination and commitment of lunatics in Illinois is known as the Packard law. There hav been several attempts to repeal it, but the law still stands. It provides for an examination and trial before a jury of twelve persons in order to commit, and throws other safeguards around a person accused of insanity, especially those who may be friendless.

One of the laws enacted through Mrs. Packard's efforts provided for the examination and trial of every person then confined in the insane hospital. Special efforts were made by Macfarlane's friends to defeat this bill. After it had passed and before the day of trial came, I am informed, not less than thirty inmates were quietly removed to their homes or elsewhere. One of this number was a lady from Kane county who had been imprisoned eleven years, and who had never evinced any other symptom of insanity than a belief that she could see and converse with spirits.

After the passage of the Packard bills, there arose a sentiment in the legislature that Dr. McFarlane was an unfit man to hav charge of an insane hospital. A resolution of inquiry and investigation was adopted, and it resulted finally in his discharge.

I trust I may be pardoned for mentioning that after it was all over I received from Mrs. Packard a very kind letter giving me many thanks for the aid I rendered her. Mrs. Packard is, I think, still living, though quite aged. She has pursued her mission until she has reformed the laws of sixteen states and territories concerning the insane. While she was in Oregon, some six or eight years ago, she wrote a letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which was printed among the "Letters from Friends," breathing the pure spirit of Liberalism and referring to her imprisonment in Illinois. About four years ago she was laboring with the Georgia legislature. About two years ago I read in the papers that she had commenced a suit against Dr. Macfarlane for defamation of character in writing letters to the effect that she was an insane woman. In all these years that pious Presbyterian has continued to pursue her with charges of insanity. He still resides at Jacksonville, where he carries on a private insane hospital. I hav been informed that Mrs. Packard's suit had the effect of bringing the haughty doctor to his knees.

Mrs. Packard has written a very interesting work on the treatment of the insane, which I had the pleasure of finding in the Chicago Public Library a few years ago. I met a son of hers in Chicago about the same time, who is a rising young lawyer of that city, and he informed me that his mother had by the sale of her book, and by fortunate investments, acquired considerable property, and had thus been enabled to render aid to the husband who had so ignorantly abused her.

Preachers and the Deluge.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: If you were to attend an orthodox church, under the charge of a well-educated minister, for years, you would never hear the slightest allusion to the deluge. If I were a preacher, and really believed this story, I could not preach a sermon without dwelling upon this terrible instance of God's wrath against a wicked generation. Why, then, do orthodox preachers never refer to this most momentous of all events? Are we not justified in thinking that they know that the whole story is absurd, and that the least said about it the better? The orthodox ice at this point is very thin, and preachers don't like to skate upon it. I sometimes get very much disgusted with preachers, and am inclined to think that a great many of them are hypocrits, and, for selfish considerations, preach what they themselvs do not believe.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE following is C. B. Reynolds's list of lecture engagements so far as known:

San Diego, Cal.	April 7, 8.
National City, Cal.	9, 11, 12.
Los Angeles, Cal.	14, 15.
Santa Ana, Cal.	17, 18, 19.

California friends desiring lectures should write to Mr. Reynolds at any of the above places so letters will reach two days ahead of dates.

J. E. REMSBURG, a Liberal lecturer, spoke at the court house last night. The rain kept many persons away who would otherwise hav attended, but those who were present were highly entertained. Mr. Remsburg is a captivating talker, both as to manner and matter, and he had the closest attention throughout. He talked about the Sunday law, opposing the measure as an uncalled-for invasion of the personal rights of the citizen.—Gainsville, Tex., Morning Register.

Mr. Hammond, M.D., Destroyed.

World's Report of Saturday Evening Session of the Woman's Congress.

This evening's was the shortest session of the week, but it was notable for introducing two pretty girl speakers. The first was Miss Helen Gardener, a really beautiful girl wonderfully gowned in black velvet and an antique drapery made of a red China silk shawl, who discussed the question of "Sex in Brain" in true scientific fashion. Taking Dr. G. A Spitzka, of New York, as the only man on her side, Miss Gardener proceeded to use her fourteen months of scientific research to completely shred the tenets of Dr. Hammond and others.

Correction.

I intended to say, and thought I did say, that there were only four votes cast for John P. Hale in the eighth ward of New York city, where I voted in 1852 Three years later the Republican party was born, and I was present at the birth.

Ancient History for the Benefit of a Modern Pharisee.

On Nov. 12, 1877, D. M. Bennett was arrested for mailing a polemical tract called, "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," written by himself, and a scientific tract entitled, "How Do Marsupials Propagate?" written by Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Pa. Previously to this Comstock had arrested E. H. Heywood for mailing "Cupid's Yokes." Mr. Heywood was convicted in January, 1878; while in the same month Mr. Bennett's case was dismissed. In the same month Frank Rivers also was arrested for selling "Fruits of Philosophy," a scientific treatis obnoxious to Comstock principally because Freethinkers sold it. Mr. Mendum, we think, possesses the original plates in this country, and in England the book is issued by Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant.

In Anthony Comstock's report to his society for 1878, issued just after these arrests, on page 7, occur these words:

"Another class of publications, issued by free-lovers and Freethinkers, is in a fair way of being stamped out. The public generally can scarcely be aware of the extent that blasphemy and filth commingled hav found vent through these varied channels. Under a plausible pretense men who raise a howl about free press, free speech, etc., ruthlessly trample underfoot the most sacred things, breaking down the altars of religion, bursting asunder the ties of home, and seeking to overthrow every social restraint."

Comstock also subsequently repeated these threats before an auxiliary ecclesiastical society of Rochester, saying that Infidel publications and Infidel tracts would soon be suppressed. Before another society in Boston he referred to the Investigator and Banner of Light as publications to which he should soon pay attention, and he made another threat against Freethought literature before his society in St. Louis.

After Mr. Bennett's arrest in 1877, he printed a petition to Congress, written by T. B. Wakeman, asking for the repeal or modification of Comstock's law by which he expected to stamp out the publications of Freethinkers. This petition was referred to the committee on revision of the laws of the House, who gave hearing to E. B. Foote, Jr., A. E. Giles, and J. B. Wolff in its favor, and Samuel Colgate and Anthony Comstock against it. On May 1st the committee reported adversely. Before the committee Comstock, on Saturday, April 20, 1878, said that D. M. Bennett published a "villainous and blasphemous sheet," which ought to be suppressed. Mr. Comstock said the same thing to two United States senators, who agreed with him, and agreed also to vote for the retention of the law. Now, if the law did not affect Infidel publications, why this argument and appeal to legislators to retain the law on the statute books? At this time, too, Comstock made a threat to soon hav Mr. Bennett arrested again. Comstock also visited Mr. Bennett's printers, threatening them with arrest if they continued printing THE TRUTH SEEKER. He also asked the American News Company to stop selling it.

The connection of Mr. Ingersoll with this petition is soon explained. Mr. Ingersoll knew of Comstock's attempts to suppress heresy by means of this law, and when called upon by the Washington committee in charge of the petition, he allowed his name to go on the petition for modification, but he told them distinctly and plainly that he was not in favor of the repeal of the law, as he was willing and anxious that obscenity should be suppressed by all legal means. His sentiments are best expressed by himself in a letter to the Boston Journal. He says:

WASHINGTON, March 18, 1878.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE BOSTON JOURNAL: My attention has been called to the following article that recently appeared in your paper:

"Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and others, feel aggrieved because Congress, in 1873, enacted a law for the suppression of obscene literature, and, believing it an infringement of the rights of certain citizens, and an effort to muzzle the press and conscience, petition for its repeal. When a man's conscience permits him to spread broadcast obscene literature, it is time that conscience was muzzled. The law is a terror only to evil-doers."

No one wishes the repeal of any law for the suppression of obscene literature. For my part, I wish all such laws rigidly enforced. The only objection that I hav to the law of 1873 is, that it has been construed to include books and pamphlets written against the religion of the day, although containing nothing that can be called obscene or impure. Certain religious fanatics, taking advantage of the word "immoral" in the law, hav claimed that all writings against what they are pleased to call orthodox religion are immoral, and such books hav been seized and their authors arrested. To this, and this only, I object.

Your article does me great injustice, and I ask that you will hav the kindness to publish this note.

From the bottom of my heart I despise the publishers of obscene literature. Below them there is no depth of filth. And I also despise those who, under the pretense of suppressing obscene literature, endeavor to prevent honest and pure men from writing and publishing honest and pure thoughts. Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is sufficiently easy of comprehension for even ministers, but of course they misrepresented and lied about the writer. From that day to this he has been accused of favoring the dissemination of obscene literature. That the Iowa Liberals may know just how infamous this is, we will giv a brief history of the repeal or modification movement.

In June, 1878, E. H. Heywood was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for mailing "Cupid's Yokes." In August a big indignation meeting was held in Boston to protest. The repeal of the law was demanded. On August 24th, Mr. Bennett, W. S. Bell, and Josephine Tilton were arrested at Watkins for selling the same book. These prosecutions never amoutned to much besides making trouble for the defendants. On October 26th the National Liberal League held its Congress in Syracuse. At this Congress the League left the matter of repeal or modification of the laws open, taking no action as an organization, either way, but elected officers known to be in favor of repeal. On December 10th, Mr. Bennett was again arrested for mailing the book, "Cupid's Yokes." The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER all know the result. Mr. Bennett was tried, and found guilty; he appealed; the conviction was affirmed, and he was sentenced to thirteen months' imprisonment at hard labor.

After the trial Colonel Ingersoll interposed, and endeavored to get a pardon for Mr. Bennett, who was held in Ludlow street jail pending Mr. Hayes's reply. The man who occupied the president's office promised to pardon the Infidel editor; then he went back on his word, and Mr. Bennett served his term of imprisonment.

Then preachers opened the sluiceways of vituperation and billingsgate upon Colonel Ingersoll for having interceded for a man convicted of mailing obscene literature, and the same charges that this Dubuque minister makes were circulated. The charges were as infamously false then as they are now, and to show it, it is only necessary to quote Colonel Ingersoll's words during the year or two succeeding, when the Freethinkers and the Christians were not only opposing each other vigorously, but the Freethinkers themselvs were divided on the question. In 1879, while Mr. Bennett was in prison, a correspondent of the Nashville, Tenn., Banner said that the National Liberal League and Colonel Ingersoll were in favor of disseminating obscene literature. To this Colonel Ingersoll replied in a letter to a friend:

1417 G ST., WASHINGTON, Aug. 21, 1879.

MY DEAR SIR: The article in the Nashville Banner by "J. L." is utterly and maliciously false.

A petition was sent to Congress praying for the repeal or modification of certain postal laws, to the end that the freedom of conscience and of the press should not be abridged.

Nobody holds in greater contempt than I the writers, publishers, or dealers in obscene literature. One of my objections to the Bible is that it contains hundreds of grossly obscene passages not fit to be read by any decent man; thousands of passages, in my judgment, calculated to corrupt the minds of youth. I hope the time will soon come when the good sense of the American people will demand a Bible with all obscene passages left out.

The only reason a modification of the postal laws is necessary is that at present, under color of those laws, books and pamphlets are excluded from the mails simply because they are considered heterodox and blasphemous. In other words, every man should be allowed to write, publish, and send through the mails his thoughts upon any subject, expressed in a decent and becoming manner. As to the propriety of giving anybody authority to overhaul mails, break seals, and read private correspondence, that is another question.

Every minister and every layman who charges me with directly or indirectly favoring the dissemination of anything that is impure, retails what he knows to be a willful and malicious lie. I remain, Yours truly, R. G. INGERSOLL.

Three weeks after this letter was written the National Liberal League held its third annual Congress at Cincinnati. Colonel Ingersoll was chairman of the committee on resolutions and platform and unfinished business of the League. One of the subjects to be dealt with was these Comstock's laws. The following are Colonel Ingersoll's remarks and the resolutions he presented:

It may be proper, before presenting the resolutions of the committee, to say a word in explanation. The committee were charged with the consideration of the unfinished business of the League. It seems that at Syracuse there was a division as to what course should be taken in regard to the postal laws of the United States. These laws were used as an engin of oppression against the free circulation of what we understand to be scientific literature. Every honest man in this country is in favor of allowing every other human being every right that he claims for himself. The majority at Syracuse were at that time simply in favor of the absolute repeal of those laws, believing them to be unconstitutional—not because they were in favor of anything obscene, but because they were opposed to the mails of the United States being under the espionage and bigotry of the church. They therefore demanded an absolute repeal of the law. Others feeling that they might be misunderstood, and knowing that theology can coin the meanest words to act as the vehicle of the lowest lies, they were afraid of being misunderstood, and therefore they said, Let us amend these laws so that our literature shall be upon an equality with that of theology. I know that there is not a Liberal here, nor in the United States, that is in favor of the dissemination of obscene literature. [Cheers.] One of the objections which we hav to the book said to be written by God is that it is obscene. [Cheers, yells, and cheers]

The Liberals of this country believe in purity, and they believe that every fact in nature and in science is as pure as a star. We do not need to ask for any more than we want. We simply want the laws of our country so framed that we are not discriminated against. So, taking that view of the vexed question, we wanted to put the boot upon the other foot. We want to put the charge of obscenity where it belongs, and the committee, of which I hav the honor to be one of the members, hav endeavored to do just that thing. [Cheers.] Men hav no right to talk to me about obscenity who regard the story of Lot and his daughters as a fit thing for men, women, and children to read, and who worship a God in whom the violation of [Cheers drowned the conclusion of this sentence so the reporters could not hear it.] Such a God I hold in infinit contempt. [Redoubled cheers.]

Now I will read you the resolutions recommended by the committee.

RESOLUTIONS.

Your committee hav the honor to submit the following report:

First, As to the unfinished business of the League, your committee submits the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we are in favor of such postal laws as will allow the free transportation through the mails of the United States of all books, pamphlets, and papers, irrespectiv of the religious, irreligious, political, and scientific views they may contain, so that the literature of science may be placed upon an equality with that of superstition.

Resolved, That we are utterly opposed to the dissemination, through the mails or by any other means, of obscene literature, whether "inspired" or uninspired, and hold in measureless contempt its authors and disseminators.

Resolved, That we call upon the Christian world to expunge from the so-called "sacred" Bible every passage that cannot be read without covering the cheek of modesty with the blush of shame; and until such passages are expunged, we demand that the laws against the dissemination of obscene literature be impartially enforced.

During the reading of these resolutions, when he came to the words "obscene literature," Colonel Ingersoll said, "I thank them for that word; we will see who the obscenists are." The Congress also resolved:

That we express the deepest sympathy with D. M. Bennett and his family, for the reason that he has been convicted by religious bigotry and ignorant zeal, and has been imprisoned and is now languishing in the cell of a felon, when in truth and fact he committed no offense whatever against any law of the land.

This ought to hav stopped the ministerial ghouls like this Dubuque Brown, but it did not, for the reason that they did not take the trouble to inform themselvs of the position held by Colonel Ingersoll on the question. Neither did the critics in the Liberal ranks cease their caviling at the League. The discussion over the Comstock laws went on with vigor and acrimony, and the writer of these lines was as acrimonious as anybody else. We believed then, as we believe now, that the Comstock laws are unconstitutional, and should be repealed. We do not believe that Congress has power to legislate on the morality of mailable matter. We believe that the language of the House committee on post-offices of the present Congress in dealing with the bill to exclude newspapers containing lottery advertisments applies to the Comstock laws. The committee says:

In the opinion of the committee the legislation proposed by these bills violates the spirit, if not the letter, of the article of the Constitution which declares that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of the press. If Congress may exclude from the mails a newspaper or a periodical which contains an advertisment of a lottery, it mav make non-mailable all newspapers and periodicals in which are printed advertisments, news reports, or editorials which in its judgment the people should not read. In other words, it may declare what shall and what shall not be printed in every newspaper and periodical in the country which is circulated wholly or in part through the mails.

Another objection to this legislation is that it establishes a censorship of the press. Surely no one will maintain that Congress, if it should pass laws to effect that purpose, would not violate the provision of the Constitution which was intended to protect the liberty of the press. And yet that is what one of these bills, viz., No. 3 320, does. It clothes the postmaster-general with authority to determin what printed matter in any newspaper or periodical is an advertisment of a lottery, making him in that respect a censor of the press. The inevitable result of such legislation is the establishment of a precedent which may be considered in the future an authority for the creation of a censor of the press in all respects.

We believe that lotteries and obscenity should be dealt with by state and municipal legislation, and offenders punished in the county in which they commit their offense. So in those days we argued for the repeal of the Comstock laws, as did dozens of others—James Parton, Elizur Wright, O. B. Frothingham, T. C. Leland, Courtlandt Palmer, and many more whose names we do not recall. But Colonel Ingersoll did not, and when the National Liberal League met the next year at Chicago (Sept. 17, 1880), he was opposed to the League's making a pledge to defend every case under the Comstock laws, and he was opposed to a resolution demanding a repeal of those laws. The following is what Colonel Ingersoll said upon the subject:

Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer the following resolution in place and instead of resolutions numbered 5 and 6:

Resolved, That the committee of defense, whenever a person has been indicted for what he claims to hav been an honest exercise of the freedom of thought and expression, shall investigate the case, and if it appears that such person has been guilty of no offense, then it shall be the duty of said committee to defend such person if he is unable to defend himself.

Now allow me one moment to state my reasons. I do not, I hav not, I never shall, accuse or suspect a solitary member of the Liberal League of the United States of being in favor of doing any act under heaven that he is not thoroughly convinced is right. We all claim freedom of speech, and it is the gem of the human soul. We all claim a right to express our honest thoughts. Did it ever occur to any Liberal that he wished to express any thought honestly, truly, and legally he considered immoral? How does it happen that we hav any interest in what is known as immoral literature? I deny that the League has any interest in that kind of literature. Whenever we mention it, whenever we speak of it, we put ourselvs in a false position. What do we want? We want to see to it that the church party shall not smother the literature of Liberalism. We want to see to it that the viper of intellectual slavery shall not sting our cause. We want it so that every honest man, so that every honest woman, can express his or her honest thought upon any subject in the world. And the question, and the only question, as to whether they are amenable to the law, in my mind, is. Were they honest? Was their effort to benefit mankind? Was that their intention? And no man, no woman, should be convicted of any offense that that man or woman did not intend to commit. Now then, suppose some person is arrested, and it is claimed that a work written by him is immoral, is illegal. Then, I say, let our Committee of Defense examin that case, and if our enemies are seeking to trample out Freethought under the name of immorality, and under the cover and shield of our criminal law, then let us defend that man to the last dollar we hav. But we do not wish to put ourselvs in the position of general defenders of all the slush that may be written in this or any other country. You cannot afford to do it. You cannot afford to put into the mouth of theology a perpetual and continual slur. You cannot afford to do it. And this meeting is not the time to go into the question of what authority the United States may hav over the mails. It is a very wide question. It embraces many others. Has the government a right to say what shall go into the mails? Why, in one sense, assuredly. Certainly they hav a right to say that you shall not send a horse and wagon by mail. They hav a right to fix some limit; and the only thing that we want is that the literature of liberty, the literature of real Freethought, shall not be discriminated against. And we know now as well as if it had been perfectly and absolutely demonstrated, that the literature of Freethought will be absolutely pure. We know it. We call upon the Christian world to expunge obscenity from their book, and until that is expunged we demand that the laws against obscene literature shall be executed. And how can we, in the next resolution, say those laws ought all to be repealed? We cannot do that. I hav always been in favor of such an amendment of the law that by no trick, by no device, by no judicial discretion, an honest, high, pure-minded man should be subjected to punishment simply for giving his best and his honest thought. What more do we need? What more can we ask? I am as as much opposed as my friend Mr. Wakeman can be to the assumption of the church that it is the guardian of morality. If our morality is to be guarded by that sentiment alone, then is the end come. The natural instinct of self-defense in mankind and in all organized society is the fortress of the morality in mankind. The church itself was at one time the outgrowth of that same feeling, but now the feeling has outgrown the church. Now, then, we will hav a Committee of Defense. That committee will examin every case. Suppose some man has been indicted, and suppose he is guilty. Suppose he has endeavored to soil the human mind. Suppose he has been willing to make money by pandering to the lowest passions in the human breast. What will that committee do with him then? We will say, "Go on; let the law take its course." [Applause.] But if, upon reading his book, we find that he is all wrong, horribly wrong, idiotically wrong, but make up our minds that he was honest in his error, I will giv as much as any other living man of my means to defend that man. And I believe you will all bear me witness when I say that I hav the cause of intellectual liberty at heart as much as I am capable of having anything at heart. And I know hundreds of others here just the same. I understand that. I understand their motiv. I believe it to be perfectly good, but I truly and honestly think they are mistaken. If we hav an interest in the business, I would fight for it. If our cause was assailed by law, then I say fight; and our cause is assailed, and I say fight. They will not allow me, in many states of this Union, to testify. I say fight until every one of those laws is repealed. They discriminate against a man simply because he is honest. Repeal such laws. The church, if it had the power to-day, would trample out every particle of free literature in this land. And when they endeavor to do that, I say fight. But there is a distinction wide as the Mississippi—yes, wider than the Atlantic, wider than all the oceans—between the literature of immorality and the literature of Freethought. One is a crawling, slimy lizard, and the other an angel with wings of light. Now, let us draw this distinction, let us understand ourselvs, and do not giv to the common enemy a word covered with mire, a word stained with cloaca, to throw at us. We thought we had settled that question a year ago. We buried it then, and I say let it rot.

This question is of great importance. It is the most important one we hav here. I hav fought this question; I am ever going to, and I will not allow anybody to put a stain upon me. This question must be understood if it takes all summer. Here is a case in point. Some lady has written a work which, I am informed, is a good work, and that has nothing wrong about it. Her opinions may be foolish or wise. Let this committee examin that case. If they find that she is a good woman, that she had good intentions, no matter how terrible the work may be, if her intentions are good, she has committed no crime. I want the honest thought. I think I hav always been in favor of it. But we havn't the time to go into all these questions.

Then comes the question for this house to decide in a moment whether these cases should hav been tried in the state or federal court. I want it understood that I hav confidence in the federal courts of the nation. There may be some bad judges, there may be some idiotic jurors. I think there was in that case [of Mr. Bennett]. But the Committee of Defense, if I understand it, supplied means for the defense of that man. They did, but are we ready now to decide in a moment what courts shall hav jurisdiction? Are we ready to say that the federal courts shall be denied jurisdiction in any case arising about the mails? Suppose somebody robs the mail. Before whom shall we try the robber? Try him before a federal judge? Why? Because he has violated a federal law. We hav not any time for such an investigation as this. What we want to do is to defend free speech everywhere. What we want to do is to defend the expression of thought in papers, in pamphlets, in books. What we want to do is to see to it that these books, papers, and pamphlets are on an equality with all other books, papers, and pamphlets in the United States mails. And then the next step we want to take, if any man is indicted under the pretense that he is publishing immoral books, is to hav our Committee of Defense well examin the case; and if we believe the man to be innocent we will help defend him if he is unable to defend himself; and if we find that the law is wrong in that particular, we will go for the amendment of that law. I beg of you to hav some sense in this matter. We must hav it. If we don't, upon that rock we will split—upon that rock we will again divide. Let us not do it. The cause of intellectual liberty is the highest to the human mind. Let us stand by it, and we can help all these people by this resolution. We can do justice everywhere with it, while if we agree to the fifth and sixth resolutions that hav been offered I say we lay ourselvs open to the charge, and it will be hurled against us, no matter how unjustly, that we are in favor of widespread immorality.

Mr. Clarke: We are not afraid of it.

Colonel Ingersoll: You may say we are not afraid. I am not afraid. He only is a fool who rushes into unnecessary danger.

Mr. Clarke: What are you talking about, anyway?

Colonel Ingersoll: I am talking with endeavor to put a little sense into such men as you. [Applause and laughter.] Your very question shows that it was necessary that I should talk. [Applause.] And now I move that my resolution be adopted.

Mr. Wakeman moved that it be added to that portion of the sixth resolution which recommended the constitution of the Committee of Defense.

Colonel Ingersoll: I cannot agree to the sixth resolution. I think nearly every word of it is wrong in principle. I think it binds us to a course of action that we will not be willing to follow; and my resolution covers every possible case. My resolution binds us to defend every honest man in the exercise of his right. I can't be bound to say that the government hasn't control of its morals—that we cannot trust the federal courts—that, under any circumstances, at any time, I am bound to defend, either by word or money, any man who violates the laws of this country.

Mr. Wakeman: We do not say that.

Colonel Ingersoll: I beg of you, I beseech you, not to pass the sixth resolution. If you do, I wouldn't giv that [snapping his fingers] for the platform. A part of the Comstock law authorizes the vilest possible trick. We are all opposed to that.

Mr. Leland: What is the question?

Colonel Ingersoll: Don't let us be silly. Don't let us say we are opposed to what we are not opposed to. If any man here is opposed to putting down the vilest of all possible trash he ought to go home. We are opposed to only a part of the law—opposed to it whenever they endeavor to trample Freethought under foot in the name of immorality. [Applause.]

Afterward, at the same session of the Congress, the following colloquy took place between Colonel Ingersoll and T. B. Wakeman:

Colonel Ingersoll: You know as well as I that there are certain books not fit to go through the mails—books and pictures not fit to be delivered.

Mr. Wakeman: That is so.

Colonel Ingersoll: There is not a man here but what is in favor, when those books and pictures come into the control of the United States, of burning them up when they are manifestly obscene. You don't want any grand jury there.

Mr. Wakeman: Yes, we do.

Colonel Ingersoll: No, we don't. When they are manifestly obscene, burn them up.

A delegate: Who is to be judge of that?

Colonel Ingersoll: There are books that nobody differs about. There are certain things about which we can use discretion. If that discretion is abused, a man has his remedy. We stand for the free thought of this country. We stand for the progressiv spirit of the United States. We can't afford to say that all these laws should be repealed. If we had time to investigate them we could say in what they should be amended. Don't tie us to this nonsense—to the idea that we hav an interest in immoral literature. Let us remember that Mr. Wakeman is sore. He had a case before the federal courts, and he imagins, having lost that case, you cannot depend on them. I hav lost hundreds of cases. I hav as much confidence in the federal courts as in the state courts. I am not to be a party to throwing a slur upon the federal judiciary. All we want is fair play. We want the same chance for our doctrins that others hav for theirs. And how this infernal question of obscenity ever got into the Liberal League I could never understand. If an innocent man is convicted of larceny, should we repeal all the laws on the subject? I don't pretend to be better than other people. It is easy to talk right—so easy to be right that I never care to hav the luxury of being wrong. I am advocating something that we can stand upon. I do not misunderstand Mr. Wakeman's motivs. I believe they are perfectly good—that he is thoroughly honest. Why not just say we will stand by freedom of thought and its expression? Why not say that we are in favor of amending any law that is wrong? But do not make the wholesale statement that all these laws ought to be repealed. They ought not to be repealed. Some of them are good. The law against sending instruments of vice in the mails is good, as is the law against sending obscene books and pictures, and the law against letting ignorant hyenas pray upon sick people, and the law which prevents the getters-up of bogus lotteries sending their letters through the mail.

At the evening session of the Congress, on the same day, Mr. Ingersoll made this speech in opposition to the resolution demanding the repeal of the Comstock laws:

I am not in favor of the repeal of those laws. I hav never been, and I never expect to be. But I do wish that every law providing for the punishment of a criminal offense should distinctly define the offense. That is the objection to this law, that it does not define the offense, so that an American citizen can readily know when he is about to violate it, and consequently the law ought in all probability to be modified in that regard. I am in favor of every law defining with perfect distinctness the offense to be punished, but I cannot, I hav the cause of Freethought too much at heart, to say by wholesale these laws should be repealed. Neither will I consent to the repeal simply because the church is in favor of those laws. In so far as the church agrees with me, I congratulate the church. In so far as superstition is willing to help me, good! I am willing to accept it. I believe, also, that this League is upon a secular basis, and there should be nothing in our platform that would prevent any Christian from acting with us. What is our platform? And we ought to leave it as it is. It needs no amendment. Our platform is for a secular government. Is it improper in a secular government to endeavor to prevent the spread of obscene literature? It is the business of a secular government to do it, but if that government attempts to stamp out Freethought in the name of obscenity, it is then for the friends of Freethought to call for a definition of the word, and such a definition as will allow Freethought to go everywhere through all the mails of the United States. We are also in favor of secular schools. Good. We are in favor of doing away with every law that discriminates against a man on account of his belief. Good. We are in favor of universal education. Good. We are in favor of the taxation of church property. Good—because the experience of the world shows that where you allow superstition to own property without taxing it, it will absorb the net profits. Is it time now that we should throw into the scale, against all these splendid purposes, an effort to repeal some postal laws against obscenity? As well might we turn the League into an engin to do away with all laws against the sale of stale eggs. What hav we to do with those things? Is it possible that Freethought can be charged with being obscene? Is it possible that, if the charge is made, it can be substantiated? Can you not attack any superstition in the world in perfectly pure language? Can you not attack anything you please in perfectly pure language? And where a man intends right, no law should find him guilty; and if the law is weak in that respect, let it be modified. But I say to you that I cannot go with any body of men who demand the unconditional repeal of these laws. [Cheers.] I believe in liberty as much as any man who breathes. I will do as much, according to my ability, as any other man to make this an absolutely free and secular government. I will do as much as any other man of my strength and of my intellectual power to giv every human being every right that I claim for myself. But this obscene law business is a stumbling-block. Had it not been for this, instead of the few people voting here—less than one hundred—we would hav had a Congress numbered by thousands. Had it not been for this business, the Liberal League of the United States would to-night hold in its hand the political destiny of the United States. Instead of that, we hav thrown away our power upon a question in which we are not interested. Instead of that, we hav wasted our resources and our brain for the repeal of a law that we don't want repealed. If we want anything, we simply want a modification. Now, then, don't stain this cause by such a course. And don't understand that I am pretending, or am insinuating, that anyone here is in favor of obscene literature. It is a question, not of principle, but of means, and I beg pardon of this Convention if I hav done anything so horrible as has been described by Mr. Pillsbury. I regret it if I hav ever endeavored to trample upon the rights of this Convention.

There is one thing I hav not done—I hav not endeavored to cast five votes when I didn't hav a solitary vote. Let us be fair; let us be fair. I hav simply given my vote. I wish to trample upon the rights of no one; and when Mr. Pillsbury gave those votes he supposed he had a right to giv them; and if he had a right, the votes would hav been counted. I attribute nothing wrong to him, but I say this: I hav the right to make a motion in this Congress, I hav the right to argue that motion, but I hav no more rights than any other member, and I claim none. But I want to say to you—and I want you to know it and feel it—that I want to act with every Liberal man and woman in this world. I want you to know it and feel it that I want to do everything I can to get every one of these statutes off our books that discriminates against a man because of his religious belief—that I am in favor of a secular government, and of all these rights. But I cannot, and I will not, operate with any organization that asks for the unconditional repeal of those laws. I will stand alone, and I hav stood alone. I can tell my thoughts to my countrymen, and I shall do it, and whatever position you take, whether I am with you or not, you will find me battling everywhere for the absolute freedom of the human mind. You will find me battling everywhere to make this world better and grander; and whatever my personal conduct may be, I shall endeavor to keep my theories right. I beg of you, I implore you, do not pass the resolution No. 6. It is not for our interest; it will do us no good. It will lose us hosts of honest, splendid friends. Do not do it; it will be a mistake; and the only reason I offered the motion was to giv the members time to think this over. I am not pretending to know more than other people. I am perfectly willing to say that in many things I know less. But upon this subject I want you to think. No matter whether you are afraid of your sons, your daughters, your wives, or your husbands, that isn't it—I don't want the splendid prospects of this League put in jeopardy upon such an issue as this. I hav no more to say. But if that resolution is passed, all I hav to say is that, while I shall be for liberty everywhere, I cannot act with this organization, and I will not.

The resolution was finally adopted, and Colonel Ingersoll resigned his office of vice-president in the League, and never acted with it again until the League dropped all side issues, and came back to first principles—the enforcement of the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

A Fable.

A donkey, who had long been remarked for exceptional dulness in the debating society discussions held nightly by his fellow-quadrupeds in their stable, one night, as they commenced their usual canvassing of human affairs, astonished all by a display of brilliancy and information without parallel. And it came to pass that he took his stand in the midst of them that were learned, both hearing them, and asking them questions. And all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and his answers. Whether asked as to the public history of his country for the last year, as to its future prospects, its legislativ problems, or the progress of its enlightened institutions; whether questioned as to national movements abroad, or involved in abstruse inquiries into the spiritual conceptions of their masters, and into their scriptures, his answers still displayed the same inexhaustible knowledge and wisdom. Yet, how soon the downfall of pretenders! for but a few days had passed when an observing ox pulled forth from its position at the bottom of the donkey's manger, where it had been so adjusted as to allow its owner to read off it while pretending to discourse and look around, a copy of the 1888 FREETHINKERS' ALMANAC—opened at "How the Layman is Deceived," and well hoofed at those valuable articles: "Freethought in the United States, 1887;" "Deism and Atheism," "The American Secular Union," "The International Freethought Congress," "Sunday Amusements," and "When Did Jehoshaphat Die?"

MORAL: (1) There is hope even for donkeys in the 1888 ANNUAL; therefore (2), get it and show it to your Methodist neighbors.

Religious Legislation.

On the 26th of March the Senate committee on territories heard the Rev. M. W. Montgomery, representing the Home Missionary Society of the Congregational church, in opposition to the admission of Utah, and in favor of legislation to suppress the religion of the Latter Day Saints as fraudulent! Mr. Montgomery said (as reported by the daily press) that the eleven million Protestants and six million Roman Catholics of the country are a unit in condemnation of Mormonism. They asked that Congress shall break the delusions under which the Mormon people liv—the delusion that their church is stronger than the United States government—that Christ will himself appear on earth and work a victory in their behalf. He assured the committee that Congress could not legislate intelligently upon this question until it adopted as one of its fundamental principles that Mormonism is a lie and a fraud.

The Protestant church is becoming bold—very bold. But a few years ago, the reason given by Christians for desiring to exterminate Mormonism was solely that polygamy is immoral. Now the desire of the church is to crush the Christianity of Utah because "Mormonism is a lie and a fraud." That is to say, Congress is importuned to stamp out in the territories (for laws on this matter must be general, and general laws will apply to all territories and the District of Columbia) all religions which are untrue. This opens an immense field and givs the United States government a great chance.

Accepting the proposition that the tenets of Mormonism are "a lie and a fraud"—a proposition absolutely impregnable—Congress must then suppress by legislation all sects holding the same beliefs. And to know just what sects will be squelched, it is necessary only to compare the doctrins of the Mormons with the doctrins of other Christian people. Let us see.

1. The Mormons accept the Bible—Old and New Testament. So do all other Christians in the world.

2. The Mormons hav a supplementary revelation. So hav the Shakers, the Adventists, and many other Christian sects besides the Mormons.

3. The Mormons believe in the gift of prophecy. So do all Christians.

4. The Mormons believe in miracles. But where are the other Christians who deny them?

5. The Mormons believe in the near approach of the end of the world. What about the Adventists? And if the Presbyterian Confession of Faith is right in saying that Christ keeps the day of judgment unknown to men that they may be always watchful, and may be ever prepared to say, 'Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly,' are not the Mormons but asserting what all other sects hope for? It would certainly seem so.

6. The Mormons believe in their own identity with the saints who shall reign with Christ.

"Wherefore they [the predestined elect] be made sons of God by adoption; they be made like the image of his only begotten son Jesus Christ: they walk religiously in good works, and at length, by God's mercy, they attain to everlasting felicity."—Art. XVII of the Thirty-Nine Articles.

"All saints that are united to Jesus Christ, their head, by his spirit and by faith, hav fellowship with him in his graces, sufferings, death, resurrection, and glory. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified, and saved, but the elect only."—Presbyterian Confession of Faith.

7. The Mormons believe in the literal resurrection of the body.

"I believe in God, the father almightv, maker of heaven and earth: and in Jesus Christ, his only son, our Lord; who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary; suffered under Pontius Pilate, was crucified, dead, and buried; the third dav he rose from the dead; he ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of God the father almighty; from thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. I believe in the Holy Ghost; the holy Catholic church, the communion of saints; the forgivness of sins: the resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting."—Apostles' Creed, held authoritativ by all orthodox churches.

"Christ did truly rise again from death, and took again his body, with flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature; wherewith he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth, until he return to judge all men at the last day."—Art. IV of Thirty-Nine Articles.

"Christ did truly rise again from the dead, and took again his body, with all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, wherewith he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth until he return to judge all men at the last dav."—Third Article of Religion of the Methodist Episcopal church.

"At the last day, such as are found alive shall not die, but be changed: and all the dead shall be raised up with the self-same bodies, and none other."—Presbyterian Confession of Faith.

8. The Mormons believe that salvation can be secured only by a belief in Christ's atonement.

"For holy scripture doth set out unto us only the name of Jesus Christ, whereby men must be saved. . . . The offering of Christ once made [upon the cross] is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction, for all the sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin, but that alone."—Thirty-Nine Articles.

"They who, never having heard the gospel, know not Jesus Christ, and believe not in him, cannot be saved, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature, or the laws of that religion which they profess; neither is there salvation in anv other, but in Christ alone, who is the savior only of his body the church."—Presbyterian Larger Catechism.

"The offering of Christ once made [upon the cross] is that perfect redemption, propitiation, and satisfaction for all sins of the whole world, both original and actual; and there is none other satisfaction for sin but that alone."—Article XX of the Methodist church.

9. The Mormons also hold repentance necessary to salvation. We find this also in the creed of every other Christian church.

"Although repentance be not to be rested in as any satisfaction for sin, or any cause of the pardon thereof, which is the act of God's free grace in Christ, yet is it of such necessitv to all sinners, that none may expect pardon without it."—Confession of Faith.

"The grant of repentance is not to be denied to such as fall into sin after baptism."—Article XII of Methodist church, taken from XVI of Thirty-Nine Articles.

10. Mormon theology maintains also that baptism must be by a Christ-appointed apostle, but in this it has the support of all churches. What to any other Christian is a baptism by an unordained person? Baptism is one of the two Protestant sacraments; the ordination of the person performing it is compulsory, and the churches pretend to trace the authoritativ lineage of their preachers back to Christ. And though the minister himself be an unworthy person, "yet forasmuch as they do not the same in their own name, but in Christ's, and do minister by his commission and authority," the baptism is valid. It is the common doctrin of all the churches.

There are many other minor doctrins held by the Mormons which owe their origin to the older form of Christianity, and there are some divergences, but none more radical than between other different sects. The Mormons do not believe in infant baptism, but for this they hav illustrious authority. They immerse their candidates, while most sects sprinkle them; but the Mormons are not isolated in their form. If we mistake not, there are Baptists and Baptists in the world. So if Mr. Montgomery shall obtain the consent of Congress to suppress all religious doctrins which are a lie and a fraud, he will find that he can by no means confine his persecution to the Latter Day Saints. If their doctrins are a lie and a fraud—which we cheerfully admit—so are all the doctrins of all the Christian churches.

A Reverend's Falsehoods.

We print on another page a condensed history of the efforts made a few years ago for the repeal or modification of the Comstock laws. We do it at this time for the benefit of the Liberal cause in Iowa, where a certain Charles O. Brown, Congregationalist, of Dubuque, has been earning an immortality of infamy by attacking the reputation of Colonel Ingersoll, and through him every Liberal in the country. Mr. Brown is perhaps the most prominent preacher in the state, which fact has given his words wide circulation through the Iowa press. He has also published his sermon in pamphlet form and scattered it broadcast. The Freethinkers of Dubuque and vicinity hav replied, but not being in possession of all the exact facts concerning the matter, hav applied to us. Mr. Brown appeals, also, through the Dubuque Daily Times, for funds to spread his sermon, which, with an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, occupies seven columns of that paper. In the Times and other papers the controversy occupies many columns, and has stirred up the heretics of the vicinity to mighty wrath.

Mr. Brown's general charge—we quote from his open letter—is that Colonel Ingersoll "attempted to flood the country with filth." His particular charges are that Colonel Ingersoll (1) signed a petition for the repeal of the Comstock law; (2) that he addressed a Senate committee in favor of the repeal; (3) that Colonel Ingersoll pursued this matter month after month, and then "met his defeat by calling everyone a liar who said he had ever had anything to do with it." Mr. Brown further says that D. M. Bennett was one of those "vile scoundrels who pander to the worst passions, destroyers of childhood, purity, and domestic virtues." He says Mr. Bennett "was imprisoned for unmixed obscenity and moral filth," and that F. E. Abbot, "himself a Liberal!" pronounced the book obscene. These points are all elaborated with malicious untruthfulness, and quotations false in facts and dishonest in sentiment are made from the papers hostil to Liberalism. Then Mr. C. O. Brown wiggles his ears and brays: Behold Me, the man who has put Ingersoll down, and shown Infidelity to be only a desire to spread obscenity.

These assertions about Mr Ingersoll are all shown in the article on another page to be false—infamously false—except the one that he addressed a Senate committee on the repeal of the law. As that assertion is absolutely untrue, of course nothing on the subject could appear in the history of the repeal or modification movement. Mr. Ingersoll was asked to make such an address, but declined for reasons satisfactory to himself. And if, after reading the history of the matter, and what Colonel Ingersoll said and wrote at the time, Mr. Brown still circulates his pamphlet and reiterates his charges, he should be kicked from the society of decent men.

The language used by Mr. Brown of D. M. Bennett is also infamously false. Mr. Bennett was imprisoned for mailing a book called "Cupid's Yokes." Mr. Bennett neither wrote nor published the book, and up to the time of his arrest at Watkins he had not read it. His arrest at that place was compassed in a mean, sly, sneaking manner. He and others had books for sale at the Freethought Convention held there. But he did not hav "Cupid's Yokes." Miss Josephine Tilton was selling it, and her stand for displaying her literature adjoined the stand of Mr. Bennett. One day while she was at lunch, some members of the Young Men's Christian Association (who had been written to by Comstock) asked Mr. Bennett for a copy of the book. He did not hav it on his own stand, but, to oblige the purchaser, went over to Miss Tilton's stand, got a book, put the money for it on her table, and gave the book to the Y. M. C. A. young man. For that he was arrested, which so outraged his sense of justice and right that he announced that he would sell the book at any cost, and see if the church ran this country exclusivly. He did so, with the result known.

In regard to the book: Among decent people there is no question as to its character. It is not obscene. And even Mr. Bennett's enemies said so. Mr. F. E. Abbott, who hated Mr. Bennett with all the venom engendered by envy and spite, said of it:

It is "not of a character to be justly interfered with by law" (Index, May 23, 1878, page 247).

Mr. Abbott also defended Mr. Bennett from the charge of obscenity for selling the book. Mr. Abbot was also "in favor of such radical changes in the existing law as should render it impossible to prosecute any but the vile wretches who make it their sole business to pollute and destroy." (See Index, Jan. 17, 1878, page 30.) Mr. Abbott knew and admitted, as did everyone who knew anything at all upon the subject, that the book was not obscene, but was used by Comstock to destroy Freethinkers who believed in free discussion of physiological as well as theological subjects. And not only were Freethinkers persecuted under this law, but publishers of other legitimate works as well. Some of the standard classical literature of the world has been prohibited by the intolerant Christians who run Comstock's society. The "Arabian Nights," the "Heptameron" and "Decameron," Rabelais, Walt Whitman's works, are some that we recollect. The law can refuse the privileges of the mail to dozens of noble books. Shakspere, according to the definition of the courts, is obscene. The Bible, according to any definition, is obscene, and were it not that it is the fetich of the Protestant church, Comstock would hav suppressed it long ago. Medical books hav been suppressed under this law—good, standard, technical medical works—written in the interest of humanity, and for student's use, not clap-trap works built to scare the ignorant out of their money. And it is because of this abuse, as well as its unconstitutionality, that we want the law repealed. And we shall work for that until it is accomplished, or obscenity so defined that no pure work can be touched by the law. But we are free to say that in repealing this law, no aid is expected from Colonel Ingersoll.

And in commenting upon Mr. Heywood's conviction for selling "Cupid's Yokes," Mr. Abbott said:

"The case of Mr. E. H. Heywood, indicted for sending 'obscene' publications through the mails, was tried before the United States circuit court in this city last Thursday and Friday. The verdict of the jury is not known to us at this writing. But Judge Clark's charge to the jury, defining what an 'obscene book' is, and laying down the law on the subject, is (at least as reported in the Advertiser) an outrage upon common sense and the freedom of the press: 'A book is obscene that is offensiv to decency. A book to be obscene need not be obscene throughout the whole; whole or in part comes within the meaning of the law. A book is said to be obscene which excites impure or lewd thoughts, or [is] of immoral tendency. A book is obscene that would incite the practice of impure desires, or is unbecoming, unfit to be seen; a book that in its general scope or tendencies, in its pictures or reading matter, in whole or in part, comes under the prohibition of the law.' The whole case turned on the definition of obscenity which was to be made the basis of interpreting the law; and the judge should hav been made to realize the enormous responsibility he assumed in establishing one judicially. By the definition he adopted, to send through the mails a copy of the Bible, or of unnumbered works of the highest value to mankind, will be made an indictable offense. Thus interpreted, the law can never stand; it ought to be, and it will be, totally swept away, just as soon as the people understand its scope and threatening character. Mr. Heywood ought to hav been acquitted by the jury without leaving their seats; his publications are not obscene in the narrow and jealously-restricted sense that should alone be legally recognized; he ought to be discharged as much as Mr. Bennett. If the only choice is to lie between the law as Judge Clark expounds it, and the repeal of all legislation on the subject, we certainly favor the latter; and Judge Clark has struck an infinitly heavier blow at all such legislation than would be struck by a million signatures to the Bennett petition. He has succeeded in putting the law in the wrong before the sober judgment of the best friends of purity; he has made it an instrument of infamous oppression; he has done his best to make Mr. Heywood a martyr; and the reaction against his decision, whether Mr. Heywood is or is not convicted, will be tremendous."

Judge Clark's definition of obscenity is the same as Judge Benedict's—the same as all the legal definitions—and comes to us from England. It was first given one or two hundred years ago, and has been followed ever since. It was because of this definition, and the fact that the law could be and was being used to do injustice, that its repeal was desired.

R. B. Hayes, then occupying the presidential chair, said the book was not obscene. He pardoned Heywood for selling it. Charles Devens, attorney-general of the United States, said of the book: "I do not confound it with those obscene publications the effect and object of which is to excite the imagination and inflame the passions." Alfred A. Valentine, one of the jurors who convicted Mr. Bennett, said afterward in the Herald that he did not regard the book as "obscene within the strict meaning of the statute." He voted for conviction because he "could not disobey the instructions of the judge," and "as a means to obtain a less sweeping construction of this statute upon appeal, or a change of it by those who made it. Had the jurors been left to construe and apply it, Mr. Bennett would never hav been convicted."

So we could go on and quote pages of testimony from individuals, and columns of press opinions, condemning the prosecution and conviction of Mr. Bennett. In the face of them, what must we think of C. O. Brown for saying that he "was imprisoned for unmixed obscenity and moral filth?" Mr. Bennett was one of the best, kindest, and sincerest of men. He was as honest a man as ever lived. His word was absolutely to be relied upon. He was outrageously used by Comstock and a lot of miserable people who were envious and jealous of him. His imprisonment was cruelty itself.

The facts that we hav given in this matter completely answer the Rev. C. O. Brown, and prove him to be a willful liar and slanderer. The petition upon which he bases his seven columns of falsehood asked for modification of the law (which Mr. Brown is too dishonest to show) as much as for the repeal, and that its modification is necessary is shown indisputably by the words and acts of Comstock, whose intention was to stamp out Freethought publishers, as he announced in his annual report, as he told the House committee and two senators, and as he publicly declared in Boston, Rochester, and St. Louis, and we know not how many other places. The fight Mr. Bennett made is the only thing that stopped him. When Mr. Bennett came out of prison he was greeted by three thousand friends, given a banquet, and sent to Europe at the expense of his admirers, and also around the world. Did the Rev. C. O. Brown ever receive such marks of esteem? And Comstock, when he saw this, concluded that stamping out Freethinkers involved too much trouble, and turned his attention to arresting the wicked men who wager money on the weight of hogs in country villages. The book for which Mr. Bennett suffered is being sold to-day by its author and publisher without let or hindrance from Comstock.

To put the Rev. Mr. Brown's lies down categorically, it is only necessary to say that what we hav shown is this:

We hav shown that D. M. Bennett was first arrested for selling one Antichristian and one scientific tract.

We hav shown that, this prosecution having failed, Comstock swore revenge.

We hav shown that the objectiv point of his attack upon Mr. Bennett was THE TRUTH SEEKER.

We hav shown that it is because the paper is a Freethought journal that Comstock desired to suppress it.

We hav shown that Comstock so officially said, on many occasions and to many people.

We hav shown that the repeal or modification of Comstock's law was necessary (and is now), because he desired its retention on the statute books in order to stamp out Freethought publications.

We hav shown that Mr. Ingersoll desired the modification of the law, for the reasons given, but not its repeal.

We hav shown that Mr. Abbot, Mr. Bennett's bitter enemy, and the man from whom Mr. Brown quotes, also desired the modification of the law.

We hav shown that Colonel Ingersoll vigorously opposed a resolution of the National Liberal League demanding the repeal of the law.

We hav shown that six weeks before the House committee reported adversely upon the petition, Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the Boston Journal that he did not desire the repeal of the law.

We hav shown that his opinion was the same the next year, and the year after; and we know it is the same to-day.

We hav shown that he never did desire the repeal of the law.

We hav shown that he never addressed a legislativ committee upon the subject.

We hav shown that Colonel Ingersoll detests obscenity, whether inspired or uninspired.

We hav shown that the National Liberal League (now the American Secular Union) despises obscenity, and denounces the Christians who vend it.

We hav shown that "Cupid's Yokes" is not obscene, and we hav shown that the jury which convicted Mr. Bennett would not hav done it had not the judge (before whom, Comstock once boasted, he never lost a case) constrained them.

We hav shown that Mr. Bennett was loved and honored by thousands of people; that his persecution was a martyrdom; that his enemies were actuated by malice.

And now to show what Colonel Ingersoll thinks of the Rev. Charles O. Brown, Congregational preacher of Dubuque, Iowa, we quote his letter to a friend of that city:

"NEW YORK, Jan. 10, 1888.

"My Dear Sir: I ought to hav answered your letter before, and I would hav done so, only that I hav been exceedingly busy. The statement of Rev. C. O. Brown with regard to my position as to the carrying of obscene matter through the mails is a malicious falsehood. In the first place, I never signed any petition of that kind. I hav no doubt but that I told somebody I was in favor of it, and some one put my name to a petition, but not of a character suggested by Rev. Mr. Brown. The petition was either that the law should be changed so as not to include Infidel books, or what is known as Liberal literature, or if such a change could not be made, that it be repealed. He further states that I went before a committee of the United States Senate and pleaded before the committee for the repeal of that law. This is an unqualified falsehood. Of course the Rev. C. O. Brown knows that I am as much opposed to obscenity as any man in the world. The Rev. C. O. Brown knows that one of my objections to the Bible is that many of its passages are obscene. The Rev. C. O. Brown knew when he made that statement that he was simply telling a lie. The Rev. C. O. Brown knows that he cannot answer my arguments. He knows that there is no possible way to get even with me but one, and that is by becoming a liar. Is it not wonderful that some men imagin that God really requires the services of a liar—that some men think that an infinit God is willing to reward some of his children for telling falsehoods in his behalf? Of course I should not hav thought of answering the Rev. C. O. Brown except for your letter. I hav no time for reply to the poor little reverend dogs who bark at me; but you are at liberty to state, and state publicly, that he was telling a falsehood.

"Yours very truly, R. G. INGERSOLL."

With these facts and that letter before him the Rev. C. O. Brown ought to feel cheap.

The Kind of Officials They Hav in Canada.

The following letter discovers some Canadian customs officials who are still Christians:

"GLENFORD, March 22, 1888.

"DEAR EDITOR: I received the pamphlet, 'Anti-Prohibition,' all right, but the two ANNUALS and Ingersoll's speech in the blasphemy suit I hav not got. Instead, the custom house sent me a postal card saying these works were there, upon which I sent an order for their delivery to a friend. The custom officers refused to let him hav them. I then went after them myself, when, lo and behold! I was told the books had been condemned by the custom inspector for obscenity, blasphemy, and immorality! I demanded the books, but was told they had been sent to Ottawa to the government inspector, and that I was liable to be fined two hundred dollars for importing such stuff.

"JOHN MCCLEMONT."

To know the kind of men these Canadian customs officials are it is only necessary to read the foregoing letter. The TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL contains considerable wit at the expense of an old book; it also reveals a few facts in the history of the book, and points out some untruths therein, but there is nothing obscene or immoral or blasphemous between its covers. This cannot truthfully be said of the book criticised. Ingersoll's speech in the blasphemy case is the greatest plea for liberty in the English language, and, of course, is pure. The condemnation of these books shows to what level Christianity will reduce the human mind.

THE World says: "An article is announced 'on the religious opinions of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll.' It ought to be short, for it is quite well known that the genial, witty, and eloquent colonel has no religious opinions—at least, none to speak of." That may be, but he has a lot of opinions on religion.

WE never had much more confidence in A. S. Barnes than in Comstock's society, as he was one of those mean Christians who would get much public credit for giving large sums to the church, and then reduce the salaries of his employees to meet the bill, but we hope Dr. Foote has diagnosed Mr. Barnes's disease correctly in the following paragraph in Foote's Health Monthly. "Mr. A. S. Barnes, the well-known publisher of educational and other works, recently died at an advanced age, leaving a considerable fortune. In his will he made numerous bequests to prominent charitable and religious societies, but the Society for the Suppression of Vice was not remembered. This must be considered a remarkable omission on his part in view of the fact that for many years he was one of the officers of the society. It would seem to indicate that he must hav lost confidence in its executiv officers, and began to doubt the genuinness of their motivs and the policy of their methods. His neglect to remember the Vice Society could hardly be the result of mere forgetfulness; it appears more like a practical vote on the part of Mr. Barnes of lack of confidence."

Letters from Friends.

Los Angeles, Cal., Feb. 26, 1888.

Mr. Editor: Through your valuable paper I should like to caution my fellow-wage-workers in the East to be careful about emigrating to southern California. The bosses sent word over the country last fall stating that mechanics were receiving from $5 to $6 per day here, when, in fact, journeymen carpenters received only from $3 to $4 per day. This winter we receive from $2 50 to $3 50 per day when we can find anything to do. As the building business has been very dull here this winter, many mechanics hav had nothing to do.

It is true we hav a very fine climate and a fertil soil, but there is not rain enough in this part of the state to produce good crops. There are many prayerful men and women here, but the rain-prayer has proved a failure in this part of the country, and many hav resorted to irrigating, with fair success. But the poor cannot well afford to buy water to irrigate with.

The cost of living is much higher here than in most other parts of the country, and poor men with families to support should not come to southern California. Lyman Smith.

Mr. Editor: I see by a letter in The Truth Seeker of February 11th that Converse Close wants to "call a halt" in regard to the Anarchy question. But were The Truth Seeker to do so and place itself in line with the capitalistic press, what would be the use of the paper? The great interest in The Truth Seeker is because we can hear all questions of interest from the different standpoints. Converse Close seems Liberal and reasonable, for the most part, but shows that reverence for courts that savors of much ignorance in regard to their proceedings.

Those, so far as I hav observed, who hav sympathized with the Anarchists on account of their not being supposed to hav had a fair trial, are of that class who investigate and weigh matters for themselvs, and decide in accordance with the evidence as they find it, and, in fact, do not regard judges, juries, or policemen as infallible any more than they do popes or priests, or more capable of judging than any intelligent looker-on or reader on the subject, especially as the latter is not subject to bribery or undue influence. On the other hand, those who hav upheld the verdict and denounced all who sympathized with the condemned hav given us reason to believe that they are ignorant of the whole subject, except as presented through the capitalistic or hireling press, in which the condemned were represented as most brutal murderers, and the impeached evidence of Gilmer and Thompson was given as truth to sustain the verdict. The fact that this class of writers accuse The Truth Seeker of a leaning toward Anarchy shows them not to be investigators, or even close observers of what they read, for The Truth Seeker has been very explicit in its views, and has used much argument against the principles held by Anarchists.

But those ill-Liberal non-investigators seem to think that The Truth Seeker can show opposition to Anarchy only by denouncing its advocates and approving of their hanging, whether they had a fair trial, in the opinion of its Editor, or not.

If The Truth Seeker were to close down on all unpopular subjects, or against the unpopular side, it would shut out all who turn to it to find expression for what they cannot through the popular and less independent press, and leave space only for those who, if they are good writers, can find expression through the latter, and consequently need not monopolize The Truth Seeker. And in order to do this The Truth Seeker would hav to go back entirely on the principles of its founder.

Would Converse Close, for the sake of "harmony," hav The Truth Seeker narrowed to suit those who, not having the disposition or the ability to investigate, cannot tolerate the opinions of those who do, and consequently differ from them? At the risk of being called an Anarchist, I will say that "the principles of Anarchy," as stated by some of its leading advocates and by those whose lives were sacrificed, do not "involve the utter disregard and destruction of all laws," but only such laws and regulations as are in conflict with natural law and the right of self-government; they claim that laws should be discovered, not made.

I hav always understood Liberalism as upholding not only the right of private opinion, but the right to publicly express that opinion.

I believe not one who has expressed sympathy for the condemned Anarchists has manifested a desire to hav the mouths of those who denounced them closed. By this one may judge as to who is most Liberal.

Friend Close, a very large, and the most popular, class believe that in opposing religion you are attacking the very foundation of "good order in society." And it was for this as much as for Anarchy that those men were condemned.

Hillsboro, Dak., March 9, 288 A.S.

Mr. Editor: Since the publication of my last letter I hav been so overwhelmed with different kinds of Liberal newspapers that I hav hardly had time to read them all. I did not need to read very far in each one to satisfy me as to the superiority of The Truth Seeker. There is more solid, instructiv reading in one copy of The Truth Seeker than in five copies of any other paper. And besides, I think that The Truth Seeker is favored with the best writers in this country, if not in the world.

One idea, however, strikes me as ridiculous—that of an equal distribution of property, which your contributors write so much about. Although they write against monopoly and the money power as they say, they don't suggest any remedy for the same. Mr. Denslow has one remedy, and, as I understand, it is, Let it be as it is, and do not make any robbing-nest out of our country. As I am a laboring man, I would not hav any objections to securing a thousand dollars through an equal distribution. But I cannot see by what right such a distribution could take place. As long as a man has acquired his wealth, be it ten cents or millions of dollars, in accordance with the law, I cannot see why he has not a perfect right to it. But if he has not got his wealth in accordance with the law, he is a thief, and should be punished accordingly. Then it must be the fault of the law if the millionaire has no right to his millions. If it is so, the law-making majority should make such laws as would prohibit monopoly. I wish some of those who want equal distribution to suggest some method of getting the same, or else it will stand just where it now stands.

I cannot see how Mr. Shoemaker should expect you to be able to please everybody. I think that a free paper, as is The Truth Seeker, is the best we can hav. I wonder how it would hav pleased Shoemaker to be excluded from the pages of The Truth Seeker so as not to be able to giv his opinion on different subjects. Hoping those questions will be cleared up in the near future, I am,

Respectfully yours, John E. Welin.

Mr. Editor: In the twenty-fifth chapter of "the gospel according to St. Matthew" Christ describes what an ancient divine has called "the last, eternal judgment of the universe." Before the great judge are gathered all nations—every man, woman, and child that has had being since time began These innumerable millions of human beings are summoned to appear before this dread tribunal to hear and receive a judgment which will irrevocably settle and fix their eternal destinies. A part of this vast multitude is adjudged worthy of an immortality of happiness, while the rest are consigned to everlasting punishment. An awful responsibility this last for a good and just judge to assume, and he naturally feels it incumbent upon him to state the grounds or reasons which warrant his pronouncing so terrible a sentence. This he proceeds to do, and the indictment reads as follows: "For I was an hungered, and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick and in prison, and ye visited me not." And when these myriads of lost souls demand to know when or, rather, in effect, how they hav been thus guilty, he sums up and explains by saying, "Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me."

Now, it would appear reasonable enough to assume that this infinitly wise and just judge has stated in these charges and in this summing up the real grounds upon which his judgment is based, or, in other words, that when God professes to state the reason for which he is about to damn the greater number of the human race he states the true reason and no other. Yet the seeker after truth might be excused for inquiring, with becoming modesty, how it happens that unbelief is altogether omitted in these charges and that no reference whatever is made to such a crime in assigning the cause of their condemnation. Pressing the inquiry, he will be led to the conclusion that there may be hosts of Freethinkers on the right-hand side of the judge, and millions of baptized believers among the goats. He will then wonder as to what action Christ's apostles and self-accredited ministers will take upon such an arraignment of baptized believers, since they taught these poor, deluded wretches that their final salvation or damnation would be contingent, not upon their deeds, but upon their belief or disbelief in Christ. What will these ghostly counselors do? Will they stand by their clients and demur to the indictment, or will they confess before an assembled universe that they lied to and deceived the world when they preached: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned?" S. J. Offord.

Pittsburgh, Pa., March 1, 1888.

Mr. Editor: If crowded houses are to be taken as evidences of increasing strength, Freethought in Pittsburgh is certainly growing strong, for crowded houses hav been the rule with both Secularist and Spiritualist in this city ever since the present season opened. Last Sunday afternoon Prof. W. S. Bell, of Chicago, lectured before the Secular Society on "Liberty and Morality" to a crowded and appreciativ audience, as was evidenced by their frequent outburst of applause. One of the pleasing features of the audience was the large number of young men and women, many of whom were there for the first time, and the marked attention and hearty response to the many good points made by the lecturer. The lecturer showed very forcibly that so long as the individual was fettered by creeds and conventionalities one could not be truly moral; that to be moral we must be absolutely free to act out our own impulses, hence the absurdity of attempting to legislate people moral. Professor Bell wields a powerful influence over his audience from the opening to the closing sentence of his discourse. As a Freethought lecturer he is capable of doing a great amount of good to the cause, and ought therefore to be kept constantly before the public.

On Sunday evening we went to hear Mrs. Richings, of Boston, deliver her closing lecture to the First Society of Spiritualists, and although I got there fully twenty minutes before the time for opening, the only seat I could find was on the edge of the platform by the side of the speaker's desk. Mrs. Richings is one of the most pleasing and forcible speakers it was ever my pleasure to listen to, and is a credit to the cause she represents. Her subject was, "Hav Spiritualists a Savior?" She took the ground that the elevation of the human race had not been through the merits and sacrifice of any one savior, but through the noble lives and self-sacrifices of the great and good in all the ages of the past and the present.

Between these two wings of Freethought, Materialist and Spiritualist, the dry bones of orthodoxy are getting pretty well shaken up in these two cities. Anthony Barker.

Averill, Mich., March 10, 1888.

Mr. Editor: I saw in The Truth Seeker of February 11th an article on "Evolution," taken from the Cornhill Magazine. The writer claims that all the matter of the sun and planets was very thin gas up to a certain time, but at some time in the past the particles of matter began to concentrate into worlds and a sun. That is very easy to tell, but I should like to see him or anyone else prove it. If it could exist in that shape from all eternity down to a certain time, what would cause it to begin to form into worlds and suns? Could one atom of matter begin to attract all the other atoms around, this would go on attracting all the atoms of matter for millions of miles. If the sun had commenced to form first, it would hav attracted every atom of matter of all the planets to it.

And then where would the power come from to set the earth in motion around the sun and revolving on its axis? The motion of the earth around the sun does not increase or diminish a particle, and there is no friction to stop it. Then how could it start and not keep increasing the motion to all eternity? Or did that power instantly cease when it got the earth going at a certain speed? Where was all the attractiv power of the sun all the time it was getting under motion? What hindered it from falling to the sun? What was all this matter doing from all eternity until that time? Why did not all this happen millions of years before it did? Hav there been great changes in the laws of nature at some time that would bring this all about? If there hav, what caused the changes?

There is no man living that can show that the laws of nature hav ever changed. Unless the laws of nature hav changed, all the planets and suns are eternal in the same shape they are now. Anything that is eternal never gets any older. The earth is no older now than it was billions of years ago, nor will it be billions of years hence. If anything that is eternal could grow older, eternity must hav had a beginning. The changes that are going on to-day on the earth under the laws of nature are sufficient in an eternity to bring about all the changes that hav ever happened. We might as well get up a God and hav him make everything out of nothing as to get it up under evolution. According to the theory of evolution, the world is eternal if time, matter, and the laws of nature are eternal. We will grant, for the sake of argument, that the evolution theory is correct—if the earth was formed under the laws of nature, it would commence to form when the conditions were all right; that would be at the commencement of eternity. When would that be? I hope that some one that believes in evolution will try and prove it to be true. I think the subject needs agitating.

Mr. Editor: Please allow me a few lines to reply to an essay by C. L. Haskell, wherein he makes use of a few obscure assertions to prove that the finite can comprehend the infinit. In all philosophical arguments the greatest attention should be given to allow to every word its proper and full value. Custom regulates this. Every word is the distinct expression of an idea or a portion of an idea, so if its full value is not given, or if it is increased in value by trespassing within the circumference of another word (idea), it is rendered obscure and meaningless to all, except the person who employs it. Herein lies Mr. Haskell's mistake. He confounds comprehension with conception, or rather recognizes no difference between them. They are not synonyms, like understanding and comprehending, but each has a distinct sphere of action, a well-defined meaning, and a positiv but varying value.

Comprehension or understanding is a matter of education, and never extends beyond our surroundings, beyond our experience—it comprises all the knowable; while conception's sphere is beyond this. Conception begins where comprehension ends. We comprehend effects and conceive causes. We comprehend the magnitude of our solar system and that of others. We realize their immense power and distance from us, and there our comprehension ends, and we look about and conceive the causes which hav produced them. To use one of his own illustrations—the drop of water—we can understand its being divided a number of times, but a continued repetition of the division very soon brings us to the end of our comprehensiv power, and conception takes up the process and follows it even to infinity.

It is not necessary to be able to understand in order to recognize certain truths. If so, how did we gain our knowledge of the eternity of time and the limitlessness of space? We cannot understand, or even conceive of, a beginning or an end to consciousness. Why, then, not place consciousness, time, and space in the same category and prove the infinity of the one by the other.

Comprehension is positiv, circumscribed, and limited. Conception is abstract, vague, and suggestiv—it is to imagin or suggest that which lies beyond the limits of the demonstrable. We are finite; we are limited to a certain sphere of action; our intellects are formed within that circle; that which does not come within our scope of thought can never be known. Consequently, built up, as we are, by the finite, how can we possess an infinit faculty of comprehension?

I do not see the meaning to the statement that "perfection is a limit of itself and the perfect must hav limits," and I will wager considerable that the gentleman himself cannot clearly define it. I supposed that the laws of nature, i. e., universal evolutionary laws, were constantly advancing the universe toward a more perfect state of existence, and as, according to Mr. Haskell, perfection can only be produced by a process of limitation, the result will be that some time the infinit will shrink up, so to speak, and become finite.

The real fact is, there is no finite. Everything is infinit in one direction, at least. At each new discovery the finite becomes larger. Does the infinit correspondingly decrease?

MR. EDITOR: Perhaps your readers would like to hear from this part of the grand army of Liberals. The two pages in your paper devoted to "Letters from Friends" are by no means waste leaves. They are a valuable auxiliary. They serve as a kind of clincher to hold the family together. We can exchange ideas, tell what progress is being made in our respectiv portions of the country, and drink new confidence and courage from the plucky co-workers. It is a pleasure to read the discussions where a Liberal spirit prevails. It is amusing to read the letters of a few who want free speech for themselvs, but not for others—not even the Editor—and to note their inclination to hamper the ideas of others within the walls of their own notions. It is perfectly proper to persuade others, and, if possible, convince them, but to withdraw one's patronage, or stop the paper, is not a proper means to employ.

This is a "church town," and but a very few Liberals hav unfurled the flag. There may be quite a number here, but they do not come to the surface. They do not think favorably enough of the church to sign its creed and stand up for their "master," nor enough of the Nine Demands and of absolute freedom to declare independence, and practice it. Thousands of good people are nothing, so far as a religious belief is concerned. They are in a position to be pulled and pushed by the exhaustless exhorters. They are saving their nerve till almost everybody else gets to speaking out. If they knew how free a fellow feels after having made a man of himself by talking just what his brain thinks, they would come over and do the same. It is no small item to be thoroughly rid of the systematic solicitors for the church, who are ordered out by the pastor and told to beg for boodle, with which to purchase steeples, stained glass, gilt-bound books, napkins, oysters, etc. They had much rather ask a saloon-keeper than an earnest Infidel for aid. They know that the true Infidel will giv nothing, other than his reasons for not giving. Less than two years ago I was asked by a minister for funds to aid in the building of a church. I answered in a playful manner that "I had better use for my money." He asked, "In the name of common sense, what could it be?" and on being told, "to pay debts and buy clothing for my child," he actually said he could not see it that way, and immediately left.

They are gaining sagacity. They are learning where to ask in order to receive. Why, they do not even pray for rain here during the summer when there is none expected. In order to obtain rain during that season the mountains—the natural obstructions—must first be removed; but that is a roundabout way, and mountains are not so easily moved as of old, so they depend entirely upon man's invention—irrigation. Who knows but they may yet learn that "labor is the only prayer that receives an answer; the only prayer that deserves an answer?"

I hav just read Ingersoll's "Defense of C. B. Reynolds," and regard it as the greatest plea for free speech that has ever been made. Colonel Ingersoll has moved the minds of millions in other efforts and in this one he no doubt caused even the Morristown jury to think a little. The man does not liv that can argue him down. There is not the least doubt that he could hav been president had he been a hypocrit. Long liv Ingersoll, the greatest thinker and orator on earth!

W. A. CHESS.

ERIE, COL., Feb. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 45—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the remainder for the ANNUAL and Peck's "Christian Absurdities."

The struggle for existence gets more and more severe every year in these parts, because the wealth of this region, through outrageous charges by the railroad monopolies, goes to one center to enrich the few and pauperize the many. Think of charging $1 per ton for freighting coal from this place to Denver, only twenty-three miles. If anyone calls attention to this, the capitalist papers and bosses will howl that another agitator, Socialist, or Anarchist is in their midst.

I approve of the stand you took in regard to the Chicago Anarchists. If tyranny has not existed in Chicago since 1878 and 1879, when the poor Socialists had their ballots thrown and kicked on the floor, instead of being counted like other ballots, then tyranny never existed under English rule in Ireland. I wonder when those so-called Liberals, who are among the first to kick when the church power tries to throttle free thought, speech, and press, will grant the same rights to the Socialists and Anarchists.

I am at present perusing the late A. R. Parsons's book on "Anarchism." I think the idea is a grand and noble one. I am afraid we are not perfect enough to liv up to it. We hav evil in nature as well as good; in this age, as well as the past, it seems to predominate. In the vegetable kingdom we hav poisonous plants, and in the animal we hav some organisms that prey on the others, gnaw and eat while their victim is alive. Man slaughters his fellow-man, and even goes further—he will oppress him for the sake of hoarding up wealth over and above the necessities of life, knowing that his fellow-man that produces that wealth cannot hav proper food for himself and struggling family.

Old Jove from the top of Olympia did not cause more consternation among the Hellenic people by hurling his thunderbolts down on them than C. B. Reynolds did among the orthodox of Erie on the noble Paine's birthday. Sunday and Monday night the town hall was crowded. Every available seat was occupied half an hour before the appointed time. Some of our noted church-members were occupying front seats. The three reverends showed the white feather, and failed to show the courage of some of the laymen. One of them said that it was the worst thing that ever struck (cycloned) Erie. That first dawn of light called thought has taken hold of a good many. Two ladies of my acquaintance hav been liberated from mental slavery—one a member of the Primitiv Methodist (ranters') church, and the other of the Methodist Episcopal church. The Methodist Episcopal sky-pilot came to see his wayward sister, and spoke of the error of her ways. The erring sister said that the Infidel quoted the Bible, and that she had found it so. Since, that shepherd and the rest of the flock hav been mourning the fate of that ewe lamb. Liberals everywhere on C. B. Reynolds's route would do well to engage him. He is a trump for the cause.

I am passing my TRUTH SEEKER around to get people to take an interest in it. One promised two weeks ago that he was going to forward the necessary fee for six months.

GRIFF LLOYD.

MT. HEATHY, O., Feb. 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I can with all my heart recommend THE TRUTH SEEKER to the Infidel public. It is Liberal to its patrons—a very desirable qualification in an Infidel paper. Infidels are supposed to hav inquiring minds, of course advancing new theories for the advancement of humanity to a higher civilization. Of course, then, there will be many subjects advanced which will not coincide with the Editor's views, or the views of all his patrons. There was a time when it was popular to burn people alive for a difference of opinion on the subject of religion, also to banish Baptists, hang Quakers, and whip their women naked, tied to the tail-end of carts, from town to town. Also to hang witches; in which Illinois is now put on the same plane as old Massachusetts—a scandal that will stick to her as long as history is written. No doubt if some of our pretended Liberal friends had lived at that time, they would hav indorsed hangings and burnings of Quakers and witches, just as they hav cried for the blood of those innocent men, Parsons, Spies, and friends. All the liberty which we possess has been accomplished by Infidels. Any man who fights, writes, or speaks for the natural rights of man is a patriot. John Brown, in fighting for the natural rights of man, killed not less than fifty men in Kansas and Harpers Ferry, defying the state of Kansas and her troops, also the United States troops, committing treason against the United States, and to-day he is more popular than any general who served in the war of the Rebellion, dead or alive, Grant not excepted. And why? Because he sacrificed his life for the natural rights of man.

Man's natural rights are high above all governments, principalities or powers, thrones or dominions, kings or priests. Natural laws are God's laws, if a God exists. They are the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. They govern every organization, in all places and all countries alike. We need no other laws. Any statute law that infringes on the rights of man ought not to be obeyed. It is blasphemy to obey them. "Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God," says some writer I cannot recall now. Why do we venerate Washington, Jefferson, Paine, the Fathers of the old Revolution? Because they resisted the tyranny of George III. There were Tories then, just as there are now—traitors to the natural rights of man. All reforms hav originated among the poor. The rich want no reformers. Christ, Mohammed, Confucius, were all poor men. Christ was a friend of the poor. He despised the rich; broke up their swindling banking institutions with whips; called them thieves, as all such institutions are; told the preachers to preach barefoot, the rich to sell what they had and giv to the poor before they could be his disciples. He placed the rich man in hell and the tramp and beggar Lazarus in Abraham's bosom. Parsons or Spies never said anything more severe of the rich capitalist than the man Christ. I believe in free thought, free press, free speech, free meetings, minus the ignorant Catholic police. I believe if the people's meetings are to be broken up by a brutal police as they hav been for two years past, it is high time the people should resist such tyranny.

JOEL BROWN.

ITHACA, MICH., March 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Another soldier has dropped out of the Freethought ranks. W. C. Bryant, of North Star, Mich., died Feb. 8, 1888, after several weeks of suffering, aged thirty-seven years. He was a single man and lived with his parents. In his death his parents hav lost a kind and dutiful son, the only child they had left them in their declining years. Mr. and Mrs. Bryant hav the sympathy of all who know them. In the death of Mr. Bryant, the community has lost a good and enterprising citizen and an upright, thorough business man, and Liberalism an outspoken Freethinker and Agnostic. He was a young man of more than ordinary intelligence, always social, kind-hearted, and accommodating. He owned and worked a brickyard, and employed quite a number of men. When he became satisfied he could liv but a few days, he made arrangements for his burial, and selected his pall-bearers from the young men under his employ. He requested that there should be no orthodox minister to preach his funeral sermon, but consented to a request of his mother to let a minister make a prayer at the house. When asked by some of his Christian friends if he would like to hav a minister come in and pray for him he said, No; if they wanted to come and see him he was willing, but he did not want them to pray for him. His motto was, One world at a time. He was not afraid to die. He wanted to die as he had lived. I saw his parents and had a talk with them. They say he was conscious to the last and passed away as one going to sleep, and as calm as the setting of the sun on a mild summer eve.

He told a friend a few days before he died: "If the Christians say after I am dead that I requested their prayers, tell them I was crazy and had lost my reason, for it will be when I hav lost my reason that I do that." The Free Methodists got badly left when Mr. Bryant died, for they had often said when he came to die he would call on Christians to pray for him, as all Infidels did; that no Infidel could die in peace. But Mr. Bryant and all honest, intelligent Infidels giv the lie to that assertion.

That Mr. Bryant was an honest, intelligent, outspoken Freethinker and Agnostic is proved by the stand he took in regard to the expulsion of a brother Mason, of King Solomon's Lodge, No. 22, of Toronto, Ont., in 1885, for holding Agnostic views. I herewith inclose an exact copy of Mr. Bryant's letter to the secretary of the Toronto lodge, which led to the expulsion of Mr. Bryant from the Ithaca lodge, together with the comments of the editor of the Gratiot Journal. You will see, Mr. Editor, that all Masons are not as honest as was Mr. Bryant, for it is well known by many that the editor of the Journal is a Mason and belongs to the Ithaca lodge, and is an Agnostic or Infidel, but has not the moral courage to let it be known publicly for fear of expulsion, and is therefore a mental slave—for he says in his comments it is in direct violation of the spirit of Free Masonry to allow any of its members to entertain the belief expressed in Mr. Bryant's letter, if the fact be known, as no Agnostic or Infidel can be knowingly made a Mason, nor can one retain a place in a lodge should the fact be known that he entertains such views. And he further says Mr. Bryant's position and action is sincerely to be regretted—as much as to say it is sincerely to be regretted that Mr. Bryant was not a hypocrit, that he was not a mental slave, and that he had the moral courage to speak his honest thoughts, or, in other words, that he was an honest man.

Mr. Bryant made more warm friends among our best and most intelligent citizens by his manly and honest course taken and maintained than he would if he had truckled to a few bigoted hypocrits in the Masonic lodge. If all Masons were expelled who hold the same views that Mr. Bryant held, it would thin their ranks mightily, but there are too many moral cowards among them; and I am afraid the editor of the Journal is one of them. Here is what appeared in the Journal:

"EXPELLED FROM MASONRY.

"Some months ago King Solomon's Lodge, No. 22, of Toronto, Ont., expelled one of its members for holding Agnostic views. The lodge's action in the matter was sustained by the grand master of the province, who cited instances where the same position had been taken by grand lodges elsewhere, notably in New York. The expulsion was commented on quite generally by the press of the country at the time, and attracted the attention of W. C. Bryant, of North Star, a member of Ithaca lodge, who addressed the following letter to the Toronto lodge:

"'NORTH STAR, MICH., April 18, 1885.

"'SECRETARY K. S. LODGE, Toronto, Dear Sir: I hav recently seen in the papers an account of the treatment of a Mr. Harrison at the hands of your lodge, and to say that the object of this is to express my indignation at such treatment of any man is a mild way to put it. I hav been a master Mason for fourteen years, and during ten years of that time I hav held to the creed of an Agnostic, or, in other words, that there was no proof or evidence of the existence of a great bugaboo beyond the clouds so many call a God; and I hav never been anyway mealy-mouthed about it either, and my views are well known to all the members of our lodge who hav sense enough to know that man, not creed, is what makes a lodge and a Mason. Now, I know nothing about Mr. Harrison, and never heard of him until I saw his name in the paper. But I do know that if every Mason who holds Agnostic or Infidel opinions should express his contempt by letter to you for the manner in which you plainly said to the world that you think difference of opinion a crime, you would be flooded with such an avalanche of letters as would make some of your intolerant members (who, no doubt, wink at such offenses as drunkenness, wife-beating, vulgar or obscene language) think that they might be much better employed than to be quarreling with members about subjects that admit of proof purely and wholly speculativ. Now, Mr. Secretary, I should advise to get some light reading for your lodge—something that will tell them in plain English and small words that this earth is round, and that it is a long time since they burnt people for being heretics, also that witches are very scarce, and that ghosts hav to be hunted down by telegraph, and with proper education there may be some hopes for your lodge yet. W. C. BRYANT.'

"Soon after the receipt of Mr. Bryant's letter, the worshipful master of King Solomon's Lodge of Toronto sent a copy of the same to the worshipful master of Ithaca lodge, when the necessary machinery was set in motion to try Mr. Bryant for the offense; it being in direct violation of the spirit of Freemasonry to allow any of its members to entertain the belief expressed in Mr. Bryant's letter, if the fact be known, as no Agnostic or Infidel can be knowingly made a Mason, nor can one retain a place in a lodge should the fact be known that he entertains such views. After a duly constituted Masonic trial therefor, Mr. Bryant was found guilty of the charge, viz., that of being an Agnostic and also of the transmission of an insulting letter to a neighboring lodge. He was then expelled from the lodge, and forever after debarred the rights and benefits of Masonry. This is the only case of the kind that ever occurred in the United States, and probably the second expulsion for this cause in the world; each of which will be looked upon as of more than passing importance to all good Masons the world over, it being a cardinal principle of the fraternity that its members must believe in a true God. Mr. Bryant's position and action is sincerely regretted, as he has an excellent record as an honorable and straightforward business man, and is socially above reproach."

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Slander.

A SHORT SERMON.

Why foolishly squander our time here away
In vain, idle talk and light, silly play?
Why thus displease the good spirit within
By going the way of evil or sin?
Consider well.
Oh, why do we think or so little care
How wicked it is with harsh words to tear
The heart of a neighbor, to others most dear,
With whom we are called to associate here?
Indeed,
Slander's a vile wretch, at the midnight hour
By envy urged on sweet peace to devour.
It drinks deep draughts of the soul's precious part,
As a wild wolf sups the life-blood of the heart.
'Tis a base, ugly coward, in a bright coat of mail,
Who dares every brave and good man assail;
Oft hav I seen this foul demon of souls,
Beating the innocent down with cajoleries,
With a countenance smooth as heaven could make,
And visage serene as an unruffled lake,
With dark hurricanes in the deep world of thought,
For a season pent up, thence forthcoming brought
To bear on some goodly, well-meaning neighbor,
Marring his peace as with a thrust of a sabre!
Again,
A significant smile oft sits on its brow,
As it goes among men and stirs up a row;
Where, like as lightning from a charged thunder-cloud,
It shocks a poor soul, then hides in the crowd.
Alas!
As soon would I dwell with those serpents that rattle
As with their kin, Slander, its lies and foul prattle!

EXHORTATION.

Let us, dearest friends, all read and reflect;
Our duty to other dear souls ne'er neglect,
But strive to be faithful, all duties fulfill,
Be kind unto all, showing love and good-will;
So may we shut out all slandering crime,
And peacefully fill up our short span of time.

Three Rivers, Mich. E D BLAKEMAN.

Correspondence.

DEMPSEYTOWN, PA., March 12, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am going to try and write a letter for the Corner. My grandpa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to look at the pictures in it, and read the letters in the Corner. I am eight years old. I studied reading, spelling, drawing, arithmetic, and writing. I hav a little pup; its name is Scotchie. I don't go to school this winter; it is so far, and I would hav to go through the woods and alone. Hoping to see my letter in print, I am,

Your little Freethinker friend,
EMMA WEBER.

ONTARIO, CAL., March 12, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am going to write and tell you of the sorrowful death of my dear father, who suffered a long, patient sickness, and is now at a sweet rest, never more to wake. I miss him very much, and wish he was with me to-day. I hav three brothers. My brother Luther wrote you a letter once, and was glad to see it in print. This is my second letter, and I guess I will close, as I do not wish to take up too much room.

Yours in love and Freethought,
MAY A. JOHNS.

[We can truly sympathize with May in her sad loss. We know what it is.—ED. C. C.]

ROSSBURGH, N. Y, March 14, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will write a few lines for the Children's Corner. My grandpa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I read the Children's Corner and like it very much. I went to school, but it is out now. I studied reading, spelling, geography, arithmetic, language, and writing. My school was out last Friday; we had an exhibition. My teacher's name was Ama Morrow. I am ten years old. This is my first letter, so I will close. I remain, Yours truly, ETHEL MILLS.

P.S.—This card is for you. E. M.

[Thanks for the neat little card. Write again.—ED. C. C.]

METAMORA, O., March 14, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I like to read the Children's Corner in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am twelve years old. Pa takes the paper. I hav many good pieces in my scrap-book which I cut out of some papers edited by D. M. Bennett. This winter I recited two of them, "Love of Money" and "Prayer and Potatoes." I tell you it made a loud applause. We hav a revival here in the Methodist Episcopal church; the preacher begs for folks to come forward. But not one will go; one night I was there he got somewhat out of patience and said, "If you don't come and accept of this Christian religion, you will all go down to the very depths of hell!" How does he know of any such place? I will not go again—such talk is too silly for me. I hav no time to lose in any such way, but sometimes they occupy our time contrary to our wishes. I am going to a little country school. Our teacher opens school with reading in the Bible, then prayer, and then a good scolding! If she would read to us a piece of history of our country we liv in, it would be beneficial to us.

This, for the first time, comes from the hand and mind of your Liberal sister.

CLARA VICTORIA BURG.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., March 7, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Papa keeps THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I see in it that little girls about my size write to you quite often. We liv in a nice city, and, up to two years ago, it was called the biggest village in the United States. Now it is known to raise the finest celery, and undoubtedly you hav eaten some of it. I am ten years old, and go to school every day. I am in the fifth grade, and hav four brothers and one sister; and, to close, let me tell you something funny: My papa is the baby of his family; my mamma is the baby of her family; and I am the baby of our family.

Yours truly, BLANCHE ROSENBAUM.

McLEAN, ILL., March 14, 1888.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: I never hav written to the Children's Corner, so I will try once and see how I succeed. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER since it was first published, and he thinks he could not get along without it. I like to look at the pictures and to read the Corner. My brother Lee misses the picture puzzles; he always could read them. I go to school; my teacher's name is Miss Jennie Russum. We hav a nice literary society at our school-house. I will not write any more this time; I hav written too much already.

Your friend, LINCOLN LIVINGSTON.

P.S.—My regards to all the Corner correspondents. L. L.

HEMPSTEAD, N. Y., March 12, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am ten years old, and I write this letter on papa's type-writer. Papa is teaching me to write with the type-writer, and sometimes I forget to make spaces between the words and run them together like this. My papa makes photographs, and my mamma keeps a big candy store. I hav all the candy I want; but I don't want enough to make me sick. I like to read the Children's Corner, and would like to hav some of the little girls write to me, and I will send them type-writer letters. We are having the biggest snow-storm I ever saw; the drifts are higher than my head. Auntie went out to look for the pump, and found it nearly covered up in a big snow-bank.

From your friend, ADA E. DEMOTT.

PORT RICHEY, FLA., March 11, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My folks liv in Nebraska. I am spending the winter in Florida. Father sends me THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I am glad to see the Corner so nobly conducted. All are interested in the Corner. Its weekly visits make many happy.

Florida has a splendid climate. I hav traveled over a large portion of the state. I spent two months on the Gulf studying animals and plants, and collecting specimens to take to my home in Salem, Nebraska, to which I shall return in a few days.

Ever success to the Corner and its readers.

T. P. BRINEGAR.

[We would be pleased if our friend would write some brief sketches for the Corner about the different plants and animals he has seen amid the "wilds of Florida."—ED. C. C.]

OSCEOLA, IA., Feb. 24, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines for the Corner. As this is my first letter, I will not write much. My father has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for four years; he thinks he could not do without it. I think it the best paper I ever read. I wish that every family could take THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think the world would be a little wiser if everybody would read that paper. I get more truth out of it than all the other papers I ever read. I am fifteen years old. I go to school most of the time. I only missed two and one-half days this winter. I study arithmetic, geography, grammar, history, physiology, spelling, and writing. Our school closed last Friday. We had a nice time. We liv eight miles southwest of Osceola. Well, I guess my letter is long enough for the first. I will close, hoping to see this in the next paper. Yours truly,

MAMIE JONES.

MOUNT HOPE, ONT., March 12, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav read several letters from the Children's Corner, so I thought I would write one too.

Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we hav good laughs at the pictures. Mamma thinks the last one is a cutter on the preachers. I am nine years old, and go to school. My teacher's name is Miss Lamb. In our class we study arithmetic, reading, grammar, dictation, and geography. Papa lends THE TRUTH SEEKER and Secular Thought to our neighbors.

I hav two brothers school-teachers, and one going to high school at Caledonia. When they come home they are always reading the Liberal papers.

As this is my first letter, I guess I won't write any more.

Hoping it is good enough to put in your Corner, I remain, a Liberal,

Yours truly, MINNIE MAY MCCLEMONT.

WEST BOONE, IA., March 13, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As this is my first attempt in writing for the Children's Corner, I thought I would amuse the readers by writing a song entitled, "Building Castles in the Air," which was composed by one of father's friends, and I thought it too good not to be published, and so I thought I would send it to you, and if you think it is good enough I should like to see it in print. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we think it is just perfection. We hav THE TRUTH SEEKER of 1886 bound, and father has the year of 1887 ready to be bound, which will be for me. In my next letter I will tell you more of myself.

I will close my letter for this time. Wishing success to the Corner, I remain,

A truth seeker, ETTA KEMBEL.

P.S.—I will send you one of my cards. E. K.

BUILDING CASTLES IN THE AIR.

This world is all a fleeting show;
Our life is like a dream;
And man is but a little boat
That's floating down the stream.
He tries to guide his little craft
Through darkness and despair,
But his mind is ever busy
Building castles in the air.

He tries his fortune at the wheel,
And on the wide blue sea;
But the "best laid schemes of mice and men"
He finds are "aft aglee."
He seeks for fame in foreign lands,
Where skies are bright and fair;
But at the best his efforts are
But castles in the air.

We are traveling on the plain of life,
And many roads we see;
They hav guideboards without number,
But none of them agree.
Mankind are drifting to and fro,
They are scattered everywhere;
And each one striving hard to build
His castle in the air.

Our churches all hav different creeds,
And each one claims the right;
But when you look for evidence
It's always out of sight.
Men say their faith is firm and sure,
As they depend on prayer;
They are shouting hal-le-lu ja
At some phantom in the air.

They say salvation's free for all,
But that sounds rather flat,
For every Sunday at the church
They are sure to pass the hat.
They say, "Come, sinners, go to heaven—
There will be no sorrow there."
So they climb up Jacob's ladder
To bright castles in the air.

Their preachers vote for Prohibition,
The "members" fall in line;
But at the sacramental board
Each saint must hav his wine.
They say it's emblematic of
The blood of Christ so fair;
Now, isn't their consistency just like
Some castle in the air?

Religion of the present day
Is quite a curious thing;
Our churches all are drifting wild,
Like birds upon the wing;
Their faith in God is all "played out;"
That mustard seed so rare
Has proved to them their faith is but
Some castles in the air.

They hav tried to change the Bible so
That it will suit the times;
An angry God and endless hell
Don't suit their troubled minds.
And Satan, too, that old arch-fiend,
An angel once so fair—
They hav scratched his name, and now he's but
Some castle in the air.

For eighteen hundred years they've howled
To sinners all around:
"Hark, from the tombs, ye wretched souls—
List to the gospel sound.
By Adam's fall God cursed you all,
You are now in dark despair."
Now, don't you think that curse is but
Some castle in the air?

Their ministers are sore distressed,
They hav almost gone insane;
But still they spit their brimstone at Such men as Thomas Paine.
They say God doomed his soul to hell,
To dwell forever there;
Now, don't such crazy lunatics
Build castles in the air?

Old orthodoxy's losing power;
Her structure soon will fall;
Her creeds are all turned upside-down
By Robert Ingersoll.
They hav found their faith is all a myth,
No answer to their prayer;
Their endless hell is nothing but
Some castle in the air.

When sickness comes upon us,
The doctor takes control;
Perhaps he'll lose the body,
But the priest will save the soul.
He says your sins are many,
And mumbles o'er a prayer;
And you die shouting glory at
Bright castles in the air.

So, now, kind friends, investigate,
And you will plainly see
That science and theology they never can agree.
Your Bible tells you that the sun
Stood still for one whole day,
And thousands of poor human souls
Were killed by Joshua.
Now, don't you think the Lord was tough,
And acted quite unfair?
Or is that Bible story but
Some castle in the air?

The lawyer says: "Good morning, friends.
Your case is very plain;
And for one hundred dollars
Your suit I'll surely gain."
He talks to you quite eloquent,
His plans are laid with care;
But you hav paid your hundred dollars
For some castle in the air.

The politician meets you.
Says he: "I want your vote;
Our nation's retrograding,
And everything's afloat.
The church and state must harmonize,
Or we're left in despair."
But, mind you, that old dude is
Building castles in the air.

Don't worship phantoms in the air;
Be true to truth and man;
Don't put faith in any creed;
Do all the good you can.
Then, when you are called to leave this world,
Your exit will be fair;
You will find that home you're going to,
No castle in the air.

AN INFIDEL.

MELBOURNE, VICTORIA, AUS., Jan. 18, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We are at last in the bosom of our family, and they seem glad, too. We had a very pleasant passage per steamship Zealander from San Francisco to Sydney. We left San Francisco on Saturday, Nov. 19, 1887.

Papa is splendid and well; his trip to America has done wonders for him, for we both did enjoy ourselves very, very much.

After hearing from you, while we were in Boston, we went to New York and stayed at the Rossmore Hotel, and felt very happy. From there we visited Saratoga and Niagara Falls; we were charmed with the former, and overwhelmed with the splendor of the Falls. From there we went back to New York city, and staved a few days before sailing per steamship City of Para on Oct. 1, 1887, for San Francisco. Oh, that was a delightful trip of a month's time! We saw such wonderful things when crossing the isthmus of Panama by train. Then we came on another ship from there along the coast of Mexico to California. We called at a few Mexican ports, where we stared at the pretty nativ girls who were half Spanish, and I collected a few curios. The heat was terrible near Panama, and it got cooler as we neared California. We arrived in San Francisco on Oct. 30, 1887, so we had three very pleasant weeks in that city; for they were our last in America, so we made much of them. Papa was anxious to get home, but I would hav liked to stay another month in dear old America. My mamma was delighted to get us home looking so well. She did not look well when we saw her first; I think she had been very anxious while we were away, but she is very well now. She has been reading your book, "All In a Lifetime," and she is so charmed with it that she quite craves for another, but I tell her that I do not know how to get one. I hav also read it while in America, and I think it just splendid. I quite fell in love with the young man who was thought to be drowned. I did hate that woman who caused so much trouble and sorrow, also Philip.

I hope you will write to me some day.

Melbourne has improved very much since we went away. We see a great difference in some of our friends, also—my baby nephews hav grown into big boys. It is summer here now, and we hav had some very, very hot days—dry, roasting days they are, too. This day is as perfect and cool as a Californian day, so we hav some comfort.

I am sending our photos by this mail. Please send yours to us if you can spare one.

We never shall forget all the kind friends we met during our travels in America, for they were all such nice, kind people. With love, I remain, Your loving friend,

LIZZIE BOWLEY.

Turns the Faucet.

The horse that pulls the ambulance in search of patients for the New York Hospital is a curiosity of its kind, inasmuch as during the whole period of his philanthropic career as an ambulance horse he has never once been given a drink by any of the stable hands. He believes in the maxim that God helps those who help themselves; and helps himself accordingly.

A New York Telegram reporter went down to see how he satisfied his thirst recently, and was edified to a degree by the intellectual behavior of the animal.

There is an ordinary faucet with a pail under it in the stable, and to this faucet the horse made a bee-line.

First he dipped his nose in the pail to see if there was any water there, but finding there was none he proceeded to open the valve by turning the handle with his nose. He did not turn it on quite enough at the first attempt, so he gave it another nudge, and held his nose under the spigot while the water poured over it to his apparent immense satisfaction. "But what a lot of water will be wasted when he leaves it running the moment he has had enough!" ejaculated the reporter.

"Wait and see," said the driver.

And there was no water wasted, for the moment the horse had concluded his drink he went at the faucet again with his nose and shut off the flow completely.

"Does he always do that?" again queried the newspaper man.

"Certainly," answered the driver, as he patted his four-footed friend on the shoulder. "As long as I've known him that horse has never had a drink that he did not draw from the tap for himself just as you hav seen him do this time."

Reminiscences of a Preacher,

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectively and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who have read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

Poetry.

The Good Man's Death.

Death! thou mysterious conqueror of form,
Annihilator of the human race,
Smiter of hoary head and newly born,
Both irrespectivly of time and place!

Yet, Death, thou'rt not so grim as thou art painted
By ignorant and undeveloped mind;
Alas! that those who by the creeds are sainted
Make thee so hideous to the human kind

By conjuring up foul images of hell,
With deep, dark pits and molten, sulphurous lake,
Where what they call the damned they there compel
To stay forever with the fabled snake.

The damned! Ah! there's the doubt. Who are the damned?
This the vast problem that these holy men
So vainly try to make us understand
By differing among themselvs, and then

Are so surprised we fail to comprehend
The logic they so lucidly propounded;
Our dulness chide by picturing our end,
When for deficiencies we'll be confounded.

Is omnipotence so inconsistent,
After making man in his own image,
Replete with passion surging to hav vent,
And intellectual gifts that make the sage,

With those great gifts of all supreme,
The spiritual, which mark the man divine,
Giving a sense of right that seems extreme
To those who try but in this world to shine—

Can it indeed be possible that he
Creates a sense of equity and right
In man to make the lagging moments flee,
By tantalizing him with useless sight?

No! 'tis a blasphemous, a barbarous thought,
That's only worthy of an infant creed,
Which blindly in its first convulsions wrought
Those devilish theories that make men bleed.

Doubtless "the mind's the standard of the man,"
And its signboards, theories and labors;
In these we read the power he has to scan
Or correctly analyze his neighbors.

But circumstances circumscribe the mind,
In which the body takes no minor part;
For, if it is the least bit halt or blind,
Its action will appear on mind and heart.

Then local objects that surround our birth,
And occupy succeeding years of youth,
Of our experience often prove the girth,
And basis of the mind's idea of truth.

So when the body is both rough and rude,
And from the animal scarce one remove,
We can account for creeds that are so crude,
And pity those imprisoned in a groove,

Whose minds are bounded by a certain school
Which chains and binds them this world's passage through,
For, lacking skill to gage an old-time rule,
They fail to see the beauty of the new.

And there are those who see, but do not care;
Others who tread ambition's thorny way;
While crowds, seduced by gold's insidious glare,
Waste all their lives in bowing to its sway.

Many are of the type called hypocrit,
Who worship at convention's gilded shrine,
And pride themselvs so much upon their wit,
They laugh at those who truthfully incline

To show the inmost workings of their soul,
Caused by the million different changes
That make life's wheels in a new rut to roll—
Change that all its settled plans and schemes deranges.

These emotional and tender beings
Full often lack the "wisdom of this world,"
And love, sympathy, and kindly feeling
Will very soon hav Mammon's banner furled.

They hav another creed than "might is right,"
And it would hurt their tender souls to rise
When brothers are the steps in that great flight
Upon whose top the golden victory lies.

O Death! such souls need hav no fear of thee,
But clothe thee with a flowery diadem,
And giv a welcome full of childish glee
When with a summons thou dost honor them.

That Badger Boy At Sunday-School.

THE LESSON OF SODOM AND GOMORRAH.

The story of the incendiary fire that reduced Sodom and her sister city to ashes, which story includes that of the Lot family, had been read, barring the last eight verses of the 19th chapter of Genesis, prudently omitted, when that Badger boy came to the front as usual.

"Do they hav fire 'n' brimstone in heven, mum, same's in hell?"

"Oh, no, dear; oh, no! Heaven is the place of sunshine and flowers, songs and harps, my child."

"Yes'm. How did God rain fire 'n' brimstone on them cities then, mum?"

"Oh, he created it in the clouds for that especial occasion, James."

"Yes'm. Does God make brimstone for hell, mum?"

"James, you must not ask such awful questions as that!"

"No'm. Is it the same kind of brimstone we hav to take in merlasses, mum?"

"Oh, I don't know. Do stop, you boy."

"Yes'm. Will folks hav to take brimstone 'n' merlasses in hell, mum?"

"You horrid boy, shut up!"

"Yes'm. Is there tiger-lilies and honeysuckles in heaven, mum?"

"Yes, dear; and all kinds of beautiful flowers."

"Do they sing 'You Know' in heaven, mum?"

"They sing sweet psalms, James; not the vulgar songs of earth."

"I don't like sams, mum. Does Jews and Italyens go 'round playin' harps in heaven, mum?"

"I suppose so, if they were good on earth."

"Did they hav any steam fire engins in Sodom, mum?"

"No, dear——"

"There's where the Sodumers got left, didn't they, mum?"

"James, when God rains fire and brimstone on wicked cities, steam fire engins are of no earthly use."

"Why didn't the Lord want Lot and his wife to look back, mum?"

"He wanted to spare them the sight of the awful fire, in his great goodness, James."

"Was God in his great goodness, mum, when he set the cities on fire?"

"He was punishing the wicked people, James."

"Was they God's enemies, mum?"

"Yes, dear; his wicked enemies."

"Ma says we must forgiv our enemies, mum; why didn't God forgiv them enemies?"

"We don't know, James. God's ways are not our ways, child."

"Do you forgiv your enemies, mum?" This was a wide-open trap, but the teacher walked right into it.

"Yes, James; I forgiv all my enemies."

"Ain't you better than God, then?" The teacher flushed and stammered, and tried to explain godlike and human conditions without interesting James, who said, "Lot's wife was bound to hav a look back, wasn't she, mum?"

"Yes, and paid dearly for it, James."

"Why didn't Barnum never git onto the piller of salt Lot's wife turned into, I wonder? The sight would a knocked the woolly hoss higher'n a kite, wouldn't it, mum?"

"James, you must not talk so of sacred things."

"Is pillers of salt sacred things, mum?"

"Well, that one was; now stop, James."

"Yes'm. Don't yer 'spose cows come along and licked Lot's wife of salt, mum?"

"James, you are getting wicked."

"Did Lot cry, mum, when his wife turned to salt?"

"Perhaps, James, but the Bible doesn't say."

"Why didn't he take her down to the grocery store and sell her, mum?"

"James Badger, you stop."

"Yes'm. Did they grind her up, mum, for table salt?"

"James!" (very sternly and sententiously).

"Yes'm. Would you like to turn into a piller of salt, mum?"

"James Madison Badger——" (taffy broke her up).

"You'd make an offle butiful statyu, mum."

"Dear me, James, I really don't think you mean to be bad, but are thoughtless. I think you are very appreciativ, James."

"Yes'm. What's 'presheativ, mum?"

"Well—er—you know the—er—beautiful from the—er—commonplace, James."

"Yes'm. Be you commonplace, mum?"

"Do you think I am, James?"

"Yes'm." James perhaps thought he was giving taffy, and the teacher, concluding so, probed him no further, but directed him back to the lesson.

"Did her clothes turn to salt, mum? 'cos if they didn't the cows didn't git a chance to lick only her hands and face, did they, mum? unless she was barefoot."

"I don't know how that was, James."

"Did Lot git married again, mum?"

"The Bible doesn't say, James."

"'Spose the rain melted Lot's wife, didn't it, mum? I guess 'Squire Bates would like his wife to turn to salt, don't you, mum? She's a holy terror, ain't she?"

"Sh! sh! James; you mustn't talk so about the neighbors."

"If she did, I'll bet the 'squire'd pack her off down to the grocery store quicker'n scat, mum!"

"Sh! James—sh!"

"Yes'm. Would you eat any of her salt, mum? I wouldn't."

"James—James!"

"Yes'm. Lot was good, warn't he, mum?"

"Yes, dear; a holy, righteous man, who found favor in the eyes of the Lord."

"Could God turned Lot's wife into gold, mum?"

"Certainly, James, if he had chosen to."

"If he liked Lot so much, why didn't he turn his wife into a piller of gold, then Lot could a come here and had a high old time?"

"James, you must not talk like that."

"No'm. What a nice gold statyu you'd make, mum!"

"Do you think so, James?"

"Yes'm. But I'll bet your pop would cut you up into gold dollars——"

"James Badger! James Badger, you little wretch, now you go right straight home! I hav had just enough of you. The class is dismissed." So ended the Sodom and Gomorrah séance. SI SLOKUM.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.
The Present and the Future Republic of North America
BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

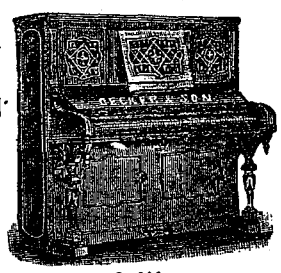
"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.



The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

THE NINE DEMANDS

Mottoes for Freethinkers.

We hav received a supply of illuminated motto cards, which we offer for sale. These mottoes are intended to take the place of the "God-bless-our-home" placards which disfigure the walls of so many houses. They are printed on heavy cardboard, 9 inches by 22 1-2. The motto is in black, with colored borders, with an illuminated monogram of U. M. L. The following are the various readings:

THE LIVING HAV A RIGHT TO CONTROL THE WORLD.

FREE THOUGHT WILL GIV US TRUTH.

SUPERSTITION IS THE CHILD OF SLAVERY.

REASON IS THE LAMP OF THE MIND.

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IS MY CATHEDRAL.

UNIVERSAL MENTAL LIBERTY.

THE TIME TO BE HAPPY IS NOW, AND THE PLACE TO BE HAPPY IS HERE.

NEVER TROUBLE TROUBLE TILL TROUBLE TROUBLES YOU.

THE WORLD IS MY COUNTRY; TO DO GOOD MY RELIGION.

The price of each of the foregoing is 25 cents.

For Freethought societies there is a large card 22 x 15 inches, printed in colors, with an engraved heading, containing the Nine Demands of Liberalism. Framed it makes a splendid ornament for the lecture-rooms of Liberal societies. Price, 30 cents. Any of these will be sent postpaid, securely wrapped, on receipt of price.

Gems of Thought.

THERE is, indeed, one true and original law, conformable to reason and nature, diffused over all, invariable, eternal, which calls to the fulfilment of duty and to abstinence from injustice, and which calls with that irresistible voice which is felt in all its authority wherever it is heard. This law cannot be abolished or curtailed, nor affected in its sanctions by any law of man. A whole senate, a whole people, cannot dispense from its paramount obligation. It requires no commentator to render it distinctly intelligible, nor is it different at Rome and at Athens, at the present age and in ages to come; but in all nations and at all times, it is and has been, and will be, one and everlasting—one as that god, its great author and promulgator, who is the common sovereign of all mankind, is himself one. No man can disobey it without flying, as it were, from his own bosom and repudiating his nature, and in this very act will inflict on himself the severest of retributions, even though he escape what is commonly regarded as punishment.—Cicero. [Cicero was nothing but a poor heathen, who lived and died before the gospel made its appearance in the world; but if the virtuous Jesus, or the most illustrious of his immediate followers, St. Paul, Tertullian, St. Chrysostom, or those of later times, who spoke in the name of Jesus Christ, Jeremy Taylor, Bishop Butler, Robert Hall, Dr. Channing, or even the redoubtable Theodore Parker, saw farther into the riddle of the universe than the heathen philosopher did, I should like to be shown some proof of the fact.—C. W. C.]

LET the ghosts go—we will worship them no more! Man is greater than these phantoms. Humanity is grander than all the creeds, than all the books. Humanity is the great sea, and these creeds and books and religions are but the waves of a day. Humanity is the sky, and these religions and dogmas and theories are but the mists and clouds changing continually, destined finally to melt away. Let the ghosts go—we will worship them no more! Let them cover their eyeless sockets with their fleshless hands, and fade forever from the imagination of men.—Ingersoll.

THE seeds are planted and the spring is near.
Ages of blight are but a fleeting frost.
Truth circles unto truth. Each mote is dear
To God. No drop of ocean e'er is lost,
No leaf forever dry and tempest-tossed.
Life centers deathless underneath decay,
And no true word or deed can ever pass away.
—The Church, by C. P. Cranch.

IF it is not an idle optimism to assume that superstition is henceforth impossible, I should at least be glad to know distinctly upon what grounds our security rests. Is it that we individually are so much wiser than our forefathers? I do not wish to underrate modern progress, but surely there is something grotesque in the hypothesis that the average shopkeeper or artisan of the present day is too clever to believe in the creeds of his forefathers. I fancy that no one has yet ascertained that the brain of to-day is more capacious than the brains of the contemporaries of Cæsar or St. Paul. . . . Macaulay prophesied that the Catholic church would endure forever, on the ground that, if Sir Thomas More could believe in the nonsense of transubstantiation, men might always believe in it. If some modern intellects are in advance of More, the great bulk are still far behind him.—Leslie Stephen's Religion of All Sensible Men.

THERE are more feelings in common between England and America than between any other two nations; they hav each more reciprocal advantages to offer to the other; they hav the American admiral's reason, that "blood is thicker than water," for mutual fraternization, for mutual confidence and trust; and the closer and more unitedly they march on together in the van of peace, contesting, none the less for their friendship, in an activ rivalry of trade and commerce, of science and art, so much the better will it be for themselvs, so much the better for the world at large.—Hatton's To day in America.

WHILE the manners, while the arts,
That mold a nation's soul
Still cling around our hearts,
Between let ocean roll,
Our joint communion breaking with the sun;
Yet still, from either beach,
The voice of blood shall reach,
More audible than speech,
"We are one!" —Washington Allsten.

NEITHER is [God] worshiped with men's hands, as though he needed anything, seeing he giveth to all life and breath and all things And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on the face of the earth.—Acts xvii, 25, 26.

IT is only when digested, in a clear and natural order, that truths make their impression on the mind, and that erroneous opinions can be combated with success.—Dugald Stewart's Life of Adam Smith.

OBADIAH, of Fifth avenue (to Mrs. Obadiah): "Aren't you going to church this morning, my dear?" Mrs. O.: "No; I'm compelled to stay at home. Parker says the footman is sick. Fancy how it would look driving to church without a footman on the box!" Mr. O.: "Why don't you take a stage?" Mrs. O.: "Because I think it is downright wicked that the stages are permitted to run on Sunday."

"You can take the witness," said the prosecuting attorney in a trial before an Arkansas court to the defendant's lawyer. "Judge," exclaimed a young man in the back part of the room, standing up on a seat and waving his hands wildly, "don't let him take her! That witness has been engaged to me for more'n three years!"

HUSBAND (to wife): "I've been out half the day trying to collect money, and I'm mad enough to break the furniture. It beats all how some men will put off and put off. A TELEGRAM flashed through the city's cold gloom:
"The roses and heliotropes are in bloom;
The grasses are green and the heavens are blue,
And it's spring where the butterflies scatter the dew."
A bluebird, disconsolate, swung in the sleet
On the wire when this telegram flashed 'neath his feet;
And he lifted his voice, and the first merry note
An icicle melted right out of his throat.

"WHO," inquired Mrs. Placer Maginnis of her husband, the Milesian millionaire from Colorado, "is this Micky Ream that's afther givin' a ball, slap in the middle av the holy season? Lo, somewhere swung in ether free,
The spider sights a nook where he
May dine and sup,
And likewise build a winding stair,
Which flies exploring, unaware,
May tumble up.

Now doth the mute and struggling worm,
Far in his clay deeps, writhe and squirm,
To life recalled,
Wriggle and crawl for all he's worth
To get above the breaking earth
His forehead bald.

Now, in his lone and dark domain,
The cockroach plans his spring campaign
With studious mind;
And to the bearing of a sage
Unites the seeming of great age
And thought refined.

The frog is glad, and tries his voice
Yet softly, for he has no choice
But still to wait
Until the season really opes,
And an engagement crown his hopes
With joy elate.

As for musketoes, wasps, and bees,
And other things, as prompt as these
To bite and sting,
If only kindly Nature would
Forget to waken them, for good—
Thrice welcome, spring!

A CANDIDATE FOR GLORY.—AN OLD SINNER BUT A NEW SAINT.

Notes and Clippings.

MARY HODGES, a habitual smoker for many years, and who admits that her favorit beverage was rum, recently d ed at Elton, Hunts, Eng., in her one hundred and first year, possessing her full faculties.

ONE effect of the late emperor's death is that fully thirty thousand of the Germans resident in England, who evaded the conscription and the call to arms on the breaking out of the Franco-Prussian war, will be now free to visit the fatherland without incurring the risk of being tried by court-martial as deserters, as their offense is only coeval with the late emperor's reign.

THE Chinese authorities were officially notified of the last eclipse of the moon, and were instructed what to do when the event took place. They were to wear court dress, beat gongs, and save the moon from being swallowed up by the sun, as usual, as long as the moon was above the horizon. When she disappeared they were to make one low obeisance, but need not bother to save her any longer when she was below the horizon.

Two little girls living on Seventh street were quarreling the other day over the possession of a doll. Their struggle in time waxed fierce, and their mother attempted to interpose in a gentle, motherly way. "There, there, little girls, you mustn't quarrel like that; what do you read in your Bible?" "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," was the unexpected response of one of the little belligerents. And the struggle went on.

WE are shocked and grieved at the fact that our religious contemporary, the Mail and Express, unblushingly publishes the advertisments of the sale of obscene books and other indecent objects. Col. Elliott F. Shepard may put verses of scripture at the head of his leading columns, but he cannot thus redeem his paper from the reproach which these advertisments bring upon it and on him. If he would leave out the verses on the days when he prints the advertisments, the paper would not look so hypocritical as it now does.—Sun.

WE shall watch with interest, says the Sun of this city, the administration of public affairs in the Kansas town of Oskaloosa, which is now under control of the mayoress and five councilwomen who were elected to office on the 3d of this month. They are expected to conduct the government of the place in a way that will be a caution to the wicked portion of its 2,000 inhabitants. When they entered upon their duties last Friday it looked as though Mayoress Lowman and Councilwomen Morse, Johnson, Golden, Hamilton, and Balsely were about to adopt what the late Mr. Bristed of this city used to call the "policy of interference," or, in other words, were anxious to regulate things very strictly and exercise a close supervision over the morals, manners, and habits of the people of Oskaloosa, suppressing not only the saloons, but also the pool tables, and so forth. Of course there is danger that excessiv rigor of government will soon prove irksome and intolerable to the inhabitants, and that they will revolt against the iron policy of their female rulers. But we must watch and wait, without feeling uneasy about the novel experiment. It appears that all the new functionaries are women of marked piety. The mayoress is a Presbyterian, four of the councilwomen are Methodists, and one of them is an Episcopalian. As to politics, four of the five councilwomen are Democrats, one is a Republican, and the mayoress is a Republican. At latest accounts the wickedest people of Oskaloosa were in full flight for Topeka.

IN France the commission on the budget in the Chamber of Deputies proposed the unqualified rejection of all votes of credit for public worship, except a sum of thirty million francs for life pensions to ecclesiastics now in office. This significant proposal was too radical for the government, yet it was supported by 180 votes—that is to say, the majority of the Republican party. Large reductions, however, hav been made in the sums allotted to religious purposes, and among other things the moneys granted to the Protestant theological faculties will cease. Dr. Pressensé, despite his professed advocacy of the complete separation of church and state, at some future time when he himself will not feel the blow, is very sore. He calls this "a truly hateful policy," and says that the Conservativ Catholics who agreed to this suppression of the Protestant faculties are sharpening the knife to cut their own throat. So be it!—London Freethinker.

THOMAS STEVENS, who rode through Europe and Asia on a bicycle, writes to the Sun his impression of the Turks: "The mulishness of the average Mohammedan, for instance, when it comes to being saved, is something appalling to a person who has his eternal welfare in view. The Mohammedan is as stubborn, or stubborner, than the Christian even about forsaking his own religion for another. Few Mohammedans can understand the perverseness of Christians in refusing to come over bodily to Islamism and be saved. On the other hand, it seemed to me that to beard the Mussulman in his own country and try to convince him that any other religion is better than his own must be a good deal like trying to pull a three-hundred-pound pig through a knot-hole. The Mohammedan regards the Christian missionary much as we should regard a Persian mollah who should come over here and proselyte for the religion of the Prophet. As a matter of fact, I think, the mollah would hav the advantage. A Persian mollah, in his flowing robes and big white turban, prostrating toward Mecca and sighing away down into his heels, is a picture not devoid of a certain amount of fascination. I hav seen mollahs in Persia who, if they would only make themselvs up and come over to, say, Boston, and start up a revival, would convert lots of people by the mere magnetism of their appearance and the strange fervor of their devotions. It is a cold fact that among the teeming millions of Asia I discovered twice as many Christians who had embraced Mohammedanism as I did Mussulmans who had entered into the Christian fold—twice as many! To come down to actual statistics, compiled at odd times as I went from country to country, I figured up one Mohammedan, who had experienced a change of religion and two Christians. There may be more than this in the whole world, perhaps, but these are all I obtained positiv evidence of."

Communications.

Robert G. Ingersoll in Politics.

What might hav been, is, generally speaking, an unprofitable subject for discussion. But those who know Mr. Ingersoll, his remarkable qualities of mind, and his interesting public career, must readily perceive that had he thrown himself into politics and observed the ordinary tactics of politicians, repressing the honest impulses and promptings of his great heart and brain, he would hav been a leader among leaders and would probably hav obtained the high position, or that which was formerly a high position in this government, of president of the United States. But Mr. Ingersoll has done better out of politics than in politics. Were the situation of to-day what it will undoubtedly be in the near future, Mr. Ingersoll would in all probability be recognized as the Moses to lead us into the promised land. The people need a little more education, as yet, before they will be prepared to accept such a man as Mr. Ingersoll as their Moses, but, nevertheless, there is no man in this country to day better qualified to lead the people out of the wilderness which now envelops us than Mr. Ingersoll. A few years later and the people will be ready, but Mr. Ingersoll may then be in his grave; but it is to be hoped that a competent Moses may then be discovered.

I enjoyed the high privilege of an acquaintance with both Mr. Ingersoll and Mr. Lincoln when they were participants in the politics of Illinois, and I may say that I hav not been an idle observer of the forces which hav brought these two men prominently to the front. The people in 1860 had become ripe for just such a man as Mr. Lincoln, but two years before he would hav been almost unanimously rejected. In 1858 Mr. Lincoln had no opposition among the Republicans of Illinois for the senatorship, but even then his great genius was unknown or unappreciated except by a few. He devoted the summer of 1858 to the discussion before the people of the immense issues then at stake. It was by or through these speeches made in his great senatorial campaign that Mr. Lincoln was discovered. It was a happy discovery, and much credit is due to his discoverers for their herculean efforts in bringing about his nomination for the presidency in 1860. I was in that movement and know something of the difficulties we had to encounter. The Republican party was made up largely of the old Whig party, and those who had been mere politicians in that party were almost invariably opposed to Lincoln. But at this time there came to the front a new element in politics, caring nothing for office but much for principle. The men composing this element were industrious, persistent, and aggressiv, and the more they studied Lincoln the better they liked him.

Mr. Ingersoll was first known in politics in 1860, when he became a candidate for Congress in the Peoria district on the Democratic ticket. He was then only about twenty-six years of age, and looked and acted like a big overgrown boy. He was a total stranger to such a principle as dignity. He was overflowing with good nature and wit, and his speeches at that time pleased the crowd more than they instructed it. A year or two later, when the war broke upon us, Mr. Ingersoll became more serious and in earnest. Now he began to discover deep thought and impassioned utterances which thrilled and stirred his hearers and carried them to higher and better conceptions of their duties to government and to each other. He espoused the Republican cause, enlisted for the war, was taken prisoner, got home again, concluded that war was not his forte, and resigned. He was in great demand as a speaker during the latter part of the war, and no man in Illinois did more for the cause of the Union than did Mr. Ingersoll.

In 1866, or about that time, Mr. Ingersoll was appointed attorney-general of the state by Governor Oglesby. The law at that time made this office appointiv, but in 1868 it became electiv, and Mr. Ingersoll seemed to hav no opposition for the nomination. For governor, the Republicans of the state with great unanimity looked to Gen. John M. Palmer as their candidate. He had made a good record in the war, and it seemed eminently proper that General Palmer should be made governor. But he persistently declined. This seemed to make his friends determined to nominate and elect him. Then General Palmer communicated to his nearest friends his wish to become a United States senator. It was not suspected at that time, but it has since been discovered that there was a presidential bee in Palmer's bonnet. He wanted to go in national politics rather than in state politics. When he found his party determined to make him governor instead of senator, he thought he would head off the movement by bringing out a candidate for governor on whom the party might unite. He selected Ingersoll, who was then attorney-general, and called him into a council. He urged upon him to become a candidate. He promised him all the aid and influence he possessed. Mr. Ingersoll reluctantly consented, and only upon assurances that Mr. Palmer under no circumstances would accept the nomination. Mr. Ingersoll left Springfield and went home to Peoria and other portions of the state to consult with friends. A boom was immediately started for Mr. Ingersoll for governor.

I was then an editor in central Illinois, and had the honor of writing about the first article which made public mention of him as a candidate. In the convention my county gave a solid vote for Mr. Ingersoll. At that time it was more unpopular to bear the name of Infidel than now, and although Mr. Ingersoll had never given a public lecture upon the subject, yet he was honest enough to avow his convictions, and busybodies were thick, working upon the ignorant prejudices of the delegates against his nomination. In spite of the declaration of General Palmer that he would not accept the nomination, he was nominated and he did accept. An earnest endeavor was made to get Mr. Ingersoll to accept the nomination for attorney-general. They were willing, it seems, to make him attorney-general notwithstanding his Infidelity, but not governor. Mr. Ingersoll replied: "When I say I am a candidate for a particular office I mean it, and when I say I am not a candidate for a particular office I mean that too. When I became a candidate for governor, I renounced my candidacy for attorney-general and other candidates were invited into the field. I would despise myself forever were I now to become a candidate against any of these men whom by my action I hav invited to become candidates." It was thus that he expressed his opinion of John M. Palmer. I do not think he has ever spoken to him from that day to this. This episode so disgusted Mr. Ingersoll with politics that for eight years his voice was not heard upon the hustings. He attended strictly to his law business, except that upon a few rare occasions he lent his voice and presence in commemoration of the birthday of that great and noble man, Thomas Paine.

In 1876 Mr. Ingersoll was elected a delegate to the Republican national convention at Cincinnati. By this time John M. Palmer had got into the Democratic party, but I cannot say whether this, or in fact what influence, induced Mr. Ingersoll to again enter the political arena. But it was in that year that Mr. Ingersoll made his great nominating speech in behalf of the Plumed Knight, which induced thousands who heard him to inquire, "Who is this man?" From that moment his name has gone forth until it is now spoken and printed in almost every language known to man. In that campaign thousands were delighted and instructed by his logic and his eloquence. His friends presented his name to President Hayes for the Berlin mission, but the brethren and sisters of the Methodist church rallied against him, and through Mrs. Hayes prevented his nomination. Since then Mr. Ingersoll has taken no part in party politics, and probably never will again unless there should come a social upheaval calling for the exercise of his peculiar talents.

The Mission of Freethinkers.

At a time when skepticism so generally pervades the masses, and the ranks of the Liberals are being continually augmented, it may be well to pause and consider our duty, our mission, in this great work of reform, and the responsibilities which must devolve upon us as reformers.

It is in vain for the church to claim that their cause is not dying at the root, and rotting at the heart. New churches are constantly rising; large additions to their number are constantly received; but among all classes there is a feeling of unrest, a mad and ineffectual effort to reconcile science with religion, and there proceeds from this attempt a spirit of liberality, of actual doubt, a tendency to let every man do his own thinking and to recklessly disobey the dictation of the priesthood. Men are becoming braver, and evince less disposition to conceal their independence; they dread no longer the displeasure of their believing friends, but boldly proclaim their Infidelity, and allegiance to the cause of freedom.

But out of this must come order, not chaos. One of the most alarming features of the present time is a tendency to set all laws or governments at defiance. This will not do. Our freedom must not go too far; it must not be Anarchical or immoral.

When we manifest sympathy with Anarchy, we weaken our cause; and nothing else is so damaging to our prospects as the expressions of sympathy, by some of our number, with the wretched murderers who were executed at Chicago last November.

Let no one call these dastardly criminals martyrs to any cause or any people. The American laborer has wrongs, but they must be righted through the processes of law and not this Anarchy or revolution.

There are some, too, who would strike a blow at the marriage altar. For such we cannot hav too great contempt; we are Agnostics who believe in absolute freedom of thought, but free love, Anarchy, or Socialism we disapprove of and despise. Because they are free from the restraints of the church, these men, failing utterly to distinguish right and wrong, would put an end to all restraint and giv free license to the vicious and the lawless in their indulgence in all the passions which are implanted in the human heart.

With such as these for our allies our task is great. There is more for us to do than simply to tear down the fabric of Christianity. We must trample under foot all superstitions, or beliefs in the supernatural; but the code of morals, promulgated by Christ himself, cannot be improved. While we abhor all creeds and all religions, except the religion of humanity, we must not forget the man Christ, who was one of the greatest reformers and most patient martyrs the world has ever seen.

Our mission is, first, to discourage all missionary enterprises, for, while we concede freedom of thought to every man, we should strive to prevent pious fanatics from robbing the poor and needy of our own land to minister to the imagined spiritual wants of other nations. Secondly, we must be pure ourselvs; we should remember that we are subjected to the strictest surveillance of our Christian critics, and whatever they find amiss in us will at once be pointed out and attributed to our want of, and disregard for, their religion.

We must not be ashamed of our convictions; we should remember that we are no longer rebels to ecclesiastical authority, but armed with the decrees of science.

It is not necessary to be forever sneering at religion, or insulting those who hav faith beyond their understanding; but, when occasion demands, we should be ready to declare our principles and our reasons for believing as we do.

But we must not lose our respect for government. Laws may occasionally be found unjust, but, such as they are, they must be obeyed. However, our laws, our government, our flag, are the best, the grandest, that the world has ever known.

Mindful of the heroes who achieved our independence as a nation, and hav since preserved it in peace and war, in sunshine and in storm, we should let nothing dampen our patriotism or our zeal.

Under our splendid and successful republican government the sons of freedom may win new victories, see their ripened efforts crowned with perfect success, and press on to triumphs yet to be.

Instruction Humbly Requested.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I see by an editorial in The Truth Seeker of the 3d inst. that the National Reform Association will hold a national convention in the city of New York next April.

This announcement has been the moving spirit that has moved me to indite a few theological questions, which I respectfully dedicate to the clergy in general, and that portion of them that belong to the National Reform Association in particular. And it would be high treason or rank heresy to deny, or even to doubt, that each and every member of this association does not possess the most perfect knowledge and the most accurate information in regard to the doings, designs, and purposes of their Lord God almighty and his blessed son the Lord Jesus Christ.

I would, therefore, respectfully suggest that the said convention be presented a copy of The Truth Seeker containing the questions referred to. And as these questions hav been presented with no other object in view than that of obtaining correct and reliable information on the subjects to which they refer, I hope that the members of the said convention, and the clergy in particular, will giv these questions due and deliberate consideration, and feel themselvs called upon to giv intelligible and correct answers to the following:

Do you believe that there is a personal God who created from nothing this vast universe, with all it contains?

If God created the human race, are not the human race God's creatures?

Has not the creator power to control the thoughts and actions of the creatures he created?

If the creature can think and act contrary to the will of the creator, would not it prove that the creature had more power than the creator?

If the creature can do nothing contrary to the will of the creator, is not the creator to blame when the creature does wrong?

If God wished and desired the welfare and happiness of the human race, why did he create evil? why did he create the devil?

Did God know before he created Adam and Eve that they would disobey and commit sin?

If God created Adam and Eve, the serpent, the tree, and all the conditions, knowing what the result would be, did he not do wrong in cursing the unborn millions for Adam and Eve doing just what he knew they would do before he created them?

If there was war in heaven, as we read in Rev. xii, and a holy angel became a devil by sinning, did not sin originate in heaven? How, then, could Adam and Eve be the original sinners?

If man possesses an immortal soul or spirit, why should he be left ignorant in regard to a matter of such extreme importance, if true? Did God know before the creation just who would and who would not be saved?

How was his plan of salvation to help those that he knew would be lost? Is it compatible with infinit goodness that any should be lost?

Can a personal God be omnipresent? How can any organized being or form be omnipresent?

What is God, anyhow? Can anyone tell? Can God be defined or described? If a personal God or any kind of a God exists, why should the world be kept in ignorance of his existence?

If the existence of a personal God cannot be proved, how then can it be proved that God had a son? Is the immaculate conception story a fact or a fiction—which?

Is God infinit? and if so, does not the infinit include everything that exists? Consequently God must either be everything or nothing; and if Christ was God, he, too, was infinit. But we read that Christ was crucified, and that he died. Did the infinit die? Is not the idea of a dead infinit, or of a dead God, the hight of absurdity?

Does an infinit God demand or require the services of an army of priests and preachers? Can the antics and the babbling of those self-appointed ranters change the decrees of the infinit? Can the finite add to or detract from the infinit?

Do the clergy possess more reliable and trustworthy information and a more perfect knowledge than all other men in regard to the supernatural and the incomprehensible? And if so, how and where do they obtain their superior knowledge and information in regard to that of which nothing can be known?

Is what is popularly called religion anything more than the superstitious worship of the supernatural and the incomprehensible, and are not all religions founded on superstitious faith in the supernatural and the incomprehensible, and not upon facts?

If God desired the conversion of the heathen to any other creed than their own, has not he power to convert them without the aid of missionaries, or can missionaries do what God cannot? When a Christian missionary succeeds in converting a heathen, does he do more than induce the heathen to adopt the Christian superstition in the place of his own superstition? Is not superstition superstition anyhow?

Was Christ born at two different times fourteen years apart, or did the other fellow lie? (See Matt. ii, 1; Luke ii, 1–8)

If Christ was God and he once had power to feed five or six thousand people with a few small loaves and fishes, why has he never exercised that power since then in behalf of the multitudes that hav starved? Has he lost his power?

If Christ was God, he must hav known all things past, present, and future. Why, then, did he not impart to the world some useful practical knowledge for the instruction, enlightenment, and civilization of the human race? Why did not he say something about the printing-press; something about astronomy, geology, and chemistry, and how to construct the telescope, microscope, and mariner's compass, and the uses of steam and electricity? Why did not he say the earth is not flat, but round, and the sun does not go round it? Why did not he tell the exact location of heaven and hell? Why did not he tell just exactly what the soul is, and not hav left it to mere conjecture and theological speculation? Why did not he forbid the persecution or punishment of any person whomsoever on account of his religious belief, or his honest convictions or opinions? Why did not he say: About the year 1888 look out for a lot of brainless, hypocritical cranks called the National Reform Association, which said association stands more in need of being reformed than any other association we know of, with the single exception of Anthony Comstock's? Why didn't he? And echo answered, Why didn't he?

The number of questions of like nature and character as the foregoing might be extended almost indefinitly. However, I shall not at this time commit further trespass on valuable space, but anxiously await the replies solicited. THOMAS KNOIT.

The Indian Problem Again.

Having, in a former communication, considered the reservation system politically, I will in this paper briefly glance at the state of morals incident to the system.

Schools hav been established, churches hav been built, money (both public and private) has been lavishly squandered, preachers hav preached, and teachers hav taught, for the purposes of making Indians religious and moral. Not only hav expensiv schools been conducted on reservations, but others hav been established in civilized centers, remote from traditional and tribal influences, and, in addition, some parochial or mission schools are receiving subsidies, from public funds, for teaching Indians.

Little good has been done. Reservation Indians are very immoral, however devout they may be.

Some of the most depraved girls to be found upon reservations can speak, read, and write English.

It was, probably, thought that these favored ones would imbibe enough morality to last them and to impart to their friends at home, but, upon their return to their people, many of them, perhaps the majority, hav thrown off modesty and plunged into the pool of degradation with an abandon astonishing to even Indians. However, it must be said that all, or nearly all, are religious. The preachers are successful. Indians are regular in attendance at meeting. On this reservation all cross themselvs before eating; none of them will eat meat on Friday; all fast through Lent; they wear medals having a little Jesus on one side and a little Virgin Mary on the other; but, alas, there are no virgins among them over twelve or thirteen years old.

The males all lie when it suits them, steal when they dare, and get drunk when they can; and the females do exactly the same, and are prostitutes in addition. The most devout ones appear to be most depraved.

The most powerful among the causes of the existing state of affairs is the reservation system itself.

The laws enacted for the purpose of perfecting the system and protecting the Indians are the factors that giv the immorality mentioned, as the logical and inevitable result.

With Indians moral precepts are nothing, but example would be nearly everything.

The laws exclude white people from the reservations, and reputable, law-abiding people obey; but lawless, vicious men, heedless of all restraint, go where they please, and it thus happens that an element is found along the borders and upon reservations, when the officials are not in presence, that sets pernicious examples and carries on the work of demoralization. Thus Indians hav neither examples nor inducements to be moral.

Where they hav abandoned the reservations and established permanent homes among white people they hav, as a rule, compared pretty well with their neighbors.

Under the reservation system Indians are decreasing in numbers. Venereal diseases are quietly but surely carrying them to the "happy hunting ground." Even reservation officials at times become afflicted in this way. Yet a little longer, and the reservations will be inhabited only by salaried partisan pets, a species of the genus national ward, for all of whom the most generous administration finds it difficult to provide.

Idleness, which is an essential feature of the reservation system. is another factor in the prevalent immorality. Necessity for labor has in all ages been the staff upon which civilization has relied to assist her progress. That necessity is being withheld from reservation Indians.

An Indian cannot make a contract without the consent of the Indian agent. He cannot sell anything unless the agent be satisfied with the price. In other words, an Indian is hedged in like a child, and taught that he is not competent to do anything for himself; that the great father at Washington sends good men to tell him what to do and how to do it; that white men outside of the reservation will cheat; and that his only refuge is in the agent, etc. He is likewise told that the great father will provide blankets, hats, cloth, shoes, stockings, cattle for beef, etc. All this, of course, obviates the necessity of troubling himself about anything, except to obtain what money he needs to buy whisky with, seeing that none of that important article is issued by the great father; and, verily, if whisky were issued, few Indians would take the trouble to steal even.

The rational solution of the Indian problem is the dispersion of the tribes and the withdrawal of supplies, so as to make energy and work a necessity.

Fort Colville, W. T., March 2, 1888. V. ARIER.

Lincoln and Anti-Liquor.

If "Truth Seeker" will show himself with his cognizable label on, I will credit him for his compliments. How is it that there are so many truth seekers who are so unsuccessful? Are they akin to those who go about searching for work hoping they won't find any?

My method of antagonizing the damnable industry of drunkard-making is indeed an earnest one, and if I hav not denounced it more strongly than others it is because I do not know how. Had I the wit of Ingersoll, the logic of Watts, the poetry of Putnam, the incisivness of Washburn, the dignity of Wakeman, and the rapidity of Remsburg all superimposed on my own personality, I might then begin to express my sentiments on the temperance subject somewhat as the matter demands. My method is based upon the principle of hitting the nail on the head, and hitting it hard enough to drive it in. And this was the method of President Lincoln, as the intoxicated Confederacy investigated to its cost.

His words were, "With charity for all, with malice toward none," magnanimously uttered after he had fulfilled his purpose to "maintain the dignity of my office, if need be, at the point of the bayonet."

Lincoln said of slavery, in his inaugural address:

I hav no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the states where it exists. I believe I hav no lawful right to do so, and I hav no intention to do so.

Yet, what Lincoln did do was to bend his back under the pressure of necessity, and, in his practice, break the bonds that a temporizing policy had, for years, welded the stronger. And if those who are so fond of quoting his moderation sayings will only pattern after his actions, I shall be satisfied. His principle of the preservation of the Union at all hazards is justifiable on the postulates that without the Union we cannot maintain anything, and that with and by the Union we can overmaster great wrongs, in time. Turn that "Lincoln Memorial Album" to page 98, and read this:

Finally, I insist that if there is anything which it is the duty of the whole people to never intrust to any hands but their own, that thing is, the preservation and perpetuity of their own liberties and institutions. And if they shall think, as I do, that the extension of slavery endangers them more than any or all other causes, how recreant to themselvs if they submit the question, and with it the fate of their country, to a mere handful of men, bent only on temporary self-interest! If this question of slavery extension were an insignificant one—one having no power to do harm—it might be shuffled aside in this way; but being as it is, the great behemoth of danger, shall the strong gripe of the nation be loosed upon him, to intrust him to the hands of such feeble keepers? I hav done with this mighty argument of self-government. Go, sacred thing! go in peace! Much as I hate slavery, I would consent to the extension of it rather than see the Union dissolved, just as I would consent to any great evil to avoid a greater one. But when I go to Union-saving I must believe, at least, that the means I employ hav some adaptation to the end.—Peoria Speech, 1854.

And he did employ such means to their full measure when he went to "Union-saving," and precisely such means will hav to be again employed by some other Lincoln to save the Union from the "behemoth" of intemperance, to which slavery was but a mouse, if not slain before it gets greater with its impudence. It was drunken legislators that hatched secession; it was drunken revelry that weakened the ancient civilizations. It was the insanity of drunkenness that involved Europe in the toils of superstition, denied it every comfort, and set the fires of persecution flaming. And now the unconscionable curse cries out against reason's avengers: "Personal liberty is in danger! Pass no sumptuary laws." If prohibition of the liquor traffic is sumptuary, then licensing it is sumptuary, for the license law is a prohibition on those who do not pay. But I read the dictionary better than to thus misapply the word.

Sumptuary laws or regulations, such as restrain or limit the expenses of citizens in apparel, food, furniture, or the like.—Webster.

Is liquor apparel? is it food? is it furniture? is it the like? No, nor nothing like! It is the despoiler of every good, and the producer of none. It is the author and finisher of nakedness, of hunger, of want of every kind. The liquor prohibition law is designed to help procure, and to enhance the people's enjoyment of, apparel, food, furniture, and the like; but, more than all, its direct purpose is to abate the nuisance of drunkenness, and let reason rule the day and peace protect the night.

I giv one more quotation from "an intemperate temperance advocate," not because names are necessary to establish what is patent to all observers, but just to show that I am not singular in my insanity, but hav on my behalf those best qualified to decide:

Intemperance is more devastating than war, famin, and pestilence.—Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone.

The principal cause of war, famin, and pestilence, say I; and, if war be necessary to sweep it away, then I would welcome the war, and down those who want personal liberty to poison themselvs or pollute their fellows. I cannot make this stronger, though had I at my disposal the share of THE TRUTH SEEKER that the question deserves, I would make my story longer. Yet I hope "Truth Seeker" will be able to use this short cudgel as a pointer: Are not three-fourths of the laws prohibitory?

A Curious Old Story-Book.

From the Winsted Press.

The Boston Herald recently sent out a circular of inquiry to a large number of clergymen and representativ religious thinkers asking them to giv their "strongest proofs and arguments in support of a belief in a life hereafter." Twenty-two replies were received, and the best evidence that the ministers could present was taken from a curious old story-book of uncertain authorship, wherein are found sundry legends of very questionable authenticity respecting the appearance of ghosts on a few extraordinary occasions in very ancient times. One Jesus, whose existence is quite doubtful, is said to hav risen from the dead and so brought immortality to light. But according to the same story-book he was a God, and the Boston Herald did not seek proofs in support of a belief in a life hereafter for Gods. Common men like Peter, and James, and Thomas are concerned in the question. They wish to know what evidence there is of a life hereafter for men, and the ministers hav nothing better to offer than a few fabulous stories selected from a book of fables, over which they are in continual wrangle among themselvs. It is no wonder that intelligent men look with contempt upon such proof of immortality as this.

The Forum.

Last Sunday the members of the Chicago Secular Union were fully recompensed for years of arduous toil and seemingly thankless efforts by the grand demonstration and deep public interest manifested on the occasion of the dedication of their new building, the Forum, from a sanctuary of superstition to a temple devoted to science and reason. The largest audience was there assembled that ever attended a Liberal meeting—except Ingersoll's lectures—since the writer has lived in Chicago. Every seat was taken before the exercises commenced, standing-room was at a premium, and many were unable to gain entrance. The decorations were unique. As a background for the arch at the rear of the rostrum were grouped appropriate mottoes, fringed with a canopy-like border of American flags. Ranged in front of these, so as not to obscure them, was a floral design about twenty feet in length, "The Forum." Under the flowers on a pale blue satin banner, trimmed with silver fringe, was a most artistic piece of shading executed by Professor Rice, on which was our motto: "Universal Mental Liberty." Overhanging the arch was an American flag and a cross recumbent, symbolic of "Our flag above the cross," while on the rostrum was an immense bouquet of flowers, and some rich and handsome rugs. We are indebted to Mrs. Dr. Henry for the beautiful floral display.

Through the kindness of Dr. E. S. McLeod the Mendelssohn quartet (the leading male quartet of the city) assisted that of the Secular Union, and the local press spoke particularly of the excellence of the music, thanks to our leader, Mr. J. S. Card, and Mr. Huddleston's excellent performance at the organ.

The exercises consisted of an opening address by the president, in which I outlined the necessity of organization to maintain the most distinguished characteristic and priceless boon of American liberty, religious freedom, secured to us by our heroic Freethinking founders, to guard and preserve which was the precious heritage of all who loved mental liberty. After music, Professor Orchardson followed with his stinging sarcasms on the chronology of Christ, and was succeeded by Professor Milleson—well known to the Investigator readers—in a similar vein. Then came C. S. Darrow, who, next to General Stiles, is the best extempore speaker of the Chicago bar. Gen. I. N. Stiles is admittedly the leading legal luminary of our city, if not of the West, usually bristling with wit, humor, and sarcasm. His intellectual light shone bright enough, in his parody on Easter sermons, and what we don't know about Christ, to keep the audience in a continuous ripple of laughter. Judge Paige, who is a perfect encyclopedia of science, urged the importance of scientific education, and was proud to place the honor to the credit of the Chicago Union of being the pioneer in this essential work. Prof. W. S. Bell ably replied to one speaker who inferred that had Colonel Ingersoll devoted as much time to science as he had to ridicule much more would hav been accomplished. By request, Mrs. Freeman gave, in her inimitable manner, "The Guardian Angel," which met with uproarious applause, and Prof. Wm. C. Wilson declaimed an original poem called, "Dust," which was well received. At the close of the exercises large additions were made to our membership.

One circumstance of which we may feel justly proud was the fact that on our platform was an aggregation of intellect—men of deserved reputation and celebrity in some department of science or jurisprudence who hav achieved particular distinction, not the least of whom was Dr. S. V. Clevenger, who in the domain of psychology has made discoveries which are claimed to be as important to science as the labors of Darwin. Owing to the lateness of the hour Dr. Clevenger declined to speak, but the announcement was made that he would be willing to contribute his services to the science classes, and we hav put him down for a lecture next month.

Some acknowledgment is due to members who contributed so largely of their time and labor gratuitously to preparing the building for our occupancy, prominent among whom are Mrs. Jas Gruber, Thos. Andrews, John Boch, Alfred Mutz, and Louis Chalavet.

Prof. W. S. Bell, who recently returned from a lecture tour, has begun the compilation of a Freethinkers' hand-book, which will contain some four hundred pages, in which a condensation will be found of all the facts and arguments necessary to refute all the fundamental Christian doctrins. This will be a very valuable addition to Freethought literature, and Mr. Bell's vast experience is, in itself, sufficient guarantee that the work will be well done.

Following is a slight synopsis of Gen. Stiles's address, also that of C. S. Darrow, as reported in the Times:

C. S Darrow said: "If I never believed in evolution before, I should firmly believe in it now, when I find that this building has been developed by the process of survival of the fittest from a church into a forum for free discussion. The Christian religion is not a life assurance company, as my friend has said; it is essentially intended for insurance against fire. The religion for which we are struggling and which must prevail in the future is not based upon intuitions of a supreme being, nor upon force, of which we hav had more than enough, but has laid its foundations deep in human reason, and shall be ultimately erected into an edifice standing four-square to every wind that blows by the intelligent action of the individuals who constitute society." The speaker then dwelt upon human happiness and the application of the utilitarian doctrins.

Gen. I. N. Stiles said: "Do you know that this is an anniversary, that these handsome flowers are Easter offerings in honor of a man who, 1,855 years ago, died and was buried? He descended into hell. The third day he rose again from the dead and ascended into heaven and sitteth at the right hand of God, and so on. It would take to-night and to-morrow night, the night after, and several other nights in addition to mention all that has been said about this man which is not true, but it would take not more than fifteen minutes to mention all we know, taken from the four evangelists, whose record of the events was not made until forty years after the death of Christ. It is surprising how little we know of the infant Jesus, except that business about the Holy Ghost. There are none of those cunning stories about the child Jesus that we know of in connection with our own children. We don't know what his sensations were over his first pair of shoes, or when cutting his teeth, or when passing through the interesting period of mumps, whooping cough, and measles. But the scene changed when the boy became twelve-year-old. His parents took him up to Jerusalem, and by some strange oversight forgot to carry the little boy Jesus home again. They went back to find him and behold he was confounding the doctors! Now, we know something of precocious children. We can understand what sort of a boy John Stuart Mill was when we know that he was a good Greek scholar at seven years of age. John Hale, the great Baptist preacher, argued forcibly upon abstract and difficult questions before his eleventh year. He was an extraordinary boy, but we can understand it because we hav had proofs. But no one has ever found out the questions with which the little boy Jesus confounded the doctors, and we cannot find out except by the analogy of our own children, who puzzle us often enough with such posers as, 'Who are God's pa and ma?' We hear nothing more of Jesus then until his thirtieth year, when he was an itinerant minister in Palestine. He taught no new truths except, 'Take no thought for to-morrow; remember the sparrows, and the people will take care of you.' His followers ever since hav followed his instructions implicitly! The Sermon on the Mount had been preached hundreds of years before he was born. However, we are glad to know that the common people heard him gladly. The fact of the matter is that Christ was the Ingersoll of his age. He said more bitter things against the priests of his time than Ingersoll has ever said against the priests of the nineteenth century. Leaving out the miracles, Christ did absolutely nothing. He never said one word in favor of industry, temperance, truthfulness or chastity, and was very mild in his attacks upon adultery. He never did a stroke of work in his life, and desired his disciples to follow his example. Anything that was good in what he said had been said long before, and ever so much better. This reminds me of the story of the Oxford man who asked the professor for information about St. George. 'Well,' said the professor, 'in the first place, we don't know much about St. George; in the second place, what we do know is utterly untrustworthy, and in the third place, we are never likely to know anything more about St. George.' In conclusion let me say this: You hav taken possession of the building. I hope you will never cease in your demands that church property shall hav to take its part in bearing the burden of the country's taxation."

General Stiles was highly applauded, and was succeeded by Judge E. R. Paige, who spoke in favor of positiv knowledge, and of teaching children the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Edgar C. Beall, chairman of the finance committee, having resigned on account of inability to attend to the duties, the board of directors of the American Secular Union decided to select some person in Chicago so that the secretary can confer with them without delay. The choice lay between Dr. McLeod and Mrs. Freeman, but as the former declined to be considered as a candidate on account of his professional duties, the unanimous choice is for Mrs. Freeman, so she will be inducted in the duties forthwith, and if she makes as good a record in that capacity as she did as secretary of the Chicago Secular Union, we shall hav no reason to regret the selection.

E. A. STEVENS.

MRS. FREEMAN'S ACCOUNT.

The dedication of the new hall of the Chicago Secular Union, corner of Washington boulevard and Sangamon street, Sunday evening, April 1st, was a grand success. The audience was a magnificent one—the house packed—"standing-room only" greeted the late comers. Every foot was filled, and many had to turn reluctantly away. Gas jets gleamed through the center, lighting the aisles; chandeliers cast a softened shadow over the rostrum, gaily decked and adorned with flags and flowers; the handsome, well-dressed young gentlemen ushers—members of the Union—filled the positions assigned them with dignity and decorum.

A beautiful bouquet of flowers—a magnificent centerpiece of roses and lilies—adorned the table. At the back of the stage the stars and stripes were draped. Here also were placed mottoes from Washington, Garfield, and Grant. At the front floated the "flag above the cross." The "cross," by the way, once pointed proudly heavenward, but iconoclastic hands hav laid it low, and it now hangs at half-mast beneath the red, white, and blue—the emblem of American liberty. Over the center of the stage was a fine floral display, embodying in brilliant colors the name of the hall, "The Forum." Beneath this hung a bright blue satin banner, with silver fringe, bearing the inscription, "Universal Mental Liberty."

On the platform was seated E. A. Stevens, president of the Union, looking happy, proud, and confident—like a general reviewing his army after battle. It had been hard work, how hard only those who did it knew, but out of the chaos of cleaning, scouring, scrubbing, painting, and refitting had come order and victory. So like a great general he sat there resting placidly on his laurels, while Dr. McLeod, at the farther end of the hall, walked about among the people, finding a seat here and there for the tardy, as proud of the success of the Union as Hercules at the accomplishment of his task. Gen. I. N. Stiles, C. S. Darrow, Prof. Chas. Orchardson, Professor Bell, Judge E. R. Paige, Prof. James Milleson, Professor Wilson, and Dr. Clevenger also occupied seats on the rostrum.

In the opening address Mr. Stevens said that we had hoped in this our new hall there would be room for all, but that instead of its being too large, as many had thought, it was even now, at so early a date, proving itself too small. He read the Nine Demands constituting the basis of the society's work, cited the encroachments of the church demonstrating the necessity of our existence, repeated the words of Garfield and Grant foreshadowing the danger of ecclesiastical power, and concluded his address with a graceful allusion to the emblem above him, stating that the object of the American Secular Union is to place "our flag above the cross."

The immense audience responded to this sentiment with enthusiastic applause. Following Mr. Stevens was Prof. James Milleson. The professor is one of the best geologists in the country, and he spoke in regard to the evolution of man. He had seen the storm and lightning, had heard the thunder, and through fear of these had made his "gods." He had crawled into caves, and lived on acorns and roots and chestnuts.

C. S. Darrow, a brilliant young lawyer of Chicago, said that if he had never believed in evolution before he would believe in it now. This edifice, once dedicated to superstition, to night was dedicated to science and reason. Professor Milleson had said that man had formerly lived on chestnuts. That was the reason, probably, that so many orthodox people were fond of chestnuts now!

Professor Orchardson thought the church cruel that it inflicted falsehood upon helpless children. It taught them error, perhaps with the best intentions, but, it must be admitted, with the most deplorable results.

Gen. I. N. Stiles said: "Had Beecher lived a hundred years he could not hav added a single fact to the life of Jesus Christ. We can learn nothing more. Nothing new in regard to him can be discovered."

Judge E. R. Paige considered science the savior of the world. He regretted that Ingersoll had not devoted his magnificent talents to the scientific education of the people. He felt that he might hav accomplished a grand work. If the people were familiar with the facts of science, they would hav no tolerance for the fancies of superstition.

Professor Bell assured the audience that they might dismiss any fear that they might hav in regard to a long speech, as he should ring his bell briefly. He wanted to say one word for Ingersoll, and that was that he had said some of the grandest things of reason, intelligence, love, charity, and all the virtues that had ever been put into human language.

Professor Wilson gave a very fine original poem on "Dust," and the writer a recitation. The Mendelssohn Quartet and the Chicago Secular Union Quartet enlivened the occasion with singing, the accompaniments being played on the pipe-organ, a fixture in Forum Hall. In the midst of the exercises a telegram came from Dr. Henry, sent from Philadelphia, congratulating the Union. The doctor has been most munificent in his gifts. The flowers adorning the platform were presented by his wife, and the name, "The Forum," was suggested by himself, and adopted by the society as a small appreciation of his aid. He expresses himself thus:

To E. A. STEVENS, Pres. Secular Union: Although a thousand miles divide us, my heart is with you in your services to-day, in transforming a temple erected to an unknown God for the enslavement of human intellect to a Forum dedicated to reason and the maintenance of human rights. Every true American should rejoice with you. You this day consecrate a temple whose walls should resound with hosannas to liberty of speech, freedom from superstition, reason, justice, and equal rights to all mankind. May the seed that you sow to-day prove immortal. W. H. HENRY, M.D.

The future success of the society in its new quarters seems assured. It has required long years of patient work to bring it up to its present standard—the most popular Liberal society of Chicago. To the earnest, untiring effort of a few this is due. Mr. Stevens, its president, has been the moving spirit in accomplishing its work. It is owing to his enthusiasm and zeal that the Union has held together through the many trials and tribulations of the past. Other hands hav loosened their hold and hav fallen away from their task. Mr. Stevens has remained faithful and firm with a tenacity worthy of his cause.

Dr. Ed. S. McLeod, "the lecture committee," has given most earnest and efficient aid. His judicious selection of lecturers, the attractiv programs—these hav had much to do with our present popularity.

To Morris S. Card is due the fact that we hav a choir. This seemed to be about the hardest thing to get, but if long, patient waiting merit a reward, ours is ample, as is enthusiastically testified to by our audiences at the singing furnished by the Union's quartet.

James Howe is doing a good work in disposing of a great many Liberal papers and Liberal books. Among our newer members is H. E. Bartholomew, attractiv, magnetic, with a splendid voice, educated for a minister, and whom we hope to see some time attain brilliant success as a Freethought lecturer. We hav had a number of clerical evolutions. The rostrum is full of recruits from the pulpit. There are many more workers in our society, brave men and women who deserve mention, but space forbids. Our success is not phenomenal; it has been done by work. This report is written to influence Liberals in every locality to marshal their forces, organize, and place themselvs unflinchingly on the side of liberty. "He that is not for us is against us."

Chicago, April 3, 1888. MRS. M. A. FREEMAN.

The Bruno Monument at Rome.

The contributors to the Bruno Monument Fund will remember that a considerable fund for the purpose was raised by the friends of Freethought in Europe and America, to erect a monument over the very place where he was burnt alive on the 17th of February, 1600. This fund was deposited as a guarantee that the designed statue would be erected, if the consent of the city municipality of Rome should be given, and as a motiv for granting it. The committee of students having the matter in charge at Rome believed that this consent would be granted without difficulty. It seems, however, that the consent cannot be obtained without overcoming serious opposition from the clerical and popish party in Italy. This unexpected aspect of the affair may not, however, be wholly regretted. It makes a question of the dead past a very lively one in the living present. That the friends of secular government and Freethought will prevail is merely a question of time. Our friends there hav been so occupied that they hav not kept us fully advised of the progress of the controversy. We expect to receive information soon in reply to letters sent, which we hope will satisfy the interest which the new phase of affairs has naturally excited.

In the mean time the contributions are held safely until the time for proper application arrives.

T. B WAKEMAN, for the Amer. Com.

New York, April 7, 288.

P.S.—This committee consisted of Elizur Wright, Robert G. Ingersoll, and T. B. Wakeman, but Elizur Wright has since died. T. B. W.

The Object of the Christian Obscenists.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your historical presentation of the way in which the Secular Union has viewed the Comstock laws was well put, but do you suppose it will stop such fellows as Charles O. Brown, of Dubuque, from lying about Bennett and Ingersoll? Look here! Why should Charles O. Brown, or anybody else, break out just at this time in a seven-column howl about Bennett and Colonel Ingersoll's being such "obscene" persons. Colonel Ingersoll has not done anything very recently to excite clerical malignity, and Bennett has been dead for years. Why, when all is serene, should this sudden outburst come? There is no doubt in my mind that the purpose of this overflow of abuse was to excite prejudice throughout the West against Harman and Walker, and thereby insure their conviction. No such case as that now pending against these indicted editors of Lucifer was ever allowed to come squarely before the court on its merits. Every effort that dishonesty can employ to secure the conviction of Harman and Walker will undoubtedly be put forth. The original purpose, to "stamp out Freethought literature," has not been lost sight of, and if Harman and Walker's little paper, Lucifer, can be broken up, that will fortify the obscenists for the next attack upon some larger and stronger paper. Your historical statement, therefore, is timely and wise. The Liberals of this country cannot afford to let Lucifer go down in this whirlpool of prejudice. It is not a question of morals, nor even a question of the good or bad taste of Lucifer. The vital and only question is whether there should be any restraint upon the expression of opinion in this country. On this sole ground Freethought owes it to herself to nullify the effect of Mr Brown's misstatements, and to sustain Lucifer. Lucifer may be in very bad taste. It may be very offensiv, yet it has its right to express its thought freely. If anyone is offended by that freedom, he has abundant remedy—he can throw Lucifer in the wastebasket. There is no law in this country yet to compel men to read what they do not want to read. There is, therefore, no occasion for a law to regulate the quality of reading matter.

It is amazing that there are still some Liberals who scare at the cry of obscenity. After having passed through the great and terrible wilderness wherein are dragons, and scorpions, and fiery serpents, and after proving that heresy and blasphemy are only great bogies that will not hurt anybody, set up to frighten the travelers through that wilderness, it is marvelous that there should be such cowardice when "obscenity" is mentioned. These Liberals are like the little boy Mother Goose tells us about who was born in the woods and scared by an owl. Of course, orthodox mendacity will stigmatize Colonel Ingersoll as "obscene." And this Brown, together with Comstock, alias Phillips, and Williams, alias McAffee, are engaged in the holy work of putting obscene people in prison. Well, Liberals will get abused just as long as they quietly endure it. They will get such filth as this Brown has vomited forth just as long as they stand and take it. I am glad you hav struck back so vigorously. ED. W. CHAMBERLAIN.

Some Good Things.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Let me lay before the general reader some of Voltaire's sarcasms. From the pages of "Pocket Theology" I cull what follows. It is nothing more nor less than a "Bible Dictionary Compiled from Church History, giving the only true meaning of Terms used by the leading speakers and writers in the Christian Fold." Richness of thought and pertinency of application appear in all the definitions. We hope these few will be useful for doctrin. S. W.

CONTROVERSIES.—Important bickerings on contested subjects between theologians of different sects. Carnal men regard such disputes as trifles quite unworthy of occupying the attention of intelligent animals. In reality, all such quarrels are most useful to the church militant to giv her breathing time, and to keep alive the fire of holy animosities, that bring so much honor and profit to the clergy.

CONVERSIONS.—A miraculous change in the human heart due to the grace of the most high, but of which society here below usually reaps the fruits. Conversion compels an old coquet to abandon her rouge-pot, transforms an amiable and lovely woman into a vixen, changes a gentleman and a man of the world into a solemn owl, and finally induces a financier, on his deathbed, to bequeath his possessions to the church for the repose of his own soul, and the salvation of the souls of those he has despoiled, in sheer despair at not being able to take with him into the tomb the fruits of his robberies and rapine.

CORRECTION.—In the Christian religion each one should meddle with the conscience of his neighbor and take a lively interest in his (his neighbor's) soul; should reprimand him for his faults; but, above all, should endeavor to make him renounce his errors. If he show not a proper docility with regard to such efforts, then he should be hated and shunned, or tortured and murdered, if might be on the Christian's side.

COUNCILS.—Solemn gatherings of bishops, assembled together to concert with the holy spirit (who is ever on the side of the stronger) touching the dogmas and all necessary arrangements of the church. Councils are necessary to correct, explain, and alter the holy scripture and the accepted doctrin, and to fix for the time being the articles of faith, without which the human race would be damned.

A Moslem in His Own Behalf.

From the North American Review.

The more the religion of the Moslem is investigated, the more does it claim the respectful homage of those who study its teachings. John Louis Burckhardt, a Swiss Protestant, was one of the first Europeans who made a pilgrimage to Mecca, and after years of study he died a faithful Moslem, and was buried at Cairo. Palgrave, in his "Travels in Arabia," manifests much bigotry regarding Islam, but in his "Essays on Eastern Questions" his views are completely changed. Mr. Bosworth Smith, one of the Christian teachers of the great school at Harrow, studied Islam as a scholar, and is forced to admit that Mohammed is a "very prophet of God." There are not two hundred converts from Islam to Christianity in the whole world, and of the eighty Moslems baptized in Constantinople not one has remained firm in his new faith.

But we are told Islam persecutes! Stay, my Christian brother! I hav visited Smithfield where Christians were burnt by Christians, and I hav stood on Boston Common where Christian Puritans hanged Christian Quakers, and I find in America that religious liberty is not yet extended to the Mormons. Islam has never professed complete religious toleration, but even Christian writers admit that the Saracen Arabs who conquered Jerusalem and Damascus and subdued the whole of Syria and Persia were a brave and generous race, friendly to Christians, content to place them under certain restrictions, and exacting from them a small tribute for protection, but ever extending to them freedom of worship. When the Moslem conqueror Walid seized Damascus he even allowed Christians and Moslems to worship in the same church. Islam is called by Christians the "religion of the sword," but there is not a religion on the face of the earth that has not been propagated by conquest and sustained by intolerance. When the Turcomans of central Asia embraced Islam, they conquered and slaughtered the Saracens of Syria long before they threatened the borders of Christendom. Religious liberty is a modern invention unknown to the ancients, and even now it is a question whether the civil magistrate would view with indifference the conversion of Boston to the religion of Mohammed! But it is asserted that Mohammedanism is immoral! That is, the slavery of Egypt is immoral, but not that of Virginia; the divorce of Bagdad is immoral, but not that of Chicago; the polygamy of Bokhara is immoral, but not the drunkenness of London. So immoral is Islam that Mr. Gladstone would drive it "bag and baggage to Bagdad," although it must be admitted that the Christians of Bulgaria are not much better than the Moslems of Constantinople, and that the sober and abstemious legions of the sultan are as reputable, although polygamous, as the British regiments of India with their licensed prostitution. Anti-Moslem literature is always based on the assumption that Moslem countries are so infinitly below Christian countries in morality. It is a pure assumption, as every Moslem can testify after a few weeks' residence in Paris, London, or New York. Uncivilized Moslems are superior to uncivilized Christians in their standard of morality, and if under more civilized conditions of life the natural outcome of Islam has been an unlimited license regarding marriage and divorce, the outcome of the teachings of Christianity has been an unlimited degree of intemperance, with unparalleled prostitution in large centers of population. The Nazarenes should learn the lesson their master taught them, not to cast the stone; or as the holy Koran saith, "O, ye believers, avoid frequent slanders, for slanders are a crime."

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL writes: "Several persons hav written E. A. Stevens, secretary of the Secular Union, and myself, about having a Liberal lecturer visit Dakota, but as it is so far away, and as there are such magnificent distances for a lecturer to travel from place to place after reaching 'the land of the Dakotahs,' it is necessary for the lecturer to hav his work laid out somewhat before starting, as the railroad conductors are no respecters of persons, and demand spot cash, or its equivalent, from all our sort of preachers. Seeing that the blizzards hav adjourned for the season, I would like to take a trip up there about the end of April. Will the Liberals please write me immediately, and let me know what the outlook is? My address is 302 State street, Chicago, Ill."

THE following is the circular of a revivalist now operating in Montgomery, Ala.:

"Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins.—Rev. xviii, 4.

"The Lord being willing, the Samsonites of the church of Jesus Christ will meet for divine service at my residence, 18 Robinson street, Sunday, March 10, 1888, at 3 30 P.M.

"Come out everybody who believes in a plain church and a plain people; a church without devil's bellowses or vanity props, such as organ-playing, horn-blowing, choir singing, pew or seat renting, mite meetings, candy pullings, church fairs, and things of like nature, that evil-minded persons and wicked men and devils hav introduced into the church of Jesus Christ to collect blood money for the Lord, and shame the faces of the poor and humble into silence, and thus rob them of the opportunity of singing in the house of God, thereby driving them out of the church of Jesus Christ into the world.

"These are the visible marks of the beast that you are asked to come out of, and the fruits and signs of the antichrist that you are warned of that was to come into the world.

"I hav the Methodist style of singing, leaving out their devil's bellows proclivities; the Baptists' style or mode of baptizing, leaving out their vanity, accommodation or convenience pools.

"PLAIN BILL ALLRED,
"Samson of the Church of Jesus Christ."

Mr. Allred was at one time the "bad man" of his neighborhood, but recently turned his attention to religion, with the foregoing unique result. It is thought by those who know him that the liquor he formerly consumed and an unduly close attention to the scriptures hav unsettled his mind.

Communications.

Shamgar.

Shamgar! Who, of the multitudinous millions meandering to and fro up and down this mundane sphere, ever heard of Shamgar?

Not one in ten thousand, I venture to say; and yet, from a "knocking out" standpoint, he was a much more redoubtable hero than ever was John L. Sullivan, even in the days of his loudest boasting, now departed, letting him do his level best; and we all know that few could "best" John L. when pursuing the path of vainglory.

Shamgar—who was he, do you ask? Why, Shamgar was a party who moved and made things lively for other parties in very much earlier days than these; in the days when God was an every-day visitor to this sublunary sphere, and stooped to conquer his enemies—those who were not for him, you know, and so reckoned against him and as his enemies, I suppose—by ways that were dark and tricks that were sharp, to say the least, and allying himself offensivly with certain parties he accounted his friends; a mode of proceeding which he long ago renounced, finding it more or less impolitic and decidedly unsatisfactory.

Yes, Shamgar was one of the early birds, and in the Holy Queer receives honorable mention—honorable as honorable goes in that queerest of all queer works—albeit of exceeding brevity, four lines only being devoted to his introduction and history—the volume I own is small and the columns narrow; in one of generous proportions, with wide columns, two lines do the business for Shamgar, probably.

What did Shamgar do, that entitled him to mention in the Holy Queer, while yet he is so multitudinously unknown? Why, bless your soul—whatever that may be—Shamgar was one of the manifold "deliverers of Israel!" No doubt it was an honor, so considered, probably, to be a "deliverer of Israel," but when at this late day we calmly and coldly consider the great number of her "deliverers," the honor seems sliced exceedingly thin that attaches itself to any particular "deliverer." Dark, exceedingly dark must be the day when, turning over the Old Testament, one does not read, wherever his eyes may fall, of the "deliverance of Israel!" So frequent are the records of said "deliverances" that they would seem to hav been almost every-day affairs. No other nation under the sun was ever "in the hole" a tenth part so often as the Hebrew nation, God's pet community! The most multiparous mother of moccasins (trigono cephalous piscivorous) I don't believe ever had half so many "deliverances" as had Israel; and so it seems to me that the honor of having been her "deliverer" was a very much divided and diaphanous one.

But it is not on this account that I trot out this very much unknown Shamgar from the slough of oblivion, and seek to make his name somewhat familiar, at least, if not a household word; oh, no, not on that account, for as a "deliverer of Israel" I don't bank on him to the extent of a penny. But let me giv the rise and progress (decline and fall, too, is, I suppose, silently included) of Shamgar, as related in Judges iii, 31:

"And after him [him was one Ehud, another "deliverer of Israel," who, at the outset of his "delivering" career, committed a most disreputable if not diabolical murder with malice prepense, calling to his aid deceit and treachery, dark and dire] was Shamgar the son of Anath, which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox goad; and he also delivered Israel" (Judges iii, 16, 26).

"Slew six hundred men with an ox-goad!" Aha! now you can see why I trotted Shamgar out, and why his name should appear on the roll of famous knockers-out, not far below that of Samson, and away above that of John L. Sullivan—can't you? Shamgar, the champion ox goadist of the world, with a record of six hundred men knocked out with one measly ox-goad! Ha! where are your Sullivans now? Paled are their ineffectual fires, hidden are their diminished heads!—I don't mean to say that their heads will not be, even now, abnormally large o' mornings, but—oh, well, you know what I mean.

What was the "charge of the six hundred" compared with the charge of Shamgar, the slayer of six hundred with a preposterous ox-goad? And to think that Shamgar should hav been, to the vast multitude, an unknown quantity and of unknown quality, hitherto! But the hithertoness now slinks back into the crypt of the past, and the nowness of the is, or isness of the now, it matters little which, under the circumstances, comes to the front on a parabolic curve, as it were.

The brief but thrilling history of Shamgar does not tell us whether the hero of the ox-goad got in his work during one matinee, or a long drawn series of matinees; the inference is, however, that he pitched in, à la Samson with the jaw bone of the jackass, and sent the six hundred to sleep with their fathers at one fell swoop, as it were; that is, did the whole business in one inning, you understand. It is not at all likely that he went about for months with that ox goad, prodding here, there, and elsewhere stray Philistines, and keeping tally by notches on the goad—not at all likely! Had he done so, I don't think he would hav got the honorable though brief mention he did get in the Holy Queer, albeit some very questionable specimens of the genus get more or less honorable (?) mention therein.

I now can see the stalwart Shamgar, in that ever memorable, though unmentioned and unknown, engagement, slinging that potent ox-goad with preterhuman force and fury about him, cutting down the Philistines like blades of grass!—see him now with my mind's eye, can't you, reader? See now the veins in his good right arm swell up like knotted whipcords! See now the beaded sweat upon his corrugated brow stand out like liquid pearls, and shimmer in the sun as he goes switching on! See now his mighty breast upheave and fall as do the restless seas in majesty of wrath! See now the luckless Philistines go down like oats before the scythe, as wide the doughty Shamgar cuts his swath! Hear now the swish-whack-swish of Shamgar's trenchant goad, as right-front-left he cuts and plunks and cuts again! Oh, see and hear and quite take in the whole of that ensanguined picnic, redolent of gore—but stop, hold on; shed he so much of gore, or did he slay by mighty whacks the more? Well, there's no knowing, and it doesn't matter. I can see the entire moving panorama, the carnival of slaughter, and that's enough!

But to see and hear the sights and sounds of that wild fray, and think that mighty Shamgar—Shamgar, who laid out cold and stiff six hundred Philistines, and with an ox-goad most contemptible—should get but four paltry lines in the Holy Queer, while that surly, sneaking, snarling, sulking sorehead, Jonah, a fellow who "never set a squadron in the field, nor the division of a battle knew," gets four chapters in a "book" all to himself—to think that such a thing could be, and in a "holy" tome, is enough to make the bile of one with a sense of the eternal, or even temporary, fitness of things, revolt and run wild riot throughout his corporeal system! I say it and stick to it.

What justice was there in giving Jonah, the unmitigated "Snarleyow" with whom God, most unaccountably and inscrutably, was in cahoots; a chump that growled like a bear with a sore head at his mighty patron; who sneaked off in another direction when ordered by said patron to move on a certain place; who killed a gourd by sleeping near it one night, and whom a whale couldn't keep on his stomach, albeit harboring buckets on buckets of lamp oil—what justice was there in giving him a "book" in the Holy Queer, and shunting Shamgar off with a paltry four-line notice? Shamgar the Stalwart! Shamgar the ox-goadist par eminence! Shamgar the slayer of six hundred Philistinic souls at one fell swoop, as it were! Justice! Why, it was bald-headed, bare-faced, sunken-chested, knock-kneed, and splayfooted injustice, and that settles it!

I submit that, in order to keep green the memory of Shamgar, the champion ox-goadist of creation, saying nothing of his being a "deliverer of Israel," which I go not a cent on, the verb "to shamgar," meaning the chousing of one out of his just dues in the field of fame, be introduced and incorporated into our vocabulary without ado. With this I leave Shamgar to his repose, remarking that, if I hav caused a single thrill to thrill through the vesicular thrill gland of any one of my readers, with respect to Shamgar, my aim and object will hav been attained. Vive Shamgar! a bas Jonah!

SI SLOKUM.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

KINGSTON, N. M., March 6th–11th.—It is a long, tedious stage route from Lake Valley to Kingston, over the mountains and through a very narrow cañon through which, to a tenderfoot, it seems impossible to drive a team. Yet all the merchandise, food, everything in the way of supplies for the vast mining camp, is carried over this road in wagons, with sixteen to eighteen mules as motor to each wagon. When night overtakes these mule trains, the mules are turned out to graze on the mesa, and the teamsters camp by the roadside, and sleep under the wagons as cosy and content as an Eastern man in the best bedroom of a first-class hotel. In this section those acclimated, or to the manor born, seem to hav profound indifference to the style or extent of their sleeping-place, and would as soon throw down their sleeping outfit between the hind wheels of a wagon as in the corner of the adobe house or stately mansion.

Kingston is a wide-awake, flourishing mining camp, situated in a cañon of great beauty, and surrounded by mountains all rich in precious metal. It breathes the very spirit of progress, energy, and success. It has never been cursed by 'a boom,' and so its natural advantages and vast capabilities are only beginning to be appreciated by the capitalist.

Kingston is the great city of the mines in embryo, destined to rival, and far outstrip, Leadville in its rapid growth and brilliant future. The wealth of ore in its adjacent mountains is enormous, having already yielded vast amounts. It is but in the infancy of exploration. The promis of maturity seems fabulous.

Under the care and pilotage of that sturdy and energetic truth seeker, J. C. Burge, the photographic artist, I visited some of the principal mines.

The Caledonia mine has yielded over $30 000 in four months. Within the last month it has yielded the biggest assay of any mine in the world—122 000 ounces of gold, and 7 000 ounces of silver to the ton.

The Comstock—this is the mine that first brought Kingston into prominent notice—has produced $400,000 during the past year. They are now taking out 7 tons of ore a day, yielding from 40 to 400 ounces of silver to the ton. I explored this mine, and stood in the vast chambers from which immense fortunes had been taken out.

The Black Colt is owned and worked by Col. M. G. Gillette, of 2,101 Fifth avenue, New York, a veteran miner, and a stanch, outspoken Liberal, a personal friend of Col. R G. Ingersoll. Although his ability, enterprise, and skill hav given him a competence, and his home in the city is a paradise of luxury and comfort, the sturdy old colonel so loves the mountains that he finds no pleasure in living save in the highest elevations, where he finds all the heaven he ever expects or desires. The past year, working but few men, the mine produced $75,000, but they hav now struck very large veins of exceedingly rich ore that will produce that amount each month.

The Brush Heap. A large body of ore was found last December at a depth of 225 feet, which averaged 187 ounces of silver to the ton. They hav just struck very large and much richer veins. This mine was discovered by two prospectors who were hard up. They are now completing negotiations for its sale for $250 000 spot cash, and it is doubtless really worth three times that amount.

The Ingersoll is a mine, just opened, of very great promis. It was so named and is owned by an Infidel Jew, a gentleman of great ability and enterprise, an ardent admirer of the noblest man of this or any other century, who makes it the study of his life to liv up to the great Liberalist's teachings. I was introduced to a number of miners who were college graduates. At one of my lectures there were five gentlemen present able to read Greek. The ordinary miner receives $3 50 per day, and is in great demand. I discoursed with several wealthy men whose best suit of clothes a few months ago would not hav fetched $2 at auction, and their entire outfit and all their worldly possessions could not exceed $5.

I delivered four lectures at the Grand Army Hall. After the first night the large hall was crowded to suffocation; the saloons were deserted. Half an hour before the time to commence my lecture every seat was filled and standing-room unattainable. By special request, I delivered a lecture to a very large and enthusiastic audience, on Sunday afternoon, at the lumber-yard (specially prepared and seated for the occasion) of that noble, fearless champion of Freethought, John Bennett.

It was an eventful week at Kingston. Theology and Liberalism was the one theme in the mines, in the stores, saloons, homes. I sold over $50 worth of Liberal publications, and obtained a large list of new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Kingston greatly needs a newspaper. There is a splendid opening for an intelligent, live editor, for there is nothing in the shape of a newspaper published in the county. A dirty, little, blurred smudge, called the weekly Shaft, under the charge of an overgrown calf, who acquired his education as property boy to a third-class variety show, is issued semi-occasionally. The few Christians of the place who can read (only about a baker's dozen) take it because its so-called editor has their parson suggest and revise its contents; but the parson, an uneducated, but well-meaning man, who never had an original idea in his life, is unable to do more than cut out the editor's imbecil attempts to enliven the paper with third-class nigger-show nasty chestnuts.

Kingston has a glorious future before her, and with such genuin, generous, and fearless young champions as Harvey Titcomb, such sturdy, ever reliable veterans as Burge, Davis, and Bennett, the cause of Freethought will keep step to her march of progress, and insure her people the highest possible mental development, while attaining the grandest conceivable temporal prosperity.

DEMING N. M., March 12th, 13th, 14th.—It was late when I retired, and I had to be up at 4 o'clock Monday morning to take the stage to Lake Valley, a long, tiresome, weary, thirty mile ride; then rail to Deming. On arrival at Deming I was about used up, and when I found I had to wait at the depot till 4 o'clock P M. and should not reach Cassa Granda till between 3 and 4 the next morning, and then hav a very long, dusty, hard stage travel to Florence, I realized I was not so young as I was twenty years ago, and that age does tell in weakening ambition. I was feeling quite badly, and the prospect of the journey to Florence did not exhilarate, when suddenly I was accosted by Colonel Lockhart, superintendent of mines at Kingston, who had heard my first lectures there, and C. F. Howell, C. T. Henderson, and Judge Field, as jolly a lot of Infidels as one could wish to meet. They deplored the fatiguing journey before me, advised postponement, secured me most comfortable quarters at a hotel, and then suggested a change of program. They had a spacious Opera House, and would guarantee big attendance; advised me to remain and lecture at Deming, and then, rested and recuperated, go on to Tempe and avoid the long stage route. I yielded, wired Florence, and stayed at Deming and delivered three lectures at the Opera House to large and most enthusiastic audiences, increasing each night—resulting in obtaining many new subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the organizing of the Deming Liberal Union: aims and objects—to establish a Liberal and scientific library and reading-room, free to all; to circulate Liberal literature that shall awaken an interest in the Nine Demands of Liberalism.

At a meeting held at Railroad Hotel, Wednesday, March 14, 1888, the following officers were unanimously elected: president, Judge I. Field; secretary, Thomas Brown; Treasurer, S. Lindauer.

$100 was pledged to the society, and it adjourned to meet at the custom house on Sunday next, March 18th, at 4 P.M.

Deming is the City of Windmills, a very neat little town of about 1 800 population, located at the junction of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé railway with the Southern Pacific and Texas and Pacific roads, 34 miles north of the Mexico line, 89 miles west of the Texas line, and 800 miles east of Los Angeles. The town is situated in the center of a high mesa 127 by 80 miles in extent, at an altitude of 4 200 feet above the sea, with a dry atmosphere, in which sudden changes of temperature never occur, with an inexhaustible supply of pure water at a depth of 40 to 50 feet.

Deming is the supply-point for all the Mexican country for 250 miles south of the line.

Friend S. Lindauer, treasurer of the Deming Liberal Union and Free Library, is the head of the great house of Lindauer, Wormser & Co. I was shown over their stock of goods, and it was to me astounding—goods exceeding a million and a quarter dollars; not alone immense stores, but a vast inclosure covering several acres, with deep sheds filled with merchandise; cellars, immense vaults, filled with goods, which yet never long remain.

The most wealthy, enterprising, and intelligent citizens are all Liberals. A parson started all the children and women folks to go round and solicit contributions to purchase a church organ; only wanted $100. Liberals started an opposition subscription to build a school-house, and raised $1.200 in the same time. There is no fear for the business or intellectual progress of Deming.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

The True Rallying Cry.

The true rallying cry in the anti-Roman movement is: Roman Catholics must be disfranchised, or they will destroy the republic.

The Abolitionists made but little progress until Elizabeth Heyrick first, and Garrison afterward, demanded "immediate unconditional emancipation, the right of the slave and the duty of the master." This startled the nation from its sleep of indifference to slavery, and secured to the antislavery speakers and writers a hearing which they never could hav gained while standing on the platform of gradualism.

Romanists will smile with complacent derision as long as the fight against them goes on under the white flag of Protestant compromise, amity, Christian recognition, fellowship, and apology. We must declare war in earnest—not hesitate to say in so many direct, hard words: Romanists are necessarily traitors—good Catholics cannot be good citizens—and they must be disfranchised or the republic cannot long survive. The courts of Utah hav refused to naturalize foreign-born Mormons, for the reason that the head of the Mormon church, to Mormons, is bigger than the United States Constitution and laws—that Mormonism is in essence anti-republican. An avowed Anarchist would, no doubt, be refused naturalization for the same reason. A Roman Catholic should not be permitted to become a citizen, because he would avow, if honest, a higher and more binding allegiance to the pope than he could possibly feel or recognize to the Constitution and laws of this country. He is in all of his principles a deadly enemy to all of our institutions. His religion antagonizes every principle of the Constitution and every institution under it, beginning with free schools and ending with free speech, free press, and freedom of conscience in religious as well as civil affairs. If Romanism is anything, it is absolute obedience of every member of the church to the pope in spiritual and temporal things—an absolute surrender of the right to think, speak, and act, except as directed by the head of this great despotism.

All legislativ and judicial power is deposited by God with the pope as against all civil governments on earth, and especially against this so-called godless republic, and godless freedom which it was established to secure.

We must educate the people up to the point of refusing citizenship to foreign-born Catholics, and of disfranchising those who by perjury and fraud hav been permitted to become citizens.

Suppose every German that takes the naturalization oath should hav a well-defined and secret mental reservation that he is nevertheless bound to obey in all things the German emperor, and to vote as Bismarck and his secret paid and commissioned agents and spies, scattered all over this country, should direct, and always in the interests of Germany. In such case would Germans be permitted to vote and hold the balance of political power, state and federal?

Suppose that behind every Englishman's application and oath to become a citizen there existed a conscious, well-defined, secret mental reservation to obey and continue loyal to the queen of England, and to vote solid as the English premier and his appointed subordinates, resident in this country, should direct; what sort of citizens in such case would Englishmen be? Would they not be perjured traitors? Could a man loyal to the queen be a good citizen to this republic? Would not the unanimous voice of the loyal people of this country be that, in such case, Englishmen and Germans should not only be disfranchised, but compelled to leave the country? A stronger case exists for expelling every good Roman Catholic that has taken, or will propose to take, the oath of citizenship. A good Romanist never dreams of renouncing allegiance or relaxing his obedience to the pope while swearing that he will abjure all other allegiance except to the United States government.

The pope is God to the good Catholic, and his oath, if he knows what he is doing, is a conscious perjury, and every Romanist obtains the right to vote by fraud and false swearing. He fully believes in the claim of temporal, as well as spiritual, power of the pope, and his duty to obey him in all things; has sworn to do this, and has never once dreamed of doing otherwise. What, then, is his oath of citizenship in the republic good for? It is not binding on him; he laughs in his sleeve at the simplicity and foolish liberality of our laws and people.

To be a good citizen of this country a man must be a very bad Catholic, if he pretends to be a Catholic at all. To be a good Catholic he must necessarily be not only a very bad citizen, but a traitor, conspirator, and spy. A good Romanist believes in the supreme power of the pope to "absolve from all promissory oaths" whatsoever, whenever he pleases to do so; that is, to release the taker from moral obligation to keep oaths after such release, and also from all penalties, moral and otherwise, for perjury.

He believes it to be his first duty to vote for the interest of his church as directed by his priest at all elections—and the interests of his church antagonize every interest of this republic, from free schools to free representativ government. All Romanists voting under orders from a foreign potentate will vote solid as a unit, as an army marches, with here and there a straggler or deserter. A united minority in a republic is almost as good as a majority. By this obedient, disciplined, and solid minority, the Roman church holds the balance of power at the polls. The Tammany Hall organization has illustrated this fact for years. By this solid minority vote, and by the secret Jesuit and other auxiliary semi-political organizations of the church, Rome has been quietly helping herself up gradual steps to power in this country—helping herself to the public moneys by the million in New York city—and money is power. The pope can now command votes enough to control all elections, state and national—this politicians concede; money enough to maintain a powerful secret lobby at the national capital to guard her interests (Senator Blair stated in his recent speech on the educational bill that "there were nine Jesuits on the floor of the Senate at one time working against the bill"), and also to build and endow the largest college in the nation, which is already well under way in Washington, and by the social and literary influences thus secured to make her lobby all-potent in controling legislation and official appointments in her own behalf.

With two million perjured voters at the polls, to be commanded by the satanic sagacity and cunning of Roman officials at the Vatican, and resident in this country, in behalf of the "king of kings," the "vicegerent of God," how long can this republic survive?

There is, clearly, no salvation for our free institutions but in the speedy disfranchisment of perjured Roman traitors and conspirators.

The right to anything obtained by fraud or false swearing is voidable, if not void, in law, and can be legally, as well as equitably, taken from the person so obtaining it by the courts.

Congress, or the courts, can legally and justly disfranchise Romanists when it is shown that the oath of citizenship they hav taken is insincere, and was taken with the secret intention of not keeping it. Every man who feels that he owes allegiance to a foreign prince or potentate while pretending to be a loyal citizen here, is a traitor at heart, and ought to be disfranchised and driven from the country.

Congress should at once appoint a committee to inquire into the nature of the oath Roman Catholics hav taken of fidelity and obedience to the pope, and also of the good faith of Catholics in taking the oath of citizenship, as to which they deem the most binding, with powers to send for persons and papers to make the most thorough investigation possible. Who is the member of Congress that has the patriotism and the pluck to introduce such a resolution, and properly present the importance of the question? If anyone knows who may be induced to do it, let him be urged to move it at once, and let him be furnished with the necessary facts and documents with which to lay the subject before Congress. Let anti-Catholics, without distinction of sect or party, organize a practical movement to the end suggested, viz., the disfranchisment of all good Roman Catholics, and the expulsion from the country of all Jesuits. The latter hav been, at one time or another, expelled from every civilized country on the globe except this, on account of their diabolical cussedness. It is time to begin to agitate for their expulsion from this country—high time. The fact stated by Senator Blair should alarm the country.

This republic cannot long exist half Roman and half free. The question must be met, and the quicker the better.

Let the subject be at once presented to Congress. Perhaps a memorial had better be prepared, signed, and presented at this session. At any rate, the introduction of the question into Congress would probably do more to overcome public apathy and indifference than years of private agitation. Steps should be taken at once by those who sympathize with the anti-Roman movement to concentrate upon some definit action. I suggest that a national convention be called and a memorial to Congress prepared, discussed, and adopted by the convention, then circulated and signed largely, and then presented to Congress by a committee chosen by the convention.

A. J. GROVER.

The Distribution of Wealth.

Perceiving that Mr. Denslow's critics evince a disposition to ignore the most important points in his essay on the "Distribution of Wealth," I shall generously offer to do him the justice to note two of them myself, for which favor I shall expect him to be duly grateful, though I shall not require him to specially acknowledge the fact, but shall take it for granted without his saying.

When the advocates of ownership perceive that Socialism proposes to compel every individual to earn his living by his own labor, so long as he has the physical and intellectual ability to labor, they call it despotism that will destroy our individuality. Though it will not be difficult to prove that accusation to be false, it is not expedient to take the trouble to do so. For despotism with food and raiment sufficient for us, is preferable to individuality with hunger and nakedness. Evidently feeling sure that they hav frightened us out of asserting that Socialism will enable and compel every individual to earn his living by his own labor, they boldly, though falsely, assert that Socialism will compel those who are industrious to throw the product of their labor into a common heap and permit every idle loafer to help himself. I think we can afford to accept that definition if they can, for it will certainly permit those whose labor procured the product to help themselvs with equal freedom. But ownership enables the "lazy loafers" to usurp an exclusiv right to the product, and will not permit those whose industry procured the products to touch them except on conditions that are hard to comply with at best, and that they cannot always comply with at all. I think that is the most outrageous and uncontrolable despotism conceivable. Therefore it is evident that they do not really object to despotism, but to its being applied for the enforcement of just principles. It is evident that they cannot, even by lying, make Socialism appear half so villainous as private ownership of wealth has practically demonstrated itself to be.

In reply to the ridiculously absurd objection that Socialism, common possession, will tend to destroy our ambition and enterprise, I will suggest that human need, greed, and caprice are the only known incentivs to ambition and enterprise; and they, being inherent properties, and instincts of nature, cannot by any possibility be destroyed. Ownership of wealth compels us to labor knowingly for the enrichment of others rather than of ourselvs. We also know that the more we enrich others, the more we impoverish ourselvs. If that has failed to take the ambition and enterprise out of us, we hav no cause to giv ourselvs any concern about them; for, come what will, they will be perfectly safe and ever activ. Socialism is coöperation by all for the mutual benefit of all; unless that will stimulate the ambition and enterprise of all, nothing will. Hence, Socialism is the ne plus ultra of coöperation.

The Women's Congress.

The International Council of Women which assembled in Washington March 25th, and continued in session for eight days, with several supplementary meetings, including a reception at the White House, a meeting for permanent organization, and the holding of the twentieth annual Convention of the National Suffrage Association, was a great gathering of feminin brains, and a great public success for the organizers of the council. Many of the speeches contained a great deal of common sense, most of them were oratorically superior, and the press reported the meetings at length. Only one little breeze fanned to redness the cheeks of the lady delegates, and that was raised by Helen Taylor, daughter of John Stuart Mill, who refused to attend because Mrs. Ashton Dilke did attend. The reason given was because of Mrs. Dilke's relativs. The real reason, however, was because Helen Taylor is very pious and Mrs. Dilke is an Agnostic with Atheistic tendencies. Elizabeth Cady Stanton attended to Mrs. Taylor, and effectually suppressed her, writing her a letter "which she will never 'orget."

But the council further developed the fact, to which we some time ago called attention, that the movement for woman's rights has been captured by the very religious element which but a few years ago sneered at it, and called its advocates "short-haired," and intimated that they were "no better than they ought to be." Seven female reverends took part in the council, many of whom hav been more than once refused pulpits by the male preachers of the religion which degrades them, and these seven preachers monopolized the whole of the first day of "religious services." All the sessions of the council were opened with religious music, followed by an "invocation," and the arrogance of the pious delegates like Frances Willard was something amazing. They evidently thought that Christianity had had something to do with helping along the woman's rights cause! The piety of the council, one lady who addressed it tells us, was truly comic. Hymns were printed in the official program describing God, and asserting that he was coming with speedy succor; and every Infidel woman orator was asked to suppress her heresy and not wound the feelings of her religious sisters. Nothing was said, however, about the religious sisters not wounding the feelings of their heretical companions. The Golden Rule works only one way with Christians.

The puerility of this conduct of a council may be known from the comments of the auditors. The speeches and papers which were loudest applauded, and pronounced the best, were all, without exception, those of the heretics, like Mrs. Stanton, Helen Gardener, Mrs. Dilke, and others. Susan B. Anthony even, who presided with dignity and businesslike methods, is a good deal more of a heretic than is commonly guessed. As one of her friends expresses it, she is not "half so bilious as she looks." The sophomoric papers and speeches all came from the pious element. This triumph of the heretical brain is, of course, glory for Freethought, but we regret exceedingly to note the religious tone of the council which strikes the public ear. The many noble women there who hav broken their bonds should hav had a chance to lead others to freedom, if the manacled ones were allowed to rattle their chains as an invitation to the world to join them.

The woman's suffrage movement has made great advances within the forty years since its first convention, of which this council was the anniversary. In the West the more practical results are shown, and in the East the sentiment of the people has undergone a transformation. And were it not for the politicians women would hav the franchise very soon. But the doubling of the number of votes cast makes issues too uncertain for much political fooling to be allowed; and our statesmen view the movement as a pleasant joke, but to be frowned upon when the joke is likely to become serious. The meeting at Washington of these earnest women will probably scare them, while it gives them a higher opinion of female business capacity. The God-in-the-Constitution party, the Prohibitionists, and the Liberals are probably the only organizations sincere in desiring to giv woman the ballot; and the two former and the last for widely different reasons. The Liberals desire it because it is right, and also to extend personal liberty. The others desire it in order to take personal liberty away from a large part of the people, and enthrone the Jewish Jehovah as our king. The Washington council has done more for the church than for freedom.

About Untaxed Trinity.

In response to Mr. E. A. Stevens's statement concerning Trinity church corporation, Judge Brewer writes:

"In a note in this week's TRUTH SEEKER Mr. E. A. Stevens says: 'Mr. S Brewer, of Ithaca, N. Y., desires the authority for my statement in reference to Trinity church;' and then proceeds to giv the authority. Mr. Stevens is not quite correct. Giving vent to a doubt, I simply expressed a desire that THE TRUTH SEEKER would find out the exact facts about Trinity's exemption from taxation, and communicate the same to its readers.

"While, as a Liberal rendering a hearty support to the Nine Demands, I am more than willing that Liberalism should avail itself of all facts in controverting our opponents, I do not think that anything is really gained by coining misstatements or by giving currency to those already afloat.

"The remarkable statement about Trinity's exemption, which Mr. Stevens gathered from sources which he was perhaps warranted in considering reliable, seemed, nevertheless, so extravagant that one was almost forced to question its correctness; and even after Mr. Stevens has now divulged the sources of his information, my doubt about the case is not removed.

"It seems impossible that our lawmakers could hav allowed a single religious organization to hold vear after vear real estate to the amount of two hundred and fifty millions of dollars untaxed, without at least calling the attention of the people to so startling a fact.

"Would not our good Liberal friend—and good lawyer as well—Mr. Wakeman, take the trouble to look the matter up, and through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER giv to the community the bottom facts in this matter? I think Brother Wakeman can afford to do that much by way of enhancing the obligation, already very large, which the Liberal cause owes his able pen."

Mr. Stevens's original statement was that Trinity owns a block of untaxed land in this city one-fourth of a mile wide by three-fourths of a mile long, valued at $25 000 000 (afterward written by mistake, in our issue of March 31st, $250 000,000). This information he quoted from a pamphlet prepared in 1881 by Van Buren Denslow, B. F. Underwood, and R. C. Spencer, supposing that these gentlemen were accurate writers In this, it appears, Mr. Stevens is mistaken, though the inaccuracy was not intentional on their part, but the result of carelessness and incomplete search. We think we can explain the matter. In the Index of January 3, 1878, Mr. Abbott published some "astounding facts about Trinity church." These alleged facts were as follows:

"Trinity church owns a vast amount of real estate in New York city, lying compactly between Broadway and the North river, and extending nearly two miles in length and from one-fourth to three-fourths of a mile in breadth. The whole district inclosed by a line running eastward from the North river through Cortlandt street to Broadway, thence northward seven squares to Warren street, thence one square westward to Church street, thence eleven squares northward to Canal street, and (continuing on Greene street) seven squares still northward to Amity street, thence six squares westward to Sixth avenue, thence four squares northward to Greenwich avenue, and thence seven squares southwestward on Christopher street, where the line strikes the North river once more—all this immense district, lying in the most valuable part of the city, belongs to Trinity church, together with considerable territory south of Cortlandt street, concerning the exact boundaries of which we are left in some doubt. The value of this enormous amount of real estate is, at a low valuation, fully $70 000 000; and, if we correctly understand our informant, Trinity church pays no tax on the land itself, though the lessees pay taxes on the buildings they hav erected upon it, under long leases.

"Now, it is worth while to inquire how this colossal property earns its exemption from taxation—how it pays to New York city an equivalent in 'good moral influence' for the one and three quarters millions of dollars which it compels the rest of the city to pay as annual taxes in its stead! The great argument urged by all the defenders of church exemption is that, by exempting churches from taxation, the community saves more in diminished expenses for courts and prisons than it relinquishes by remitting the taxes on church property. It is plain, therefore, that Trinity church must exert a prodigious moral influence in repressing drunkenness, licentiousness, etc., in New York, in order to save so vast a sum to the city annually.

"What is the actual fact? This—that Trinity church, by the use it permits to be made of the land it rents to its tenants, is the greatest feeder of vice in the whole city! According to the official records in the offices of the chief of police and the excise commissioners, the real estate of Trinity church supports seven hundred and sixty-four liquor saloons, or 'gin-mills,' and ninety-six known houses of prostitution (ninety-two white and four colored), with many others suspected to be such! Who can estimate the annual expense entailed on the city by all these haunts of vice in its lowest forms? Not we, assuredly; but it must be simply enormous. Yet Trinity church is exempted from taxation, forsooth, because it is a 'bulwark of morality,' and officiates in this capacity by pandering to the most depraved appetites of the worst classes of the city!"

With the exception of contracting the extent of the property from two miles in length to three-quarters of a mile, and leaving off the words, "to three fourths of a mile in breadth," Mr. Abbott's facts are the same as those of the writers of the pamphlet from which Mr. Stevens quoted, though his estimate of the value of the property is much greater. Mr. Abbott derived his information from a friend in New York.

In the Index of April 11, 1878, appeared a contradiction from John A. Dix, ex-governor of New York, controler of Trinity corporation, and father of the present rector, Morgan A. Dix. Leaving out Mr. Dix's circumlocution, his statements are: That Trinity owned only seven hundred and fifty lots, instead of the number stated; that these lots do not lie compactly, but are scattered over the territory singly, or in groups; that a high estimate of the value of Trinity's "productiv property"—mark these words—was less than seven millions; that the corporation pays taxes on this productiv property; that Trinity leases contain a covenant against liquor-selling on its property; that this covenant was enforced on 483 lots, which Trinity owned exclusivly—but that on 267 lots, let by Trinity for business purposes, but over which it had no control, liquor might be sold, but Mr. Dix did not believe it was, and the police also had no knowledge that such was the fact. Letters from the police and excise departments were also submitted by Mr. Dix in corroboration of his statements.

To this Mr. Abbott replied: "Our immediate informant, whose own name it is unnecessary to giv, even were we authorized to giv it, furnished us with a map of New York city, upon which, he wrote, 'is outlined by the Hon. Clinton Roosevelt (an old and prominent lawyer of that city, who is conversant with every inch of property owned by that corporation) the property owned by the Trinity church corporation. To anyone conversant with the city of New York, there need be no difficulty in forming an estimate of its value. When I stated to Mr. Roosevelt that I had been guilty of making the assertion that the Trinity corporation owned property in the city of New York worth seventy millions of dollars, upon which were situated more houses of prostitution and gin-mills than upon the combined ecclesiastical property of the rest of the city, and I had called upon him to learn whether I had been guilty of misrepresentation, that I might correct my statement, he unhesitatingly declared that I had told the truth, and he would direct me to the facts. The map inclosed is, or was, outlined by that gentleman. Upon his suggestion I employed a detectiv, who had access to the offices of the chief of police and the excise commissioners, and the following is his report, obtained from the records of those offices: From the police department, the number of known houses of prostitution situated upon the property so outlined is ninety-six (ninety-two white and four colored). The number of known liquor saloons, taken from the office of the excise commissioners, is seven hundred and sixty-four.'"

In the next issue of the Index, acknowledging the editor's fairness in printing his letter, Mr. Dix said:

"Mr. Roosevelt ought not to hav made so great a mistake in regard to the extent of the property of this corporation. Its affairs were investigated by the legislature of the state more than twenty years ago, and everything concerning it was a matter of public record. The street number of every lot it possessed was given and the value stated as ascertained by two disinterested persons. The whole number of lots was stated at nine hundred and eighty-five, but many of them were not more than twenty feet front—some less—so that the number of full lots, twenty-five by one hundred, was not far from what it is now. The largest estimate of the value of the property was six millions one hundred and eight thousand one hundred and fifty dollars."

Mr. Dix also sent Mr. Abbott some year-books and pamphlets setting forth the work Trinity was doing, and these books the editor of the Index read. He found: "Turning to the Year Book of 1878 to learn how far this general plan is carried into effect, we find that Trinity church to-day contains seven churches—Trinity church, St. Paul's chapel, St. John's chapel, Trinity chapel, St. Chrysostom's chapel, St. Augustine's chapel, and St. Cornelius's chapel; and that it makes annual donations to eighteen other churches, amounting in all for the year ending Aug. 1, 1877, to $47,660.19. It also sustains a multiplicity of educational and charitable organizations, of which the entire activity seems to be directed by strictly ecclesiastical conceptions of 'education' and 'charity.' Provision is made to a certain extent for the temporal wants of the poor, the sick, the aged, though apparently with a large discrimination in favor of members of the various parish organizations. The education of the three hundred boys of the Trinity church parochial school includes 'religious instruction according to the holy scriptures and the Book of Common Prayer;' the girls at St. Paul's chapel parish school 'are thoroughly and assiduously instructed in the principles and doctrins of the church. The child is regarded, all through her school term, as a candidate for confirmation and communion; and, on leaving the school, the effort is made to keep her in connection with the church by placing her in some Bible-class or guild.' In a word, the whole administration of the Trinity church property appears to be devoted, as was indeed to be expected, to the furtherance and propagation of Christianity, according to the strictly Episcopalian form of faith; and whatever secular good is attempted or done appears to be merely subordinate and incidental to this central, dominant purpose.

"There needs to be a much more frank and full statement on this question than any that has been made. Trinity Church Year Book for 1877 says that 'the property, in all probability, is not worth more than from seven to eight millions;' General Dix last week estimated it at seven millions. Accepting this estimate, at a rate of taxation of two and a half per cent (which, we are told, is less than the rate of taxation in New York city), Trinity church ought to pay $175 000; whereas General Dix says that he has paid only $64 107.97 for the current year. Even on the acknowledged value of the productiv part of the property, there seems to be an under-assessment of taxes; which is exemption from taxation precisely to that extent.

"But this estimate of seven millions as the value of the Trinity church property is a very unfair one. If any private taxpayer were to make a tax-return on the principles of the Year Book, he would be exposed to very ugly suspicions. We quote the Trinity Church Year Book of 1877: 'In estimating the value of the property, the calculation ought to be limited to what yields an income. . . . Leaving out of account the unproductiv part of the estate, and estimating that portion only which yields an income, the value of the property is comparativly small; small in comparison with the inflated and erroneous opinions about it. "Sixty millions of dollars" is the stereotyped phrase at present in vogue; the property in all probability is not worth more than from seven to eight millions.'

"The value of all the exempted part of the estate is here thrown out as valueless! For instance, the whole block bounded by Broadway, Church, Vesey, and Fulton streets is avowedly counted out as of no value whatever! It is in this way that the immense property is ciphered down to 'seven or eight millions.' The community has a right to demand the honest figures, the actual market value of all the land and buildings belonging to the corporation. We affirm that such statements as we hav just quoted from Trinity Church Year Book show that the necessity of defending their unjust exemption has demoralized the minds of the corporation—that they here resort to a device for evading criticism which they would blush to use as private men. There is not one of them who would sign and swear to a similar statement of his own property, throwing out the 'unproductiv' portion as of no value; there is not a tax-assessor who would permit such a return. Trinity church, by her own confession, possesses a vastly larger and more valuable estate than she wishes to be the reputed possessor of; and by setting afloat such misleading statements as that she only owns 'seven or eight millions' she knows (or ought to know) that she is deceiving the public at large."

All of this has a bad aspect for Trinity, and conclusivly proves that Mr. Dix indulged in special pleading to cover Trinity's financial sins. That there is a good deal back of the explanation which is not explained is shown by letters from Clinton Roosevelt and a gentleman signing "Justitia" in the Index of the following week. Mr. Roosevelt was applied to by the Bogardus heirs to prosecute the corporation. Mr. Roosevelt demanded of Trinity "an answer under the act of 1784, by which they became trustees to the heirs of Bogardus as well as the city of New York." The response to this suit was the publication of what Mr. Roosevelt calls "a most wonderful document, in which Trinity claimed to be not at all responsible for the immoralities committed on the property she holds." Why Trinity is not responsible is then shown by "Justitia." It appears that the property held by Trinity was granted by "royal favor," and consists of what was originally known as "the King's Farm and Garden" and the "Bogardus estate." The boundaries of these lands, as the city is now laid out, commenced near Cortlandt street, running north along the line of Broadway to Reade street; west to South Fifth avenue; north and northwest to Christopher street, thence to the North river, and thence to place of beginning. The dividing line between the King's Farm and Garden and the Bogardus estate was near Chambers street. This is an immense tract, fully as large as described by Messrs. Denslow, Underwood, and Spencer, and quoted by Mr. Stevens. It appears also that to the King's Farm (a small portion only of the ground) Trinity holds undisputed title. It is on a portion of this land that Trinity church and cemetery are situated. The title to the Bogardus property has always been in dispute, the said corporation (we quote from "Justitia's" letter to the Index) holding the same originally as trustees for the state of New York and the Bogardus heirs; and as trustees they never could or can acquire title. Hence, long leases were given by them at small rental. This is the way Trinity evades responsibility for the uses to which this property is put. "Justitia" further charges Trinity with having stifled every attempt at legislativ inquiry into her affairs, denying the right of such examination, or boasting that "they had a political weight that was not to be disregarded." "Whenever any action," he says, "has been brought to test the rights of the respectiv parties, every means has been used to avoid a direct issue of the facts and to crush out the party attempting it." He adds: "A most singular fact is that the press of New York would publish everything to favor the said corporation and nothing from the opposit side." "Justitia" also reminds Mr. Dix that "a fair, honorable, and Christian offer was made to the said corporation, as a professed Christian body, through their attorney, the Hon. G. M. Ogden, 'to submit the entire matter in controversy to a referee, so as to avoid scandal and place them forever at rest,' which they positivly declined." The same offer was then again made, in 1878, but Trinity would hav none of it.

A few years after this the New York Times gave a list of property owned by the churches of New York and exempted from taxation. Trinity was put down as owning fifteen million dollars' worth of real estate, with about half of it exempt. We hav never seen this statement disputed. About a year ago Henry George was defending his land schemes by showing how rich land corporations bled the people, and he endeavored to find out something about Trinity. His success was stated in these words: "Trinity church conducts its affairs with such absolute secrecy that even those county officers whose business it is to deal with real estate are refused a copy of its maps, and no information whatever concerning the source, extent, or disposition of the enormous revenue of the corporation can be obtained by any individual." We imagin that Mr. Wakeman's success would be no greater than his erstwhile friend George's. The legislature alone possesses the power to pry into Trinity's financial secrets—and a World reporter reports upon investigation that lobbyists profess to be able to buy legislators at remarkably reasonable rates—six for a thousand dollars. Trinity church possesses many thousands of dollars.

The only way to reach such corporations, fortressed by wealth and protected by superstition and dishonesty, is a general law taxing every dollar's worth of real estate not owned exclusivly by the state or federal government.

A Chance to Speculate.

An interesting train of thought is started by the recent performance of religious rites over James Redpath, the brilliant lecturer and writer, who is just recovering from a nearly fatal illness. On March 21st Mr. Redpath wrote a letter to John Boyle O'Reilly, editor of the Boston Pilot, thanking Mr. O'Reilly for the latter's friendship, as shown during Mr. Redpath's illness. Mr. O'Reilly publishes the letter in the Pilot. Mr. Redpath wrote that "the last solemn rites of the church for the dying" were administered to him; and he asks the editor of the Pilot to thank "the priests and nuns who in widely scattered districts offered up special prayers in his behalf in churches and convents."

Mr. Redpath has always been supposed to be a Rationalist, and certainly the articles he wrote several years ago for THE TRUTH SEEKER would be sufficient ground for the supposition. And to a Sun reporter he explained the religious performance as follows: "I think I hav more friends among Roman Catholics and the Catholic clergy than any other Protestant with the exception of Parnell, and I shall join the Roman Catholic church if I ever join any. But I am now what I hav always been, a Rationalist. It is true that the extreme unction of the church was administered to me by Dr. McGlynn and some of the other priests who were here when it was supposed I was dying."

Authorities in the Catholic church now say that Dr. McGlynn had no right to administer the last rites of the church to a dying man unless no other priest could be had, and even then the rites could not be administered unless the dying man repented. So we are left in doubt as to whether Mr. Redpath would hav gone up or down had he died last month. It is certain that he did not repent, for he avows himself still a Rationalist, and it is certain that there are a great many priests in New York besides Dr. McGlynn who could hav been induced to hear Mr. Redpath's confession. And why should Mr. Redpath hav extreme unction administered to himself? Was it another case of

When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
When the devil was well, the devil a monk was he?

Or was it the yielding of a sick man to earnest but misguided friends? As Mr. Redpath has himself publicly spoken of the matter, he cannot blame the public for speculating upon it. But, Rationalist or Catholic, we hope that Mr. Redpath will hav no further use for a priest or "extreme unction" for many years. He knows how to do a great deal of good, and he acts upon his knowledge. May he liv to convert his priestly friend from the error of his ways.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK has a branch society in San Francisco with an agent, but all he has done so far is to write a letter of recommendation of a patent medicin on the society's letter-head, which is being extensivly circulated by the press at the usual rates per inch.

HOWARD county, Tex., ought to be justly governed. The county judge, the county and district clerk, the sheriff, and the county attorney are all Infidels who tell their joys abroad. The postmaster of the county seat is also a joy-spreader. It is seldom that so many eminent citizens of one county possess equal shares of common sense.

THE Voice of March 15th says: "A policeman gets drunk in Gardiner, Me., on whisky brought by some wedding guests over the country." That was bad; but it reminds us to ask, Did the Voice ever hear how Jesus, once upon a time, thought it worth his while to perform a miracle to furnish intoxicants to some "wedding guests" who had probably neglected to bring a supply from "over the country," but who, nevertheless, were already "well drunk?" St. John (not the ex-governor) lets the cat out.

Letters from Friends.

MINNESOTA LAKE, MINN., Feb. 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I like to read the "Letters from Friends;" they are very interesting. When I read them it seems to me as if I were reading a letter from an intimate friend, because they hav the same ideas as I hav in regard to religion. Religion is only a farce. My father and mother were both very religious when they used to be young. Why? Because their parents forced them to go to church and pray, etc. But, thanks to their common sense, they turned from church-going people to Infidels.

Three cheers for Watson Heston and his pictures. They are immense. Not a bit too radical, as some remark.

I once heard Mr. Jamieson lecture in Mapleton, Minn., and it seemed to me, when I went up to shake hands with him, as if I had found a long-lost friend.

A. B. FRIEDMANN.

FARMDALE, O., March 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I send the obituary: Died, March 16, 288. Ethel Thompson, aged 5 months and 2 days, daughter of Elbridge and Carrie Thompson, of Andover, O, both stanch Secularists. In the death of little Ethel we as Liberals hav lost a bright and promising child.

As the parents had no desire to hav an orthodox funeral, Mr. James Roberts, of Andover, conducted the funeral services. His remarks were very appropriate and beautiful. Immortality, he assured us, consisted in the remembrance and continuance of good deeds. He made no reference to Christianity, the Bible, or God, and the Christian neighbors present showed no particular signs of surprise. Perhaps Mr. Roberts's scholarly and dignified bearing was impressiv to them, as that of the theologian. This is the second time Mr. Roberts has taken the place of a minister. A FRIEND.

NEW HARTFORD, IA., Feb. 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken the paper from the time it was an infant until now, and for fair dealing toward all men, and women too, it has no equal. Every person can speak his or her honest thought in the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and that is one great reason why it is the best paper on earth. If a man always agrees with me, I hav no use for him whatever. One can learn nothing from such a man, and you soon look upon him with contempt. And it is the same with a paper.

I see you hav had subscribers who were so opposed to Mr. Heston's illustrations that they stopped their paper, when the one illustration of old reprobate Solomon, with his wives and concubines, will do more good than a dozen such cranks would do in a lifetime. Such men ought to be born again; the old orthodox disease is in them yet, and they can't help honoring the boss book of blood and filth, so would like to hav you print a sort of half-pious paper just to suit their narrow, contracted ideas. MEL PIEROE.

OSAWKEE, KAN., Feb. 10, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find my dues for THE TRUTH SEEKER and for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. Please cancel my name from the subscription list. I am well satisfied with the paper, but unable at present to pay for such a luxury. I hav now suffered two failures in crops from drouths, besides other adversities, one of which is that I cannot, my stubborn brain will not, think to suit the tastes of my pious neighbors. Aside from farming I teach school. Because I did not approve the keeping of an intelligent and good man and a bright, good, and young girl in a dirty, sickening jail for refusing to comply with some minor requirements of law, I must pay the penalties of the crime of being a free lover, whether I indorse the theories of free love or not.

Because I did not hurrah over the Chicago hanging-bee, I am paraded here as being an Anarchist, and that means everything base and criminal in the eyes of most of my Christian neighbors. Though a poor man, my Liberalism costs me from fifty to a hundred dollars per year through ostracism. As soon as good crops favor me again you will receive an order for the renewal of THE TRUTH SEEKER to me.

I hope those who are able will come to the relief of the Harmans and Walker, of Valley Falls. R. S. W.

MIDDLEBURG, IND., Feb. 28, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and ANNUAL, and Ingersoll's Defense of Reynolds I hav been a subscriber of your paper since its first publication in Illinois. It is impossible to estimate the influence of such a paper. Its influence will last through all the coming ages. O that it could make its weekly visits to every family in our world! O that it could be as thick as the leaves of autumn, or as numerous as the superstitions that still occupy the mind of man!

It should be in every school and in every parlor. The illustrations are better than ever, and we congratulate you in your selection of such a genius for your artist as Brother Heston.

I may be too old to speak, for I am over fourscore, instead of "threescore and ten," as was spoken of old. You will pardon me for saying that I feel like giving you a scrap of my history. I took on the changeable garb of man in the year of 1806. I was nursed, rocked, stewed, and steeped in the corrupt yet dying cradle of superstition, bigotry, priestcraft, and intolerance for the first twenty-three years of my life. Then the sun began to shine. The vapors commenced to scatter. Cloud after cloud passed away. Reason began to assert its supremacy. The scene changes. But just as is the opium-eater who resolves "to turn over a new leaf," atom after atom was my being changed. I finally found myself standing in the light, awakened from the trance which now holds in its poisonous stupor millions of human beings. I hav lived long enough to see a great change. Change is the great law of nature. Light and knowledge are abroad; mankind are beginning not only to think but to reason. The movement and progression of science are as irresistible as the motion of atoms or the revolving of spheres. To stop progress and Freethought would be to exterminate the human race. To hold it stationary is impossible. To let it go on, as it surely must, is to not only slaughter untruth, but to bury it so deep that even its bones shall never again come to the light of the world.

The mystic veil of superstition is wearing threadbare in the glaring sunshine of the nineteenth century. All mankind are tending toward that perfection which all nature has been reaching for since the first vegetable cell existed. I hope that the noble cause of truth may go on uninterrupted, with THE TRUTH SEEKER at its head, until the earth becomes old with age, and is incapable of the lowest forms of life.

Fraternally, ISAAC IVINS.

MINNESOTA LAKE, MINN., March 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I wish Colonel Ingersoll's Argument in the Blasphemy trial; also the card presenting the Nine Demands, to hang in a frame over my bedstead to keep me awake.

I last month received a letter from my brother in the Caucasus mountains, telling of the new law by which children only of the highest class of Russians are allowed to enter gymnasiums and colleges. O tyrants! statesmen of Russia, burning to get level with Egypt and China! Indeed where will Russia be in one century? O little children of Russia! Run, children of Russia; you are in danger of getting caught in the trap set by your good friends the czar's family. Take your body and brains and get over the line of life and death—that is, the line of the Russian empire. Your government preachers hav dealt deep wounds to your manliness. Do not lift your hands to the sky and cry, Help me! You would better find out who is your friend and who your enemy. It will take centuries for the Russians to find out that, with "Obey" for the first commandment.

Your fricnd for liberty, ELY S. GLICK.

STEUBENVILLE, O., Feb. 26, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: The body of John McGuire, who died suddenly at one of the meetings of Dr. McGlynn, was refused burial in the cemetery in which he had bought a lot by the priest—who had received his money perhaps for years—for the sin of going to hear his favorit priest, who had been excommunicated for the crime of doing what he could to eradicate poverty. They had received his money all along, knowing that he attended these meetings, but he had died so suddenly they had no chance of getting any more from him. Then they showed their cloven foot. With such tyranny staring them in the face, with all the arrogance and impudence of the demands of the Roman tyrants on American citizens, why is it that a sufficient number of priests and laymen do not rebel against these foreigners and start an American Catholic church, and clear themselvs of the charge that they are more loyal to the pope than they are to their country? They certainly would get all American-born Catholics to join them, for they surely must feel mean and despicable when they think to what depth of infamy these Italian despots would hav them go, to obey them whenever the commands and duties to their country conflict with the commands of an Italian despot, and if the opportunity was offered of joining a strictly American church which Father McGlynn and a few talented priests might organize, I cannot doubt that all true Americans born, and true-hearted foreigners who came to become citizens in good faith, would flock to their standard. Then let Father McGlynn eschew politics for the present and bend all his energies to establishing a loyal, independent American Catholic church; for though the whole thing may be founded on superstition, it is certainly better to hav it in the hands of loyal citizens than in the hands of those who owe and acknowledge allegiance to any foreign potentate whatever. J. DOWNES.

GLANFORD, Feb. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.75, which apply as follows: $3 for the paper, and may God bless the reading of the word; fifty cents for two ANNUALS, and twenty-five cents for Colonel Ingersoll's Argument in the Defense of C. B. Reynolds for Blasphemy. I am sorry to say I cannot get a man in this place who will subscribe for your excellent paper. There are only two men in the whole place who will read it. I liv in a village where there never was a Freethought lecture delivered. You may as well look for the grace of God in the highlands as look for Freethought literature here. I see sometimes in "Letters from Friends" there are some that do not like the pictures. I must say I like the pictures. My paper comes very regularly on Saturday at 12 o'clock, and although I smell the dinner, and get called by the family to come on, even when hungry, I will burst the wrapper of THE TRUTH SEEKER just to look at the pictures. My eyes seem to be as hungry as my stomach. Then I scan the "Letters from Friends" to see if there are any I know. Since taking your paper I hav become acquainted with a great many folks that I hav never seen.

I hav been taking a paper printed in Toronto, called Secular Thought, edited by Charles Watts—a first-rate Freethought paper. It has been in existence for one year—just long enough to alarm the bigots. Ministers, both spiritual and political, are bound we shall not hav a printing and publishing company of our own. We had applied for incorporation by letters patent to the Ontario government, but the application has been refused on the ground that Christianity is a part of the laws of the land, that the legislature had not hitherto sanctioned the incorporation of any company or society known or considered to be in opposition to Christianity, and the government was of the opinion that no such company should be incorporated by the lieutenant-governor under the Letters Patent act. However, I hav great faith in our leader, Charles Watts, who if properly supported will, like Moses, lead us up to the promised land. I cannot close without telling you how I enjoy a Sabbath devouring the contents of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Secular Thought, while the bigots enjoy their three-in-one. JOHN MCCLEMONT.

BAKER'S CORNER, IND., Feb. 27, A.S. 288.

MR. EDITOR: This is my first letter to a Freethought paper. I am not a subscriber, but hav read a few copies. My parents tried to raise me a Hicksite Quaker, but after I commenced to work for myself, and to associate with all classes of people, almost of every religious belief, I concluded that some person must be wrong. Finally I went to the state of Arkansas with a man of the Materialistic type, and hearing him talk, I was won over to his sensible ideas; although before then, even from youth, I never believed the Bible to be divine.

I hav thought that if there was a devil, I could find a great deal of his writing in that holy book, or at least a good deal of it seemed to come from some unholy source. And as for God, I do not believe that he was ever in the book business, but he seems to be in the blizzard or cyclone business this winter, especially in the West.

I believe in no conscious intelligence in nature, outside of nervous organization, and I am now living in the only heaven I ever expect. Not knowing anything before birth, I hav all evidence to believe that I will be in a like condition after death. I do not believe that living a few days or years will giv me immortality. When I was out in Arkansas I was at one meeting when the sky-pilot asked all to rise to their feet that wanted to go to heaven. All arose but me, and I thought that as long as my brain weighs ten ounces, and I measure two inches from ear to ear, I can never use their holy devil or angry God.

I find Liberals are for common sense, and the more sense the better, instead of so much faith-guessing.

If the Christian can scarcely get to heaven with his devil to scare and his God to coax, I may just as well prepare to be made into kindling-wood for that bottomless pit; and I would just as lief be burnt to death as to go to heaven and be frozen (as it gets one degree colder for every three hundred feet we ascend) to death. J. C. GEORGE.

LEWISTOWN, MONT., Feb. 19, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 to renew my subscription and for a new subscriber. I do not see why the pictures should be any more obnoxious than political cartoons, or as much so, as they are scarcely ever personal, but they seem to disturb our orthodox brethren and some of our esthetic and church-supporting Liberals, who trace the source of all that is moral to the church—more than they do to God, or they would expect he would make an example of you or Mr. Heston, or both. I should suppose they would grow weary espousing the cause of one who seems to take so little interest in his own affairs.

This I think a very good field for a Liberal lecturer. The country is thinly settled, but people generally are Liberal in their views and generous in their heart and purse. Orthodoxy finds few conscientious supporters, and God's agents find it hard rustling to realize enough out of the unlimited number of shares in heaven which they represent to keep themselvs from taking the starvation route to that much advertised locality—which most people find as hard to locate as a blind quartz lead, and they hav no more faith in these shares than they do in those of a wildcat mining scheme.

Now, when we heard that Mr. Reynolds expected to pass through Montana on his Western tour, we corresponded with him, and when we found out the amount of ducats necessary to lure him into our mountain fastness to talk to us, we canvassed the town with a subscription paper and were rewarded with most encouraging results. Every business man in town, with the exception of one, put down his name for from five to ten dollars, and the amount was subscribed with but an hour's rustling. Where can be found another community where such a proportionate amount of Liberal spirit prevails? Of course, we were pleased with our success, and were much disappointed upon learning that he had changed his route and gone west via Kansas. And yet the field he has taken needs weeding much more than this. Ever yours for truth, reason, and justice,

W. H. CULVER.

BERLIN, N. J., March 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am nearing the "border land." A week ago yesterday I returned from my usual morning round to station, store, and post-office feeling rather feeble, as I hav for some months past, and was taken suddenly with excruciating pain in the joint of my left hip, running through and halfway across the lower part of my body, and it seemed to me that if I had been cut half-way in two the agony could not hav been more intense. I could neither lie, stand, nor sit in the same position five minutes at a time from 9 A.M. till 7 P.M., and the perspiration streaming from every pore. At 7 I became easy, but so exhausted and weak that I soon fell asleep and had a good night's rest. In the morning I was so sore I could hardly move, but got along without much suffering until 7 o'clock Monday morning, when I was again taken with the same tormenting pain, which kept me writhing in extreme agony for twelve hours. Since then I hav suffered only from soreness, weakness, faintness, and trembling. I walk about the rooms a little, sit awhile, and then lie awhile on the lounge, and thus the eight days hav passed away. I hav written nothing in the time till now, except a few lines to a fraudulent Methodist Episcopal priest whom I want to show up in some Liberal paper—for all others are closed against me—if I hav strength to before I die.

The prospect now appears to be that the little remnant of my life will be brief. I may linger along some weeks, possibly a few months, or may go suddenly. I hav no more fear of death nor the accursed hell that priests hav instituted in imagination to frighten, enslave, and rob their credulous dupes than a weary child has of slumber; and, if it was not for poor, feeble Mittie, who is not well enough to liv alone, I would be as willing to pass on to-day as at any other time. She has stood firmly by me nearly half a century, as independent in spirit and as outspoken as I, and all that time has borne the slights, scoffs, jeers, jibes, and contumely of all church people who hav known us, except here and there one whose humanity out-tops his religion, and not because we hav wronged anyone in word or deed, but simply because we are not ignorant and stupid enough to believe in an unjust, partial, wrathful, and angry God, a crafty devil, and a burning hell, and pay money to support the preaching of such blasphemy. I hav been trying some years to keep myself alive till she passes on, but if I must go first I must submit to it. If I pass away before you hear from me again, do not believe any stories that may be told by pious liars about my recantation or death-bed repentance. I hav written this because I cannot write to all my friends who read your paper, and will thank you sincerely if you will giv it an early place in THE TRUTH SEEKER. JEREMIAH HACKER.

NEWBURY, KAN., March 20, 288.

MR. EDITOR: We were lately called upon to pay our last respects to the dust of our brother Liberal John Copp, one of the pioneers of the county. His has been a life of toil and usefulness. A man of energy, ability, and character, ever in earnest, he sought the truth at its fountain-head, nature. Failing to find evidence therein to sustain the claims of creed, he doubted, and had the honesty to say so. Naturally generous, he was no less the friend and champion of the poor and oppressed than a mortal foe of bigotry, ignorance, and superstition. He died as he had lived, the benefactor of mankind. No canting hypocrit chanted his requiem. A few appropriate remarks by a friend and we laid him to rest, beside his faithful wife who had gone before. He leaves a family and a large number of friends to mourn his loss. And now to the bereaved we extend our warmest sympathies, invoking the same from brother Liberals, and though we assume not to proffer Christian assurances, we can conscientiously point them to the glittering star of hope. And even though that should dim, time heals all wounds; and after all, what choice between eternal life and eternal sleep, existence and oblivion? And yet we hope.

WILLIAM H. WINTERS.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., March 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of February 18th I find this item: "Investigators of the advisability of the government's owning the railways declare the present profits to be enormous, and allege that people can be carried across the continent for less than six dollars each." Now, these investigators do not seem to hav gone very deeply into the subject, or they would hav learned from the highest authority on the subject in the United States that the average cost of carrying passengers throughout the United States is only two and a half cents per hundred miles, and that the average cost of hauling freight trains is only one-fifteenth of one mill per ton per mile, or only about one cent per car per mile. Mind you, this is the average cost; while on long trains, on long runs, it falls below one cent per hundred miles for carrying passengers. For instance, a good locomotiv will haul 600 passengers from New York to San Francisco, and the entire cost of running the train through, including every possible expense, is $180; which is only 30 cents a head, or less than one cent a hundred miles, for it is 250 miles short of 3,000 miles. So that only $1 each for the 600 passengers would giv $420 profit on one train; which would compare very favorably with all other industries throughout the land; as I know that most of the manufacturers of staple hardware would be glad to be insured ten per cent profit on their year's output. But the long and the short of it is, the railways charge one hundred times the cost for freight and passenger service; so that if our mail service was in the hands of corporations, and they charged at the same rates for that as we are paying for freight and passenger service, we would be paying $2 a letter, instead of two cents. Couple with the above the fact that the railroad corporations hav stolen enough of the public lands to make nine states as large as the state of Ohio, and got it exempted from taxation at that; and consider the fact that four men in the Union Pacific railroad company hav put in their own pockets over $100,000,000 between them; and that one man in the Central Pacific road has made $70,000,000—if you hav a mind that can grasp all the above items, you will begin to get some idea of the lovely workings of Congress the past twenty-five years. With the above facts before you, read Cleveland's quibbling about the pretended investigations into the Pacific railroad, and you will probably hav about the same opinion of the man that I hav, and you ought to hav. But why should we not hav the postal service under the control of monopolies, the same as almost everything else that is a public necessity? Is the mail service of so vastly much more importance to the people than the passenger and freight service that it is the only one thing under the government that people are sufficiently interested in to be justified in controling it? If so, will some of our political pettifoggers rise and explain? I can think of no one more competent to make that thing plain to the common understanding than is Van Buren Denslow, whose articles on "The Distribution of Wealth" are so clear and convincing. They are fully equal, in my mind, to the twaddle of the average pulpit-pounder. Only I do not think he has been as exhaustiv as he might hav been. He left out of sight the much better system of "distribution" that prevailed in the Southern states before the war; I mean better for the laborer, for that system involved the care of the laborer, and provided him a home and other advantages that are not enjoyed under the beautiful system Mr. Denslow advocates.

But suppose the Constitution had been as silent on the subject of post-offices and post-roads as it was on the subject of railroads and depots, and the mail service had drifted into the grasp of corporations, and we had all along been paying one hundred times the cost of service, as we are now paying for freight and passenger service; and suppose upon investigation it could be shown that two cents, instead of $2, would pay the cost, and that it was proposed that the government take control of the mail service, and run it at cost of running and repairs, and suppose it was submitted to the popular vote, everyone who has been watching the course of events for the past twenty-five years knows that the villainous press would oppose the measure, and call into play the usual amount of ridicule and blackguardism, which goes much farther with your average voter than reason and logic, and the measure would be defeated. And we would keep right on paying our $2 postage, and blowing over our freedom and independence, and our "best government on earth," and our Fourth of July spread-eagle gush; and toadying after our presidents, and all that sort of stuff which shows how very intelligent we are as a nation. But really, I wish those investigators who ascertained that passengers could be carried across the continent for less than $6 had read "Social Solutions." On page 24 of this little work they will find an article headed: "Across the Continent for $1," by Will D. Southworth, who makes use of some of the figures in the report of the American Society of Civil Engineers in their convention June 25, 1885. Mr. Southworth makes out a strong case; but I think Mr. Denslow could very easily make it clear that people are much better off, especially the wage-workers, to pay at the rate of two and a half dollars a hundred miles for riding on the railways than if they only had to pay two and one-half cents. I think so for the reason that the reasoning of those conservativ political pettifoggers is so clear and convincing, and so consistent with all the surrounding facts and conditions. Very often before wading clear through one of those articles, I had to stop and get a piece of smoked glass to look through, for such dazzling brilliancy was too much for the naked eye. But, at the same time, it is just such swash as takes with the average voter better than plain common sense.

GEO. GEER.

DETROIT, Feb. 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Brother E. A. Stevens in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 7th says there are said to be over two hundred thousand Freethinkers in this country, and that Freethinkers are the natural defenders of that priceless boon, religious freedom. Please allow me to say that we never yet hav had the priceless boon, and there is just the foolish mistake of all who call themselvs Freethinkers. Thinking ourselvs free does not make it so; and the continual ranting and railing against those who are opposed to Freethought does us a thousand times more harm than good. Mr. Stevens says: "Alas! the little band who annually giv liberally, nobly, generously toward the three agencies which can possibly perpetuate and extend that religious freedom are very few in number!" Well, without detracting one mite from the noble generosity of those who giv so nobly, I must declare the total waste of all such generosity. The tendency of all means used by Freethinkers is to advertise their opponents, and works just as all persecutions hav always done and always will; for the very slightest examination and thought ought to convince everyone that religious people hav always claimed to be persecuted and do now, and, while it is very pleasant and encouraging to take a lamb from the Christian sheepfold and allow him to feel free from his superstition, yet we are making no progress toward liberty for ourselvs or them until we learn that political liberty is the only foundation of religious liberty. Mr. Stevens says: "Some of these pretended Liberals are paying their money to support the church; intellectually they don't believe in orthodox dogmas, but industrially and commercially they are slaves." This is true of all of us, and we shall make no progress toward liberty of thought until we fully realize this great fact. Mr. Stevens does not believe this as a fact, but only as a mental illusion, and he rakes these poor fellow-slaves over the coals of sheol for acting out the nature of slaves while he, as a slave also, tries to believe he is free. Again, he says: "We hav no place of future torment with which to frighten Freethinkers, but they are liable to receive a hell of a reception right here in the near future if they neglect to assist those who are battling on the outposts for universal freedom." Now, the Freethinkers are nowhere battling for universal freedom. Oh, no; they never mention it. Freethinkers, Mr. Stevens included, stubbornly assert that they liv in a free country under a free government, and are a free people; and just so long as they continue to believe this lie there is more hope for Sodom and Gomorrah than of success to Freethought; and please don't you forget that a Freethinker in as broad a sense as can be found says so. The social and political condition of this country is in a fearful state. If I can remember well, we are in the same condition that we were in twenty-five or thirty years ago, greatly intensified. If anyone will read Anthony Froude's "Cæsar" and note the condition of the people of Rome, he will see a great similarity to this country now; and anyone who will read the history of this country for one hundred and twenty years ought to be able to see that the claim that we liv under a free government any more than do the people of Russia, Austria, or Ireland is all bosh. And if we, as Freethinkers, propose to work and fight for any better conditions, here is the place, and the object to work for.

I hav been trying to get interested in the chat of Mr. Folsom and Mr. Denslow, but they are too silly to hardly be amusement. My sister once asked me to read a book written by a Methodist divine entitled, "A Theodicy," and after reading it nearly through she asked me how I liked it and what I thought of it. I told her it was the most flowery mud-puddle I had ever waded through, and I only wished to know if the writer was still alive after such an effort; and the essays of Mr. Denslow on the subject of "The Distribution of Wealth" hav strongly reminded me of that book, for after occupying about a page a week of THE TRUTH SEEKER since January, he has said nothing of interest to anyone who is earnestly interested in the subject of the distribution of wealth. He jumbles up all the statistics, and political tirades against Socialists and Anarchists, and vague notions about foreign countries to such an extent that it reads like a superannuated old preacher's sermon that reaches way along to the forty-ninthly or thereabout, with the congregation all asleep. He assumes as many false premises and bases as an orthodox disputant; and his whole essay is so filled with fallacies that anyone would get asleep trying to sort them out. Neither Mr. Denslow nor Mr. Folsom has taken the pains to learn what he wants to talk about, and so all their talk and arguments are from a false premis and hav no force. The condition of our country is too serious to waste time or the space in the best and only really free paper we hav to fill it with wind. With seventy-five thousand known criminals in the one state of New York; with thousands of banditti, highwaymen, and a continual guerilla warfare with burglars and thieves; with murders and suicides innumerable, it is most childishly absurd to talk about the laws of economics, the differences between capital and labor, the "laws of trade," etc. Socialism, Communism, Anarchy, or any other nonsense are far more worthy of respectful attention than the man who wanders all over Shakspere's plays and the dictionary to show that thuggism is deduced from an economic mistake. There is one first great truth that Americans must learn: We are slaves. If we are Freethinkers, we must think of this. If, as Mr. Stevens claims, we are battling for universal freedom, it is high time we should learn the first step in the alphabet of liberty. There has been much talk about celebrating the birthday of the liberty-loving Thomas Paine. But Thomas Paine while fighting for liberty as a right and a principle had no conception of liberty as a condition and a fact. The people of this country were slaves to England before the Revolution, and those who advocated a separation from England and who labored for Independence never advocated or proposed any change in the government of the new country differeut from the old government. Slavery by taxation, and taxation, which is slavery, were continued just the same, and by the same methods, and for the same purpose, as before; and so taxation and consequent slavery hav continued and increased daily and hourly year in and year out until vice, crime, and misery predominate and overshadow every spot of land in this country, and the ancient expression, "There is none that doeth good, nay, not one," is more appropriate than ever before. Our daily and weekly papers are filled with accounts of murders, suicides, vice, crime, misery, and corruption. To try to fulfill the hopes and desires of the Freethinkers by any other methods than by laboring for the freedom of the whole people of this country from the slavery of debt is just as hopeless as to amputate our lower extremities to relieve us of rheumatism.

The Editor asks Dr. Monroe, "Are the people free when men are imprisoned for working on Sunday?" and yet he, the Editor, in a late edition says the laws are all right; the Constitution is the best in the world. Let the Freethinking readers read C. B. Reynolds's description of Kansas in the issue of February 4th—hard coal $15 to $17 a ton; the people too poor to build barns; scarcely a farm without a mortgage, with interest twelve to thirty per cent. "In great cities the pawnbrokers' shops are found in the most squalid, poverty-stricken neighborhood. They could do no business only for the helpless poverty of the people in their vicinity. In every place in Kansas I hav visited there are everywhere staring you in the face large signs, 'Money to Loan.' Every such sign tells of blighted hopes, failure, poverty, ruin." But Mr. Reynolds has used his eyes to very little effect if he has not found these same signs much more numerous in every city and large town all over this great, free country. A sign, "Small-pox Infection For Sale," would be more appropriate; and if Mr. Reynolds desires to free the people of this country from superstition and misery, he must direct his efforts against this terrible want and deprivation of money, and consequent debt, poverty, want, and crime. And again may be quoted the question of the Editor: "Are the people free?"

Solomon says, "He that getteth, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at the end shall die a fool." And Solomon robbed and enslaved his people by taxation, just as has every religious government to this day. Every government that enslaves its people is upheld and supported by the priesthood, and when we can make the government free, priestcraft and religion will die out. They cling to the throne, and glue their fingers to the government that supports them. The world has always been at war with poverty, because governments hav always been controled by money (debt) lenders, and hav refused to put money in circulation sufficient to protect the people from debt and the mortgage shark. Now, if the Freethought lecturers ever do any good for freedom of thought, they must change the order of battle and work for the freedom of our whole country from debt and the debt-lender, for debt is the fruit of taxation, and is the cause of all poverty, war, vice, crime, and misery, and upon these ills has the church been built in all ages. I am opposed to Anarchy, Socialism, and all kindred ideas to relieve the oppressed as clear nonsense. I hav a happy time whenever I can get a chat with a minister or church crank, but deeper and beyond all else I see the real oppressor of the people is the government, that by taxation makes slaves and paupers of them, and then licenses the vampire, debt-lending bankers to rob them.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight.
When the night is beginning to lower.
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

"I Want to See Summer."

[A little girl, weary of the cold of winter, said, "Oh, how I want to see summer!" Her father took her to Cressbrook greenhouse, where she basked in the bloom and beauty of mid-summer, to her infinit delight, perfectly charmed with the wealth of sweetness around her.]

Dear child! her little heart had pined
For summer's sun and flowers;
For spicy wood and mossy earth,
Aglow with leafy bowers.

Tired out she was with winter's chill,
With all the wintry host
Of piercing winds and leaden skies,
Glare ice and biting frost.

"Sweet summer! Oh, I long to see
Its flowers and singing birds!
How I shall greet its dawn," she said,
"I cannot tell in words."

Along the frozen road she sped,
Led by her papa's hand;
When, all at once, she stood transfixed,
By fragrant odors fanned.

Flowers above, below, around,
Pinks, lilies, fronded fern;
Tulips, daisies, violets blue—
Sweet flowers at every turn.

Canaries trilled their mellow notes;
The sky-lark soared aloft;
A parrot, too, from out the green,
Laughed gleefully and oft.

The little maid, with sparkling eyes,
Turned to her father there:
"I did not know—before," she said,
"'Twas summer, anywhere!

"But here the blossoms liv and grow,
In this sweet perfumed air;
The winter's cold is all without,
And here 'tis always fair."

So, though shadows cold and gray
May fall 'mid toil and care;
Though tired the heart, each one may keep
A summer garden there.

Exquisit buds may there unfold
Bright petals, dewy sweet,
Whose breath some traveler may fill
With happiness complete.

Thus shall the tender, loving word,
The sympathetic tear,
The kindly thought, the blessed deed,
Make summer all the year. S. H. W.

Too Hoo Too.

On a sycamore limb sat a solemn cat-owl,
Screaming, "Too hoo too! too hoo too! too hoo too!"
Only watching to catch a mouse or a fowl
With his, "Too hoo too! too hoo too! too hoo too!"
When along that rough region there happened to pass
Something creeping and crawling among the wild grass,
While its croppy ears winked at the echoes, like brass
Ringing, "Too hoo too! too hoo too! too hoo too!"

Quickly swooping adown then, that cattish old owl,
With his, "Too hoo too! too hoo too! too hoo too!"
Fiercely clutched that "small deer" in the lock of a fowl,
Screeching, "Too hoo too! too hoo too! too hoo too!"
And then flying as fast as he could from the place,
All the while putting on his best thanksgiving face,
That grim, pious old owl seemed a-saying his grace,
Chanting, "Too hoo too! too hoo too! too hoo too!"

But the cat-owl had reckoned without his strange host,
Counting, "Two who too? two who too? two who too!"
Oh, they boast the most wisely who latest do boast,
Shouting, "Too hoo too! too hoo too! too hoo too!"
'Twas a weasel he'd pounced, and as lighter he pressed,
His live dinner squirmed round, stuck its tooth in his breast,
The old owl shrieked out like a demon distressed,
A loud, "Too hoo too! too hoo too! too hoo too!"

Lo! the weasel went free; 'twas the cat-owl that died,
Moaning, "Too hoo too! too hoo too! too hoo too!"
Their own threats may befall those who others deride,
Sneering, "Too hoo too! too hoo too! too hoo too!"
So the long condemned gods who the first kindled hell,
When they sought to roast others they soonest there fell;
Let all harsh judges halt or their own fate as well
May be, "Too hoo too! too hoo too! too hoo too!" John P. Guild.

Biographical.

ANDREW JACKSON.

March 14th was the 121st anniversary of the birth of one of America's great benefactors, Andrew Jackson, who rose from poverty and obscurity to the highest place in the gift of the American people, simply by the sheer force of his own character.

Andrew Jackson was born in North Carolina, March 14, 1767. His father died before he was born, and the mother was left in poverty. In youth Andrew was brave, passionate; cared little for books, but, like Washington, was very fond of athletic and military sports. His life was one of adventure and peril. It would take many pages to record the dangerous and perilous times connected with his history. When only fourteen years old he was captured by the British, but they offered him his freedom if he would black the commander's boots. Like a true American, he refused. Therefore he was sent to prison with a bad wound. While in this wretched place he contracted the small-pox, and was very sick for some time. Then his mother, the dearest of all to him, passed away while caring for the American prisoners at Charleston. Thus he was left destitute and parentless. Little did he dream of his brilliant future. He worked at various trades, but finally resolved to study law.

In 1796 he was elected to Congress. He was a man of high temper, and would often get into quarrels. The war with the Creek Indians broke out, and young Jackson served gallantly as an officer. For his dashing bravery in the War of 1812 he won a high reputation, which finally resulted in electing him to the presidency. His nomination was at first ridiculed by many; they thought, "whatever might be his military prowess, neither his temper nor his ability recommended him as a statesman." Yet his reëlection proved his great success as president. He was a man of great energy and judgment. He was honest, warm-hearted, and had a horror of debt.

As a patriot and statesman few hav excelled Andrew Jackson. He died at his home near Nashville, Tenn., in 1845. Thus passed away one of America's greatest men—one who helped to shape our Union and make it the most prosperous country in the world. America owes him a debt of gratitude.

Correspondence.

Burnett, Neb., March 19, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: I thought I would write to you. I hav four sisters and three brothers. My father has the book on Anarchism; he likes it very well. I am nine years old. It is a very disagreeable day. I hav five studies: Reading, spelling, arithmetic, writing, and physiology. My father takes The Truth Seeker; he likes it very well.

Yours truly, George Whitney.

Manchester, Ia., March 6, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: This is the second letter that I hav written to you. I am ten years old. My father takes The Truth Seeker. I like to read the Children's Corner. I hav two brothers and one sister. One brother and my sister are at home, and one brother is in Nebraska learning the printer's trade. I hav the "Story Hour," and think it is a really nice book. Please excuse mistakes.

Yours truly, Charlie Mead.

Dillon, Mont., March 14, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: Papa has taken The Truth Seeker about two years. I hav not been to school for a long time. Our teacher is very strict. Her name is Jennie Carter. I was pleased to see my first letter printed, and hope to succeed again. We liv ten miles out of town. I wait anxiously for The Truth Seeker every week. I am twelve years old. Well, I will close, with best wishes to all. I remain, Your little Freethinker.

Allie Bliven.

Goldthwaite, Tex., March 21, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: As I never hav seen any correspondence from this place, I thought perhaps a few lines might interest my little friends who read the Children's Corner. I am sixteen years old. My pa takes The Truth Seeker, and I am very fond of reading the Children's Corner. There are a number of Liberals in this place. I hav three sisters and two brothers, and they all read The Truth Seeker and like it very much.

I will close for the present. This being my first letter, you will please excuse mistakes.

Adelia McPherson.

Langlois, March 11, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon, and Readers of The Children's Corner: A kindly greeting! I am glad to be numbered with Liberal children. I am eleven years old, and liv in the southwestern county of Oregon, near Cape Blanco. Our house is on the left bank of Floras creek, quite a large stream. My papa owns a farm of one hundred acres. I hav a brother and sister older than myself, and a sister and two brothers younger. We hav nice times boat-riding on the creek. Our house is in the midst of a forest filled with birds and squirrels. I suppose you all know how it is in the first of spring, when every living thing is in its merry glee. We hav school here only in the dry season. This is my first attempt to write to the Corner. Dell Cope.

Richmond, Mo., March 25, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: I thought I would write to the Corner. I am eleven years old. I study arithmetic, spelling, and the Fourth Reader. I hav a nice teacher; her name is Miss Mamie Shotwell. She is very kind to us. I hav one brother and one sister. My brother's name is Henry, and sister's name is Maud. Papa takes The Truth Seeker, and I read the Children's Corner. I think it is very nice. I will close, as I hav nothing more to say. This is my first letter. I hope to see it in print.

Yours truly, Clara A. Robinson.

Frenchtown, Neb., March 12, 1888.

My Dear Friend: While I inclose this little poem for the Children's Corner—that is, if it will be acceptable and not too old and prosy—I wish to thank you for your sweet letter to Freethought. I am always glad to see the letters of our noble army of women, and only wish there were more who could write stirring appeals to those who yet wear the chains of mental slavery.

I am sure Freethought will be a success, and the only mystery to me is why they havn't had such a paper before on that "golden shore."

With best wishes for yourself and the Corner, I am, Your sincere friend,

Mary B. Finch.

Omaha, Neb., March 22, 1888.

Dear Miss Wixon: I am going to try to write a little letter for the Corner. I came to this country a little over three years ago, and when I first came to Omaha, I began working to support my dear old mother, which I yet do. I worked for a gentleman by the name of R. F. Williams, in the confectionery business. I had to tend store for him, and I had plenty of time to read. I bought a novel and started to read it, but Mr. Williams said I should not read such books. He said if I would quit he would giv me a book to read. He then gave me Colonel Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses." I read said book and found it to be common sense, as Mr. Williams said. And ever since that day I hav read his works, and found them to be as good to read as any books ever published.

Your little Freethinker friend,

Jones Wangberg.

Salem, Ill., March 19, 288.

To dear Mother Wixon and Corner: As I hav been out of the circle for so long, I now intend to see if I can gain admittance again. Although I hav not written, it is no reason that I hav not read.

There are four of our family that attend our lyceum—two sisters and one brother. My youngest sister is only seven years of age. One of my old school-teachers was present on one occasion, and, as it happened, we were all on duty. After we were dismissed he came to my father and spoke in these words: "Does your family run this thing? I heard nothing worth listening to other than theirs"—and I will say that they were all from the grand old Truth Seeker.

We are going to hav an entertainment the last night. My brother is going to speak Colonel Ingersoll's speech at Cincinnati. I intend to speak his oration on the Declaration of Independence.

My kind young friends, we should make use of every opportunity that presents itself to lav these grand speeches before the people.

These are the best of maxims:

"A theory that is afraid of investigation is undeserving a place in the human heart."

"A prayer that must hav a cannon behind it better never be uttered."

"Education is the most radical thing in the world; to build a school-house is to construct a fort."

"Agitate, educate, and investigate."

"Liberty, fraternity, and equality."

"Giv me liberty or giv me death."

Hurrah for Freethought, Miss Wixon, and the Corner. Yours for truth and till the last vestige of superstition is wiped out,

Rufus O. Williams.

P.S.—I wish to tender my thanks to Uncle and Aunt Wollison, of New York. May their life be expanded and made happy.

R. O. W.

Thrashing Her Teacher.

A teacher at Punxsutawney, Pa., gave a school-girl a severe whipping, and then said, "Now, if you think I did wrong in punishing you thus, you may take the rod and serve me in like manner." To his astonishment the girl took him at his word, and gave him a regular thrashing.

A disgusted porker: "Patrick, you were on a bad spree yesterday."

"Yes, Mr. Ellis, I was. Bless me, if I weren't a-layin' in the gutter wid a pig. Father Ryan came along, looked at me, an' says, says he: 'One is known by the company he kapes.'"

"And did you get up, Patrick?"

"No—but the pig did."

A Tax on the Tongue.

A novel club was organized in a town of the Old Nutmeg State last winter, one which would not fail to do good in many other places if its plan of operations was faithfully carried out. It was called the Tongue Guard, and each member pledged herself to pay a penny into the treasury every time she said anything against another person, whether she absolutely knew it to be deserved or took it from some one's "say so." This was done by means of home boxes, and at the end of three months they were carried to headquarters, and the contents utilized for charitable purposes. It would require, of course, a great respect for one's word to keep the pledge, since many pennies collected in the box would stamp one as ill-natured and a gossip, but this mortification was probably prevented by having all of the boxes exactly alike and without mark, so that they could not be identified. The mere matter of being obliged to put a penny in the box when thoughtless remarks were made would be curativ because of its inducing the habit of thinking when speaking.

He Could Not See It.

A lady who is a firm believer in the cure of everything by the mind, or rather in the non-existence of all pains and maladies, has a little boy who complained of a terrible toothache. She took him to a "Christian scientist" to be cured, and remarked to that lady as soon as she had entered the room:

"My boy thinks he has a terrible toothache, Mrs. Scientist, and I hav brought him to you to be cured of it."

Having brought her attention to the case, Mrs. Scientist said:

"Now, my little boy, you must look me right in the eye. [A pause.] Now you havn't any tootbache."

"Yes, I hav, too!" shouted the boy.

The scientist smiled patiently, and tried it over again.

"You must look me right in the eye and try to forget your toothache," she said. Then there was another steadfast pause. "Ah, now you havn't any toothache."

"Yes, I hav, too!" screamed the boy again.

The practitioner went through the process once more with fresh persuasion. The boy seemed inclined to be silent this time.

"Well, I guess you havn't any toothache now, my boy," said she.

"You lie!" said the boy, quietly.

He was taken away, toothache and all.

"Granny, whar you gwine?" "Granny," an immense body, with sable visage, pouting lower lip, and a savage aspect, turned sharply round and confronted the widow's mite. "Whar I gwine? Whar I gwine? I ain't gwine to tell you whar I gwine. You al'ays axin', 'Whare'e gwine? whare'e gwine?' I gwine whar I gwine—dat's whar I gwine. 'Whar'e gwine? whar'e gwine?' al'ays axin', 'Whar'e gwine? whar'e gwine?' I ain't gwine to tell'e whar I gwine."

Among the subjects considered by Mr. Remsburg are: The Church and Morality; Criminal Statistics, showing the creeds of the prisoners in the penitentiaries; the Church and Civilization; the Church and Science; the Church and Learning; the Church and Liberty; the Church and the Antislavery Reform; the Woman's Rights Movement; the Temperance Reform; the Church and the Republic.

Bible Morals. Twenty Crimes and Vices Sanctioned by Scripture; Falsehood and Deception; Cheating; Theft and Robbery; Adultery and Prostitution; Murder; Wars of Conquest and Extermination; Despotism; Intolerance and Persecution; Injustice to Woman; Unkindness to Children; Cruelty to Animals; Human Sacrifices; Cannibalism; Witchcraft; Slavery; Polygamy; Intemperance; Poverty and Vagrancy; Ignorance and Idiocy; Obscenity. Price, single copies, 25 cents; 6 copies, $1. Special discount on larger quantities.

Sabbath-Breaking. This is the best and most thorough work ever written on the Sabbath from a rational point of view. Large and handsome print. The question is discussed under the following heads: Origin of the Sabbatic Idea; The Jewish Sabbath; The Christian Scriptures and the Sabbath; Examination of Sunday Arguments; Origin of Christian Sabbath; Testimony of the Christian Fathers; The Sabbath during the Middle Ages: The Puritan Sabbath; Testimony of Christian Reformers, Scholars, and Divines; Abrogation of Sunday Laws. Price, 25 cents; six copies, $1.00.

Thomas Paine. The Apostle of Religious and Political Liberty. Tells the story of the Author-Hero's life, delineates the leading traits of his character and genius, and vindicates his name from the aspersions cast upon it. Choice extracts from "Common Sense," "American Crisis," "Rights of Man," and "Age of Reason" are given; also, tributes to Paine's character from more than one hundred noted persons of Europe and America, many of them written expressly for this work. Second edition, 160 pages, printed on fine tinted paper, neatly bound, and containing a handsome steel portrait of Paine. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Image Breaker. Six Lectures: Decline of Faith, Protestant Intolerance, Washington an Unbeliever; Jefferson an Unbeliever; Paine and Wesley; Christian Sabbath. Each 5 cents; bound, paper, 25 cents; per doz. 40 cts.

The Apostle of Liberty. An address delivered in Paine Hall, before the N. E. Freethinkers' Convention, January 29, 1884. Price, 10 cents.

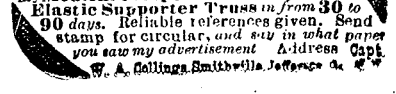
Reminiscences of a Preacher.

A RADICAL ROMANCE.



By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectively and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

Price, in paper, 50 cents; in cloth, 75 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

The Better Way, of Cincinnati, O., says, "We are assured that Dr. Fellows, the eminent specialist of Vineland, N. J., is an educated gentleman of superior mind and large attainments, and that success in his profession has brought him business, not only from all parts of this country, but from foreign shores. He is in the prime of life and able to transact his various professional duties promptly and well and giv satisfaction in every instance. His references are numbered by thousands."

Dr Fellows treats all those peculiar diseases resulting from indiscretion and ignorance of youth. Those who are ailing should send 10 cents for the Dr.'s little book setting forth an EXTERNAL APPLICATION—a positiv cure.

Books, Pamphlets, Periodicals, etc.

In Remsburg's "Bible Morals," p. 42, the words, "Rev. E. D. Simons, professor in Macon College. Georgia," should read, "Rev. E. D. Simms, professor in Randolph-Macon College."

The Open Court has reduced the number of its pages, and increased the frequency of its issues. It will now make its appearance weekly. The Open Court is a German periodical published in English.

Mr. Gladstone's review of the religious opinions of Colonel Ingersoll will probably appear in the May number of the North American Review, to be followed in the next issue by a response by Colonel Ingersoll.

H. L. Green's Magazine for April is a very good number. The reading matter is good, and in the execution of his portraits Mr. Green's workmen hav improved greatly. The price of the Magazine is 25 cents, and it is sold at this office.

"The Struggle for Existence," by Prof. T. H Huxley, in the Popular Science Monthly for April, is worth the whole cost of the magazine. which is 50 cents. The other articles, also, are interesting to students of general and technical science.

The Sarasavisandaresa is the organ of the Buddhists of Colombo, Ceylon. It generally contains one or two articles in English—one of which we copied recently—but the larger portion of its print is as inexplicable as the hieroglyphics on the obelisk in Central park. Ceylon is a nice country, with only 170,000 Christians in it, but the language is beyond us.

The coarsest part of the pamphlet, "Bible Bestiality, and Filth from the Fathers," is its title. The object of the book is to show that the early Christian fathers exceeded the author of the Bible in "blasphemy, indecency, and obscenity" in their interpretation and applications of the vulgar incidents related in holy writ. The book has an introduction by "Lucianus," and is published in England.

Messrs. Putnam & Macdonald's Freethought comes regularly and promptly from San Francisco every week, and we advise those of our friends who say they miss in THE TRUTH SEEKER Mr. Putnam's poetic "News and Notes," and George Macdonald's enjoyable articles, to add the paper to their list of Liberal journals. The paper is worth four dollars a year, but it can be had for two.

Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker insinuates that the Boston Investigator is not a Liberal journal. It is our opinion that Mr. Tucker doesn't know a Liberal journal when he sees it. After reading his paper of the 31st ult., we are strongly inclined to agree with the Workingmen's Advocate, of New Haven, which says: "There's a paper published in Boston that for skilful manipulation of words, conscienceless misrepresentation, and the aggressiv self-assertion of its editor is remarkable. Liberty is its title."

E. A. Stevens, the secretary of the American Secular Union, has issued leaflets containing a list of officers of the Union, the Nine Demands of Liberalism, Colonel Ingersoll's definition of Secularism, and the president's (S. P. Putnam's) plea for organization. Five hundred of these leaflets are mailed to friends of the Union for $1.25, and all are urgently solicited to send orders for them, and circulate them when received. Mr. Stevens proves to be an energetic secretary, and the Union deserves the support of all Liberals who are in favor of doing something besides talk.

Mr. F. A. Pierce and Mr. A. L. Jones hav resuscitated the Pittsburgh Truth, and issue it as a monthly at one dollar a year. It has eight pages about the size of Freethought, is printed in large type on good paper, and makes a first-rate appearance. The object of Truth is: "To secure the enforcement of the Demands of Liberalism, and the placing of all American citizens upon a full equality in our so-called courts of justice, and in the halls of legislation; to be truthful, just, and decent, and to publish the best thought of the day." We do most heartily hope that Truth will attain its object.

"'System of Economical Contradictions; or, The Philosophy of Misery.' By P. J. Proudhon. Vol. I. 469 pages octavo. Price, in cloth, $3.50; in full calf, blue, gilt edges, $6 50. Published and sold by Benj. R. Tucker, Box 3,366, Boston, Mass. This constitutes the fourth volume of Proudhon's complete works, and is uniform in style with the first volume, 'What is Property?' The second and third volumes of the complete works hav not yet been published in English. The next volume to appear will be the fifth of the complete works; that is, the second and final volume of the 'Economical Contradictions.' The complete works will comprise about fifty volumes, which are being published in quarterly parts of 64 pages each, as a periodical under the name of the 'Proudhon Library.' A prospectus giving full details of the enterprise may be had by applying to Benj. R. Tucker, Box 3,366, Boston, Mass. As these are subscription books, no discount on them is given to the book trade, but subscribers to the 'Proudhon Library' get them at a saving of about thirty per cent." The foregoing was kindly furnished us by Mr. Tucker when he made us a present of the handsome volume now adorning our library. We invite its careful scrutiny by those who admire Proudhon. We don't.

We hav not the slightest idea why anyone should send us the Boone county, Iowa, District Quarterly, published in the interests of Boone county Methodism. The Methodist Advocate, edited by the peppery Dr. Buckley, is worth reading for the magnificence of its theologic assurance, but the District Quarterly is not even absurd enough to be interesting. The most convincing argument in it is the following touching little verse:

Bring your golden dollars, friends, we want a million more,
The gospel herald everywhere is met with open door,
And God is making bare his arm on every heathen shore,
While we are coming with a million.

"The Trial of the Judgment," is a review by Gen. M. M. Trumbull of the Chicago Anarchist cases. The publisher is W. H. Hale, 225 Dearborn street, Chicago. In forwarding the book Mr. Hale writes: "The unimpeachable character of its author, as well as the importance of the subject he discusses, should, we believe, cause a thorough perusal of his work, and a free and full expression of your opinion." We agree with Mr. Hale in his estimates, but as our opinion of this matter has been pretty freely expressed on previous occasions, we will forbear to say more than that a careful perusal of this book will convince unprejudiced persons that we were right. The price is 25 cents.

The Chicago Secular Union, having captured a fine church in which to hold its Sunday meetings, and rebaptized it the Forum, has now issued, through the generosity of Dr. Henry, a fine membership card entitling the holder to his pew for a year. The card sent the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a heavy, gilt, beveled-edge affair, gorgeous in blue, and black, and red, with the American flag as natural as genuin bunting floating over the upset cross. The number of our membership is 50, and the seats are 1 and 2. As we cannot attend regularly, we make a present of our privilege to the best-looking young lady in the Union. It's leap year, and she should invite her best young man.

An anonymous publisher has sent us a pamphlet by an anonymous author arguing for the admission of Utah into the union of states. As long as the Catholics are allowed to run New York, and the Protestants most of the other states, we see no good reason why the Mormons shouldn't hav a state to manage instead of a territory. They agree, if admitted, to dispense with polygamy, to separate church and state, and hav no religious tests for voters, officeholders, or witnesses, etc., and make other promises which they will probably violate as soon as admitted, just as all the other Christian sects do in other states. The pamphlet is printed in this city by Hart & Van Arx, and probably distributed gratis as a campaign document.

The contents of the North American Review for April are excessivly controversial, including a defense of the prize ring, the tariff, Mohammedanism, the bill repealing the Saturday half-holiday law, and the dead German kaiser. Other articles are: "The Fur-Seal Fishery Dispute," by Frederick Schwatka; the "Burning of Columbia," S. C., by Capt. A. E. Wood; "Gilbert's Fables," by T. C. Martin; a "Perilous Balance," by Rossiter Johnson, and a consideration of General Sherman as a possible president. Considering the prominence of the tariff question just now, the symposium on "The President's Panacea" is likely to be of value to one political party during the coming presidential campaign. Mr. Rice, the editor, has lost sight of his back-end-of-the-dictionary motto, "Tros Tyriusque mihi nullo discrimine agetur," and thrown the influence of the Review on the Protection side. Single numbers of the Review are 50 cents, and may be obtained at this office.

"The Abbess of Jouare," translated from the French of Ernest Renan, is a tale of the French Revolution, in 1793-4, when the people were beheading the aristocrats and the priests for the wrongs done them. The story of the abbess of Jouare is one of the most romantic of those horrible times, for which the church was directly responsible. The abbess and her lover were imprisoned in the college of Plessis, which from an educational institution had been turned into the most gloomy jail in Paris. They were both under sentence of death, and expected the arrival of the death-cart in the morning. Having as they thought but a night to liv, they yielded to their love. But instead of both being called for at dawn, only the lover, who should hav been her husband, was taken, and the abbess was left to bewail her fate, when death would hav been joyous to her, so sweet did she hold the privilege of making the fatal voyage with him—"to follow him upon the bloody platform." A friend who loved her saved her life. and she devoted it to the care of her child (earning the few pence necessary for her existence by doing menial errands) and to repentance for her sin of love. Finally she marries the friend, who hears her story, and concludes that her unique history, her intense passion, her pure life, her strength of character, her expiatory grief, make her "twenty times more admirable than on the terrible day when, for the first time, upon the benches of the revolutionary tribunal, she ravished his heart." All's well that ends well. Renan has told the story simply, purely, poetically; and his translators, Messrs. Georges Delon and J. F. Rhodes, hav put his masterly French into rhythmical English. G. W. Dillingham, of this city, publishes the book, and the price is probably about a dollar.

The Stockholder, a journal devoted to the interests of those gentlemen who constitute "the street," and deal in railway stocks and other portable representativs of permanent value, has this to say of Felix L. Oswald's "Secret of the East:" "It is well written, and is a merciless attack on Christianity. So far as we can judge from the book, the Secret of the East is that Christ was a Buddhist missionary, and hence Christianity is, in the words of the author, the daughter creed of Buddha; its pessimism, anti-naturalism, and anti-cosmic tendency are essentially the doctrins preached by Buddha Sakyamuni. In the appendix are given the Indian sources of the New Testament; Concordance of Buddhism and Christianity; Dogmatical Analogies; Ceremonial Analogies; and Historical Value of the New Testament. It is an interesting and readable book." The Stockholder is right; the price of the book is a dollar, and THE TRUTH SEEKER has it for sale.

The Alarm Company, of Chicago, hav printed in handsome pamphlet form the address of Juliet H. Severance at the Chicago celebration of Paine's birthday, and sell it for 10 cents. E. A. Stevens has also issued his speech on the same occasion at the same price. There are very few smarter women in this country than Dr. Severance, and her speech is worth reading. It is fiery, blistering to the bigots, and full of the spirit of liberty. When Mr. Stevens sends us a copy of his effort, we will giv him a little praise, too. Another Paine pamphlet is the "Oration and Speeches delivered in Covey Hall, Ogden, Utah, on January 29, 1888." The first address is by Leo Hæfili, the second by John A. Jost, the third by the Hon. Ogden Hiles, with some errata made necessary by a blunder of the printer. Mr. Hiles is a gentleman prominent in the politics of Utah, Mr. Jost a retired merchant, and Mr. Hæfili a working journalist. The combination is strong, and 25 cents sent to the latter will prove it by fetching a copy of the pamphlet to the sender.

Somebody inimical to Messrs. Allison & Leahy some time ago took away the press upon which they printed the American Idea, and the paper had to be temporarily suspended. The gentlemen named hav now obtained a new press, and print the Idea regularly, though considerably reduced in size. One of the first good uses to which the press is put is to say this: "THE TRUTH SEEKER.—The dear old paper founded by D. M. Bennett, now edited by Eugene Macdonald, New York, comes filled with the richest gems of thought, the brightest, wittiest sayings, and the mirth-provoking cartoons of the irrepressible Watson Heston. THE TRUTH SEEKER furnishes food for an intellectual feast to every thoughtful reader, and by its cheerfulness drives dull care away. Truth! Seek her." Mr. Leahy is president of the Freethought University at Liberal, Mo., and Mr. Allison used to be an occasional contributor to these columns. They print a good little paper, and would print a good big paper if their support were sufficient.

We hav before mentioned the beneficent scheme of Mr. Fitzgerald in sending to the press ready-made notices of additions to the Humboldt Library. The following is the latest to hand: "Among the writings of the late Professor Clifford, the essay on 'Cosmic Emotion' holds a foremost place. It is a study of 'the sum of things,' the universe as it affects the emotions of man, and in particular as it affects the mind and the imagination of the poet. Like every department of knowledge and every field of human endeavor, poesy has necessarily undergone the influence of the scientific spirit. Is the fire of poetic inspiration quenched in our time by the advance of science and the diffusion of knowledge? Or is the universe as science presents it an object that alone can call forth the highest and deepest emotion? The question is one that could not hav occurred in earlier times; it is strictly one of this nineteenth century. And no one so fitted to treat it as Professor Clifford." The price of the subject of this Socratic and non-committal notice is 10 cents, sold at this office.

Professor J. H Cook, well known to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, desires to see in print the subjoined concerning Mrs. Mary Tillotson's new book of Poems: "This book abounds in 'gems to sparkle on the forefinger of all time.' It is replete with truth and humanitarian love. It is brimful of pathetic and maternal philosophy in choice phrase and progressiv tone. It has yearnings and labors for widely improved customs that might yield general happiness and elevated lives, advancing and spiritual, free in every function. I was greatly moved by the poems Tears, Air Line, Sabrina, A Reminiscence, Banyan Tree, Twilight Hours, Progress, Dreams, Realizations, Contemplations, Crisis Culmination, and Era of Science. The brave author, little understood, largely opposed, but firm in the sense of right and duty, actualizes the lessons of experience she is so well able to teach; renders her life placid, joyous, and useful, consistently practicing what she preaches. Reader, send for the book; you will be richer, wiser, happier, and more highly humane. 320 pages, finely bound; merely $1. Address the author, Vineland, N. J."

Charles Watts has just published two new books. "The Teachings of Secularism Compared with Orthodox Christianity" contains eighteen chapters and 95 pages. The headings of the chapters are: Physical Teachings, Intellectual Teachings, Present Condition of Society, Morality, Ethics of Religion, Secularism and the Supernatural, Secularism at the Hour of Death, Secularism in Theory, Secularism in Practice, Secularism more Reasonable than Christianity, Secularism more Noble than Christianity, Secularism more Beneficial than Christianity, Secularism Progressiv; Secularism, its Triumphs; Secularism, its Service to Mankind; Secularism, its Struggles in the Past; Secularism in the Future; Secularism, Summing Up. The work is a very clear exposition of what we may call the doctrinal points of Secularism, and beside them orthodox Christianity shows up small. The price of the book is 25 cents in paper, and 50 cents in cloth. The other book is called "Bible Morality," and shows the Bible to be contradictory and defectiv as an ethical guide. The price of this work is 10 cents. Mr. Watts is one of the ablest writers in the Liberal ranks, and his pamphlets should be read, studied, and circulated. Orders for them may be sent to this office.

Edward Aveling did not leave New York in the most saintly odor of sanctity and disinterestedness with his Socialistic friends, but he has come back upon the country with a book describing his "American Journey" which will no doubt please them greatly. If there is one institution or custom in America which suits the fancy of the royal Mr. Aveling, he forgot to mention it in this book, which is a reprint from correspondence sent to English journals during his fifteen weeks' stay in America. The book is written in the spirit in which a loving father corrects his child, so admirable in itself and so beneficial to the growing sprout. All national faults are cataloged, kindly of course, by Mr. Aveling, and his chastening is moderate though firm. But as the Americans hav suffered from Englishmen in the same way before, we may be likened to the forethoughted youth who when he saw the parental frown went and put a shingle in the place where it would do its most perfect work. Mr. Aveling's book was to be expected from the moment he landed on the pier, notebook and pencil in hand, with a bundle of Socialistic lectures stowed away in his trunk. We are indeed sorry for his disappointment in the United States, for if he had liked them, we thought of buying the country and making him a present of it. Or if he had waited awhile, the faults might be corrected so the country would hav suited him. But it is too late now, and our development and progress are blighted by the adverse opinion of an esthetic gentleman in a collarless shirt and a red necktie about a yard wide. The price of Mr. Aveling's book is 30 cents; it is published by Lovell, and for sale at this office.

W. Stewart Ross, or Saladin, editor of the London Secular Review, sends us the first volume of his book on "Woman: Her Glory, Her Shame, and Her God." We hav previously noticed this work as it appeared in sixpenny parts, and always with commendation. The price of the cloth-covered volume is two shillings and ninepence, ordered in London, or a dollar at this office, with duty and freight paid. The book is valuable to show how preposterous is the claim that Christianity has elevated woman, and, being written in a dashing, almost furious spirit, is entertaining beyond most polemical writings. Some of the opinions of the early Christians concerning women, which Saladin has reminded us of in this volume, are unique if not absolutely accurate. Jesus, we know, thought little of his mother, and a man who will slur the woman who bore him is not likely to entertain profound reverence for other men's mothers and sisters. Paul's opinion of women was not high—in fact, it was too low to quote—and Peter thought that woman's mission was to obey her husband. Christ, and Peter, and Paul had worthy successors in the Christian saints. According to St. Bernard, "woman is the organ of the devil." According to St. Anthony she "is the fountain of the arm of the devil; her voice is the hissing of the serpent." St. Bonaventure said that "woman is a scorpion, ever ready to sting. She is the lance of the demon." St. Cyprian thought her to be "the instrument which the devil uses to gain possession of our souls." St. Jerome, whom Dr. Dix so closely resembles in mental attributes, called her "the gate of the devil, the road of iniquity, the sting of the scorpion," and St. John Damascene gave this estimate of his mother: "Woman is a daughter of falsehood, a sentinel of hell, the enemy of peace; through her Adam lost paradise." St. John Chrysostom agreed with Damascene, holding that "through woman the devil has triumphed, through her paradise has been lost; of all wild beasts the most dangerous is woman." St. Gregory the Great declared that "woman has the poison of an asp, the malice of a dragon." To these opinions Saladin, though not a saint, adds his own, and we like it better than the others. It is: "Woman is the nearest to an angel we are ever likely to see." He also adds—and in this most heretics will agree with him—"But in believing that the Bible and Christianity hav been her friends she is the nearest to a fool that it is possible for the mind of man to conceive."

George and Emma Shum, former publishers and editors of the Chicago Radical, hav become converts to the clean-printed, Calvinistic creed of philosophical Anarchism of which Benj. R. Tucker is the only prophet, and removed to Boston to edit a German edition of Liberty. The new journal will alternate in its fortnightly appearance with the English Liberty. The subscription price is $1 a year, and should be sent to B. R. Tucker, box 3,366, Boston, Mass., which town is where the Christians used to hang witches and whip Quakers a few decades since. Mr. and Mrs. Shum are able writers; Mr. Tucker is an able writer; so are they all; all able writers. But they are pursuing an impossible ideal of government—impracticable for more thousands of years than we care to think of—and aside from the interest of mental contortions and intellectual gymnastics displayed in confuting their confuters, we see no good to come of either the German or American edition of Liberty. Mr. Tucker is a sort of an Ishmaelite of a reformer, working with no one, and with the pens of almost all his fellow-economists against him. The Anarchy of the Bowery is a subject for police interference; but Boston Anarchy is only a dream. However, if one wants a clear-cut, straightforward champion of a governmental impossibility, he should send for Liberty, German or English, as he prefers. As a supplement to the first issue of the foreign edition is issued a photogravure plate containing portraits of "the heroes of the revolution of '71"—the Communists—with such cheerful mottoes in the corners as, "Go on, hyena, feed on our flesh and blood. It is your funeral feast."

Among the Editor's mail last week was a thin tract in a wrapper so red and fiery that we thought the Red Internationals had concluded to take a hand in the reconstruction of society by starting fires in the editorial waste-baskets of the country. But it proved to be only Henry Irving's Personage in Red—"Lucifer to the Archbishop of Canterbury." The argument is Theosophy versus Christianity, one of which it seems to us is as useless and incomprehensible as the other. The idea sought to be conveyed by Lucifer to the modern St. Dunstan who has taken him by the nose, is that Theosophy and Christianity are not enemies but allies. Lucifer says: "It is only through the study of Eastern religions and philosophies that Christians can ever arrive at an understanding of their own beliefs, or see the hidden meaning of the parables and allegories which the Nazarene told to the spiritual cripples of Judea, and by taking which either as matters of fact or as matters of fancy the churches hav brought the teachings themselvs into ridicule and contempt, and Christianity into serious danger of complete collapse, undermined as it is by historical criticism and mythological research, besides being broken by the sledge-hammer of modern science." We might remind Lucifer that when he and Christianity fall out there will be very little remaining of either of them, and the more he throws the glare of his torch upon the church the worse it will be for himself. But the commonsense world will say, Good riddance to all this rubbish. Lucifer is printed by George Redway, 15 York street, Covent Garden, London, England, and Madam Blavatsky, who has removed from India to England, is the presiding genius.

"How Shall the Surplus Labor of the Country Be Employed?" is the economic conundrum John H. Keyser puts to the public in No. 4 of his series of pamphlets on the limitation of wealth and land. His answer is, of course, to limit the wealth a man may possess and the amount of land he can hold. He says: "When the people come to learn how many local forms of limitation already obtain in the country, and their beneficent effect, they should naturally begin to look toward a universal limitation law to supersede the rotten, iniquitous, unrestrained power of acquiring wealth and lands. It is only because an evil system has become so time-honored that men fear to invade it, for they hav learned of no better way. But the hoary injustice of unlimited acquisition must be burnt out of the heart and conscience before suffering humanity can begin to advance in the scale of social and political progress, for human selfishness stands as a great wall to oppose all efforts at social or spiritual advancement in the world. Limitation in degree has been tried in many wholesome laws, and their effects hav proved so eminently beneficial that we point to them with pride and satisfaction as so many beating pulses to indicate what next the people should ask of their legislatures." Mr. Keyser is surely entitled to be heard on these subjects. No man is more earnest, self-sacrificing, and philanthropic than this genial stove-maker and feeder of the poor. He has spent thousands of dollars in this city relieving the distress of the destitute, and if all business men were like him his organization of a "Limitation Association" would be unnecessary. These pamphlets, and also blank petitions to urge legislators to consider this measure, can be obtained at 115 Beekman street, this city. The petitions are free; the pamphlets, 10 cents each.

The "Mayor's Messages to the Common Council," 1888, Documents 1, 2, and 3, is a good book for taxpayers to possess, peruse, and ponder over. Mr. Hewitt points out a good deal of municipal political rottenness, and suggests remedies which the legislature will not heed, because "striking" New York is the chief source of income of many bucolic statesmen. It is a queer fact that a representativ from St. Lawrence county has as much to say as to how New York shall be governed as a representativ from New York itself. And when New York wants to pave Fifth avenue it costs a good deal besides the price of paving-stones.

FAVORABLE OPINIONS OF MRS. SLENKER'S "LITTLE LESSONS."

MRS. NORA FERRALL: "After reading Aunt Elmina's most instructiv and fascinating stories in her last book to the children, I desire to call the attention of the mothers of THE TRUTH SEEKER family to its real merits. By all means send for one for the benefit of your little ones, and see for yourselvs the wealth of information on different subjects it contains for the dear children, 'and us children of older growth also.' Aunt Elmina works so diligently, and with such a high purpose, for children, she is deserving of our highest gratitude and patronage; to giv our children the fruits of her fertil pen is sure to work lasting good to the little ones. For once inspire a love for real knowledge in our little children, and the vices of Christian communities will only fill them with disgust and pity for the victims of such a system of morality as the Christian,' and not prove a snare to them. If mothers desire to see their children virtuous and happy, procure for them good reading, is my advice."

EVA M. WATT: "'Little Lessons' is a gem; and I only wish you had put more of those instructiv lessons between the covers of the book. If I had money to spare I would like to order a copy for each and every one of my little friends."

H. W. FOSS: "Our young folks are delighted with 'Little Lessons for Little Folks,' which grown children might read to advantage. It should, like all of Mrs. Slenker's books, be in the house of every family, Liberal or otherwise."

RICHARD D BRAY: "I cannot speak too highly of 'Little Lessons.' I read them in leisure moments. They are sensible books for the young."

MRS. SLENKER'S OPINION OF THE "LIFE AND LETTERS OF CHARLES DARWIN."

The more I read and study the wonderful "Life and Letters of Darwin," the more I feel impressed to urge it upon others to read these attractiv and interesting volumes.

I feel pretty sure that few will read them without also reading at least one of his books, "The Origin of Species," and if they hav read it, they will surely desire to reread it after seeing the process by which it was created, and how entirely new the idea of varieties being changed into species was, even to Darwin himself, and how long and through what infinit labor it was that he finally settled the whole question, not only to his own satisfaction, but to that of those whom he cared most about converting, or, as some humorously termed it, "perverting," to his theories and facts.

The "Origin of Species" was published in 1859, and of the book Darwin says: "It is no doubt the chief work of my life. It was from the first highly successful. The first small edition of 1,250 copies was sold on the day of publication." The study and work put into this volume, and the struggle the author had, not only with his own doubts and perplexities, but with the dissents of all outside thinkers, seems to us now, nearly thirty years afterward, to be almost inconceivable, so simple and self-convincing does it all appear that varieties must, in course of time, under favoring circumstances, become distinct and well-defined species. But when we look back a few years and think how comparativly few there were who disbelieved in special providences, in the power of prayer to suborn the will of God, and how more rarely still we found any who could dispense entirely with all Gods, Bibles, and futures, we realize how very hard it is to root out old ideas, and inoculate minds with new ones. But once the new gets a firm foothold, people are apt to say, as was said of this work of Darwin, "The success of the 'Origin' proved that the subject was in the air, and that men's minds were prepared for it."

We read a book that chimes in with our own opinions, and is full of evidences that our belief is the correct one, and we say, "There is enough in this volume to convert the world if they would only read it." But we forget how long it took us to get out of the old into the new, which has now become to us again as the old.

Darwin says: "I sounded not a few naturalists, and never happened to come across a single one who seemed to doubt the permanence of species." Only a mind thoroughly conscientious and in love with its work could hav pursued it year after year, handicapped by miserable health and the knowledge that the united criticism of the pious world would be poured out in vials of wrath upon his head.

Friends, I wish I could bear it in upon your minds how intensely interesting these volumes, picturing the home life, the mental life, and the laborious life of such a man as Darwin, are. How truly kind, charitable, and unselfish he was, and now simple and childlike were his friendships! No novel was ever half so charming as are these entrancing pages, which portray the daily life of one of our best as well as greatest men.

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

THE LORD'S WAY OF MARKING SLAVES.

Then his master shall bring him unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door-post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl; and he shall serve him forever.—Ex. xxi, 6.

Gems of Thought.

RELIGION does not, and cannot, contemplate man as free. She accepts only the homage of the prostrate, and scorns the offerings of those who stand erect. She cannot tolerate the liberty of thought. The wide and sunny fields belong not to her domain. The star-lit highs of genius and individuality are above and beyond her appreciation and power. Her subjects cringe at her feet, covered with the dust of obedience.—Ingersoll.

I UNDERSTAND by the passion of love the union of desire, friendship, and tenderness, which is inflamed by a single female, which prefers her to the rest of her sex and which seeks her possession as the supreme or the sole happiness of our being.—Gibbon.

HOW strange it appears that Christians, who are commanded to hope and believe all things favorable to others, should hav such an appetite for discovering unbelief and misbelief even in those who manifest no evil heart or godless temper! It would seem as if some men's faith could not be kept alive and properly exercised unless, like the passionate lord in the play, it were "allowed a carcass to insult on"—the vile body, to wit, of some other man's infidelity and irreligion.—Coleridge's Biographia Literaria.

KNOWING is seeing, and if it be so, it is madness to persuade ourselvs that we do so by another man's eyes, let him use never so many words to tell us that what he asserts is very visible. Until we ourselvs see it with our own eyes and perceive it by our own understandings, we are as much in the dark, and as void of knowledge, as before, let us believe any learned author as much as we will.—Locke's Conduct of the Understanding.

Odds and Ends.

OLD lady (in grocery store): "Be them dates fresh, boy? They don't look it." Boy: "Yes'm, they're of recent date."

BENEATH a ripe persimmon-tree
Two learned lawyers chanced to be.
"Climb," said the first; "I'll catch—you toss 'em."
But t'other shook his head: "Non Possum!"

"YOU hav a very sour look this morning," remarked a cucumber to his neighbor, a dyspeptic strawberry. "Yes," was the tart reply; "one is necessarily unpleasantly affected when compelled to associate with such a seedy party as you are."

"JOHN," said the minister to the sexton: "that pulpit-cushion is worn out. I wish you would see that a new cover is put on it." "Yes, sir," said John, grimly; "I know it's wore out, an' it's the third since last fall. It ain't my place to make remarks, sir, but in my opinion there's such a thing as carryin' religion a leetle too far."

"WHAT a glorious season of the year the gladsome springtime is, Mr. Frankfurt!" said Miss Overtheline, of Cincinnati, as the twain seated themselvs in a Vine street restaurant. "The pure, invigorating air, the singing of birds, the fragrance of flowers, and [to waiter] bock beer, all tell us so eloquently that spring indeed is here!"

MR. MOULD (in bookstore): "I want you to get me up an appropriate motto to hang in my undertaking establishment." Dealer: "How would 'Honesty is the best policy' do?" Mr. Mould: "That's too much of a chestnut." Dealer (contemplativly): "H'm, how does 'Is life worth living?' strike you?" Mr. Mould: "Good, that's just the thing!"

"NAW," said the small boy; "I don't go to Sunday-school. I went there one day, and that was all I wanted. I tipped the whole bench over, an' when the teacher ast me what I did it for I said 'Rats!' An' he didn't lick me, nor nothin'—didn't so much as swat me alongside of the face. What sort of a school do you call that to go to? Mebbe you think I'm a girl?"

OLD Mrs. Bentley: "Hav you heard how Mrs. Brown is gettin' on?" Old Mr. Bentley: 'She was doin' very well, and although one lung is gone, the doctor said he thought she might liv for some time; but las' week she ketched cold, which developed into pneumonia." Old Mrs. Bentley (with pensiv hopefulness): "Ah, well, if she's only got one lung she can't hav it very bad."

THE Rev. Alban Cope (who has been preaching on the evils of speculation): "What did you think of the sermon this morning, Mr. Stone?" Mr. Kirby Stone (on the "Street"): "Well, since you ask me, parson, I didn't think it was very much of a sermon." The Rev. Alban Cope: "Really? To tell the truth, neither did I But, then, there's no need of our setting up our opinion against that of the entire congregation."

"JOHN," she said sweetly as she glanced at the clock, "do you know anything about baseball?" "Well, I rather guess I do," he answered with pride. "There is a short stop in every nine, isn't there?" "Certainly." "Is there a long stop, too?" "No." "It is a pity." "Why so?" "Because," and she glanced at the clock again, "if there was a long stop you would make money. Every club would be bidding for you."

A TRAMP recently had a plate of hard ice cream given him by a good-natured lady upon whom he called for assistance. He handed back the spoon, with an apology. "Oh, I don't suspect you of wanting to steal the spoon," said the lady "I don't for a moment suppose you do, my dear madam," replied the tramp; "but it is not correct form to eat hard desserts with a spoon; I am from Boston, and should prefer a fork."

FATHER: "Never lie, my son; always tell the truth. Who's that ringing—a dun? Tell him I am not in!" Son: "Wouldn't that be a lie, papa?" Father: "Oh, no, my son, it's a Financial Necessity." Father (next day): "You scamp, if you ate that cake I will whip you! Did you eat it?" Son: "No, sir." Father: 'See here, I saw you, myself. What do you mean telling me that lie?' Son: "Tain't a lie; it's Protectiv Diplomacy!"

NOTED electrician: "I see that you still hav that old notion that a lightning rod is a protection." Nebraska farmer: "I hav." "Well, of course you don't keep up with the electrical progress of the age and can't be expected——" "I take half a dozen newspapers and three magazines, including the Electrical Review, sir." "You do? Well, well! Now, sir, if that is the case, will you be kind enough to tell me what you think a lightning rod on your house protects you from?" "Lightning rod agents."

IN the spring the young man's spinal column seems to fade and wilt;
In the spring the merry school-boy infests the street with top and stilt;
In the spring the lacteal fluid smacketh somewhat of the leek;
In the spring unhappy tenants other homesteads
sadly seek;
In the spring the tailor-maiden sports a $90 hat;
In the spring a civelier Irish gathers 'bout the baseball bat;
In the spring impatient mortals lay aside their flannels thick,
And the ones that reach not heaven reach the realms of aged Nick.

"MISS CLARA," he said, hesitatingly, "I want to speak with you upon a subject of great importance to me, and one which has been upon my mind for some time." The girl had told her mother that she thought this was surely the night, and in a low, shy tone she bade him proceed. "I am thinking," he said, "of furnishing bachelor apartments in the Palmer block, and I wish you would tell me the best place to buy carpets." The low, shy tone of voice gave way to one with a harsh business ring in it, as Miss Clara straightened herself up and said: "Certainly, Mr. Sampson, with pleasure. With ready cash, Messrs Veneer, Hardwood and Co. certainly offer the choicest bargains, but as you, of course, will want to buy on the instalment plan, paying, say, two dollars and a half a month, I would suggest that you look over the stock of Messrs. Threeply, Varnish and Co."

PRIESTLY HYPOCRISY PHOTOGRAPHED BY A PRIEST.

I MEAN to say this—that there is many a thing said in many a sermon that, shut the preacher into a room with an intelligent parishioner eye to eye, he daren't stick to . . you know and I know what fudge it is!—Dean Alford.

HAV you not heard how it has gone with many a cause before now? First, few men heed it; next, most men condemn it: lastly, all men accept it—and the cause is won!—William Morris.

VICE is a monster of so frightful mien

Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.
—Pope.

TO my mind it is simply absurd for any man to answer with the slightest confidence the challenge of the hasty inquirer, What is to be the religion of the future? I hav not the slightest idea. I am perfectly certain of my own ignorance, and I hav a strong impression that almost everyone else is equally ignorant I can see, as everyone else can see, that a vast social and intellectual transformation is taking place—and taking place, probably, with more rapidity now than at almost any historical period. I can dimly guess at some of the main characteristics of the process. I can discover some conditions, both of the social and the speculativ kind, which will probably influence the result. I cannot doubt that some ancient doctrins hav lost their vitality. . . . Doubtless all the elements which the old belief contains will be somehow represented in the new crystallization of opinion; but I envy, or rather I do not envy, the confidence of any man who takes upon himself to define its precise character.—Leslie Stephen.

NATURE has not formed us to sport and merriment, but rather to seriousness and to studies that are important and sublime. Sport and merriment are not always to be disallowed; but we are to use them as we use sleep and other kinds of repose, when we hav dispatched our weighty and serious affairs. Nay, our very manner of joking should be neither wanton nor indecent, but ingenuous and noble as well as good-humored. For as we indulge boys not in an unlimited license of sport, but only in that which is not inconsistent with virtuous conduct, so, in our very jokes, there should appear some gleam of a virtuous nature.—Cicero

IT is an absurd thing, that those who receive advice, do not feel that annoyance which they ought to feel, but feel that from which they ought to be free; for they are not distressed because they hav done wrong; but take it amiss that they are rebuked; whereas, on the contrary, they ought to be sorry for their misconduct and to be glad at its correction.—Cicero.

HE that hath knowledge spareth his words; and a man of understanding is of an excellent spirit. Even a fool, when he holdeth his peace, is counted wise; and he that shutteth his lips is esteemed a man of understanding.—Proverbs.

OUR dispositions will be suitable to that which we most frequently think on; for the soul is, as it were, tinged with the color and complexion of its own thoughts.—Marcus Aurelius.

THE papal jubilee turns out to hav been very expensiv. It cost the Vatican about $1,000,000. But it was profitable, the receipts running up to about $20,000,000.

THE lumber export from Ottawa, Canada, to the United States during January, February, and March was valued at $306,902, an increase of 21 per cent over the same months of 1887.

IMMEDIATELY after Emperor Frederick left San Remo the sultan sent him a collar, consisting of nine hazel nuts, with inscriptions from the Koran, over which the dervishes and sheiks of the palace had prayed, and which, the sultan assured the crown prince, would cure him as if by magic.

FROM the Albany Journal: "Dressed in the latest mode, Lillie Devereux Blake presented her ever-youthful subject: 'Is it a Crime to be a Woman?' In the course of her address she said: 'Every student in ornithology knows that the American eagle, the national bird, is a hen, the male being inferior in size and looks.'"

SCIENCE has done wonders for meteorology. For instance, it has paraphrased the old saying, "Hills clear, rain near," into, "The presence of a wedge-shaped area of high pressure, accompanied by great atmospheric visibility, is likely to be succeeded by the advance of a disturbance with pluvial accompaniments and southerly winds."

THE Austrian legislature is desirous of diminishing opportunities for drinking, and will hereafter allow only one liquor shop to a commune of less than five hundred people. Anyone who has been convicted of drunkenness three times in one year is to be debarred from entering a public-house, and any publican serving him will be subject to penalties.

QUANTITIES of bears' bones and seven very well preserved skulls were recently discovered in a cave at Rubeland, in the Hartz. A set of stag antlers, fragments of skeletons of hyenas, and some slender bones, which are assigned to the ptarmigan and the lemming, were also discovered. The cave is to be lighted by electricity for the benefit of scientific visitors.

IT is proposed to preserve fish alive by placing them in vessels partly filled with water and hermetically sealed. It is said that fish so confined hav been found alive after three weeks, without either air or water having been changed, while fish in an open jar died in forty-eight hours. If the air in the vessel is compressed, the life of the fish is still further prolonged.

THE building going up on the site of the ruins of the late fireworks fire in Broadway presents a novelty in the shape of lintels of copper. All this work was to hav been done in terra cotta, but the contractor failed in his work, and to save time this experiment was tried. It delights the architect and builder, and all who hav seen it. Dissolved copper treated electrically is deposited on plaster casts, and produces work that is better than that made by casting the molten metal in molds, because it requires no trimming or finishing with edged tools.

"ADVICES from Salt Lake City report that the Mormon brethren are getting ready and anxious to giv up the practice of polygamy. When such good news comes from Utah, even the most pessimistic pessimist has cause to hope that Mormonism may be some time rooted out, even from old Puritan communities like Massachusetts." Now the Congregational brethren may get mad at the Sun, which says this.

ONE of our correspondents attended a large union meeting a few Sundays ago in which a somewhat flowery young preacher prayed as follows: "O Lord! we ask that thou wilt bless the Y. M. C. A." This is equal to the colored man's ascription of thanks to the deity for what he had done for the world, "both B.C. and A.D." Such performances strengthen the hands of those who oppose all extempore prayer.—Christian Advocate.

WE get this important information by way of the San Francisco Freethought: "The Young Men's Christian Association of Princeton recently secured the services of Anthony Comstock as a lecturer on moral purity. Out of respect for Mr. Comstock's modesty the students draped the statue of the Gladiator on the campus with a pair of red flannel undergarments. At last accounts the faculty were debating the question how to remove the ornaments without attracting undesired public attention."

SOME one has been collecting facts about the fathers of United States presidents, with this result: "Grover Cleveland is the only clergyman's son who has ever been elected president, though Arthur's father was a clergyman. He was not, however, elected president. The fathers of the Virginia presidents —Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe—were planters. John Tyler's father was a lawyer and a statesman, and John Adams, the father of John Quincy Adams, was by profession a lawyer. Grant's father was a tanner, Hayes's father a merchant, and the fathers of Garfield, Lincoln, Pierce, Fillmore, Polk, Van Buren, and Jackson were farmers."

HOOK-SWINGING and widow-burning in India hav been abolished, but it is said that in the Nizam's dominions there is a caste in which, when any of the members dies, a flag is attached to a bamboo, and the bamboo given to a man to hold over the corpse of the deceased. Then, having retired to a convenient distance, the men of the caste open fire on the flag, probably by way of showing distress, and of helping the soul of the deceased on its journey to the other world. It sometimes happens that the man holding the flag is shot, and an order has been issued by the government prohibiting firing at the flag in future.

STEAMERS landing at Cabinda, a little port north of the Congo, are often met by a young white man who appears to be in the egg and poultry business. He has spring chickens all the year round, and, as they are plump and tender, he gets a good price for them. This young man is one of Bishop Taylor's missionaries, and when he appears at the landing with his chicken coops he is carrying out the "self-supporting" feature of the bishop's enterprise. He supports himself nicely, but finds that it would take a good deal of capital to start a school at present, as none of the nativs, in their present state of mind, can be induced to send their children to school, unless they are paid for it.

Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

Whoever reads the "Companion to the Revised New Testament" carefully to get at the discoveries the revisers made in their ten years of search into the origin and authenticity of that book, in tracing its history with such aids as were within their reach in the way of legends, traditions, and fragments of testimony gathered from a number of the early fathers of the church, cannot fail to see how uncertain are much of the teachings contained in that so-called holy record.

This admission and open confession is either avowed, or referred to, or apologized for on almost every page of the "Companion," prepared by the authority of the revisers to explain to scholars and critics the reasons for the many changes made in the revision. For instance, the revisers say that the title of Lord should never have been put in the English New Testament, as it, or any Greek word corresponding to it, could not be found in the early manuscripts, as a title given to the Galilean teacher; and on page 83 of the "Companion" they tell us what word should have been used: "Rabbi being a well-known title of respect, it should have been preserved throughout the translation," instead of the word Lord, which is found improperly used in the "authorized version."

So they acknowledge that the Lord, the first word in this long and reverential title, is a mistake, an error which should be abandoned. Is it, in reality, anything less than a forgery, in the use that is made of it by the translators, to deceive and mislead the people into an unauthorized belief in the supernatural, to enslave the mind to superstition?

If the title rabbi had been adhered to in our English text, instead of having in our system of religion a divinity, a third person in a triune godhead, we would have had only a Jewish priest called a rabbi, or teacher, a plain human being, and we would have been deprived of exercising our faith and our devotion on a son of God.

What a serious damage the truth, honestly told, would have been on the superhuman character of our religion!

There would not have been enough of mystery and miracle in it to hold together. Without this design in a purposely false translation, there would have been no material to construct a creed or a theology for the people to believe and enjoy.

The blood of a Jewish rabbi would hardly have had enough virtue in it to atone for the sins of the world by satisfying the other portions of the godhead.

The revisers tell us that the Hebrew name of the Jewish rabbi was joshua; in the Greek it is Jesus.

Joshua was in those days simply a word with a definition. In the Old Testament we read there were a number of joshuas. They were called joshua because they exerted themselves in instructing and thereby trying to save their ignorant people.

The Galilean prophet, or rabbi, was one who received the name of joshua because he was engaged in teaching, and it represented his occupation. These Jewish joshuas, or saviors, were teachers of secular lessons, to save men from ignorance and misery in this world, and if we may believe the revisers, the lessons of the teacher of Galilee were intended to be of this secular kind. The bad translation is what has made him seem to teach otherwise.

So that, according to the Jewish idea of a savior, it does not necessarily require much of a man to be a joshua or savior. A simple Jewish rabbi, an illiterate carpenter, can be a savior. It was in this humble, human, common-sense light that the disciples of this joshua and their successors the Ebionites in Judea for three centuries accepted, taught, and practiced these lessons of their rabbi.

Neither would they listen or give countenance to any of the stories the Greeks manufactured and taught about his miraculous birth and death.

Because these Ebionites would not accept as genuine and historic these speculations of the Greeks about a man they never saw and knew nothing of, these same Greek gospel-writers denounced them as heretics and Gnostics. So to make a deity or divinity out of a man, a teacher of ethics, is another fraud of translators to help them to establish the divine trinity.

See Eusebius, "Ecclesiastical History," Chapter XXVII, "Ebionites," and the testimony of Justin Martyr, and Epiphanius of the second and third centuries; also Gibbon, "History of Christianity," Chapter XIII.

The word Christ, originally, had nothing to do nor any connection with the word or name joshua. The former is a Greek and the latter a Hebrew word. If we can depend on Bible chronology, it was not till about twenty-five years after the death of Joshua that the Greeks, at Antioch, used the term Christos in connection with his name or teachings.

Acts xi, 26: "The disciples were first called Christians at Antioch."

These Greeks pronounced his name, for short, Jesu, and in after ages they added Christi to this name, a word which Paul distinctly defines to represent the teachings and not the man—1 Cor. i, 24, "Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God," or the power of wisdom and goodness, as we speak in our more modern English.

It was through the writings of Paul, or the epistles attributed to him, that this formula of a title originated. It was in his effort to convey to the Greek mind the distinction between the man Joshua and the principles, the teachings, and the moral influence of his example.

The Greek belief in the gods doing everything—even of their secret visits to human beings—and the impressions they made on the mind and feelings, in prompting and instigating their conduct, whether for good or evil, was so universal among the ignorant that it was in his endeavors to destroy this belief and to introduce a theory that these impulses and impressions were spontaneous and originated not with the gods, but with the inherent activities of the brain, and of the nervous system, acting through the organism, that these misunderstandings arose.

The Greeks found it almost impossible to divest their minds of the idea that one of their gods, or a god, was the author and teacher of the new faith taught them by Paul.

Whoever reads carefully these epistles of Paul cannot fail to see what a difficulty he had in teaching them this new mental philosophy—that it was not from any god outside of man, but it was from convictions, or the conscience within him, his life and actions should be guided.

Although he had urged this among them orally in his missionary work, as an "apostle to the gentiles," he was not able to exterminate from their minds the influence of their old mythology. Some received and gave heed to his testimony, but others did not.

This difference caused controversy among them, which he aimed to settle in the epistles he sent to the churches.

The Greek words standing for Joshua, the wise Galilean teacher, were Jesus, the christos, and in English we have it printed, Jesus Christ. So the text makes Paul say in one of these epistles, 2 Cor. xiii: "Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you except ye be reprobates?" "Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me." Gal. iv, 19: "Till Christ be formed in you." Eph. iii, 17: "That Christ may dwell in your hearts." Col. i, 27: "Christ in you hope of glory." These and many more passages in these epistles refer to Christ as wisdom or goodness, which are synonyms in this Hebrew, in this rational, impersonal sense. I think there is strong evidence in these epistles that Paul was a philosopher, and never used much of the language the copyists and translators have put in the text of his writings.

Giving this Christ of Paul sex and personality, that we find so much of in our English New Testament, is evidently not Paul's work, but the work of illiterate mythologists, who copied and translated these writings; who did it through the bias of their own prepossessions, and in the interest of their own or the popular religion.

The revisers of the New Testament tell us that the improper use of the articles, the pronouns, and prepositions in translation has in almost innumerable instances so changed the text that it is impossible to tell what was meant by the writers, and it can only be settled by guess, or by leaving it to the decisions of public sentiments, which generally favor an idolatrous and superstious interpretation, agreeing with the darker age of ignorance in which these translations were made.

In preaching this gospel, or the ethics of Joshua, Paul would often use his name in connection with his lessons. Of course, he could do so properly and intelligently, but the translators have, evidently, disregarded the distinction between the teacher and the teachings, and they have indiscriminately and interchangeably mixed them into interminable confusion, so that the text must unavoidably confound the ordinary reader, who is not apprised of the causes of the difficulty, as so fully admitted and set forth by the revisers in this "Companion." It is enough to disgust and to tempt the honest inquirer to cast aside the whole record as a fraud or fable.

It is amusing to see how some doughty Infidels, and pious Christians also, dispose of these spurious and ambiguous, if not incomprehensible and contradictory, passages, which the translators have bequeathed us.

Joshua, Christos, the first a Hebrew and the second a Greek word, each had a distinct and specific meaning in the respective languages, and may be given, the first as saving, the last as wisdom. So that our Jesus Christ in the Greek—or we may call it English now from long usage—when defined by equivalents in better understood woods, is saving wisdom. The Bible writers themselves give us these definitions. The writers of the gospels give us the meaning of Joshua, Paul gives us that of Christ; and the revisers confirm their testimony. What right have we to give these words another definition for the purpose of propping up our inherited, cherished mythology? To say the least, it is a presumptuous outrage and indignity toward our more enlightened and sensible ancestors.

Now, Paul was the author of the first literature containing the word Christ; he is the very best authority for knowing and defining it. The ignorant pagan Greeks must have believed in it in a mythical sense, or Paul would not, with such an emphatic interrogatory, have taught them the contrary. He wanted them to believe in a "Lord and savior Jesus Christ" within them; and within everyone who is not a reprobate, a person sunk so low in depravity as to have lost all self-respect.

The Jesus Christ of Paul was the moral sense in man, and in all men, as a birthright inheritance. This was to be their savior. He knew if it did not save sinners, no fabricated idol, no belief in a dead or living man, to whom they had given the name, would be of any service to them. But the idolators then did not believe in Paul, neither do they now.

The word joshua existed and had saved people for centuries before the Galilean had ever heard of or had received it as his name.

It saved people no better or in no other way after he was born than it did before. The fact of its being given to him for a name did not in any way change its efficacy. For wise people are always the best saved and fools are the worst, or the least, saved, and always will be.

The word Christos, meaning wisdom, was always a desirable acquisition. The Greek philosophers had great faith in its benefit to the possessor, as an elevating and refining virtue. Solomon, the wisest old Hebrew, could not exaggerate its excellence, long before it was bestowed upon the prophet Joshua by the Greeks. The fact that it was given to him as a title never affected its original quality.

That Christ, or that power and wisdom, is in man and of man that is to save him from the thraldom of ignorance and superstition. It was the power and wisdom of that high order, which was supposed to control all goodness, in the works of nature and in man, as established by deity.

It was not, as the Greeks afterward made it, or tried to make it, a personified divinity, to be placed among their gods, and as the writers or translators in many places in the New Testament have made it. The late revisers acknowledge this, and say the word Christ is used so as to improperly represent the original meaning. It was a title given by the Greeks, and should never be used without the article the before it, meaning the wise, or the wisdom of Jesus. See "Companion," page 53.

It is the misunderstanding of these terms, this title, out of which a theoretical divinity has been formed, an atoning redeemer and intercessor constructed, that constitutes the great chasm, the irreconcilable and irrepressible conflict, between the church and Infidelity, or between the deluded, infatuated believer and the untrammeled Freethinker. The only way to bridge this chasm is to give the believers a clear view of the history of their religion, the origin of those strange pagan ideas which they so cherish, showing them to be all a human device with which superstition can control the ignorant and credulous, and mislead the confiding into all sorts of folly, cruelty, and crime, in the name of their God, their savior, and their duty. What a bloody, savage record these views have left in their track through nearly twenty centuries! How they are enslaving and degrading us now!

Thus we see that when we come to dissect and analyze this long and divinely imposing title, it is dissipated into a fabrication. We must relegate it to where it belongs, to Greek mythology and to the coddling and nursing process by which it has been fostered and sustained by both Roman and Protestant clergy. There is nothing in it, and there never was anything but a string of words hitched together having an awful sound and supernatural significance—words in themselves, until captured and devoted to the Gods the imagination invented, innocent of these abuses—words that have been ravished by robbers from the human vocabulary and deified into names and titles of the immortals, to fascinate, captivate, to enchant and enslave the minds of mortals, to deliver men into the hands and custody of the Gods.

It is robbing their vocabulary of words expressing simple, honest thought and converting them into props to bolster up our pagan idolatry. There is a meanness, a dishonesty, and religious mendacity in it that every honest man should eschew and despise. If a religion is so barren of any real merit that it needs a resort to such petty theft and duplicity, such ignoble measures, to maintain itself, every one of its devotees and advocates should know it. To the investigator and student the above facts are patent and palpable. But it has always been the policy of the priesthood to withhold them from the public.

Faith does not require they should be known. If they were, religion would suffer and its superstructure be overthrown. The priestly honors and calling would fall into decay.

All intelligent Infidels, Deists, or Atheists most sincerely and honestly believe in the "Lord and savior Jesus Christ" of Paul. If they repudiate the ancient, ambiguous style of expressing it, they nevertheless cordially accept the fact, and depend on it exclusively as the means of salvation. It is in living up to the spirit and truth of a principle, and not in attaching sacred merits to the words, or the images the words may suggest, that is imparted the saving power; so that the Infidel is really the true disciple, and the self-righteous believer is the hypocrite, the dissembler.

The Infidels will not accept verbiage, however holy, that they cannot understand; and here again they unite with Paul—"Prove all things and hold fast to that which is good"—and let go of all that cannot be proved, for it is not good to be believed or retained.

The Infidels, therefore, are the true Christians—they believe in the saving wisdom, and the salvation that it, or the "Lord and savior Jesus Christ" within them, in their own brain, their intellectual powers, and moral sense, will secure to all who possess them.

The believers, or church men, are infidel to this inward Jesus Christ, and trust in an outward, personal Jesus Christ of their own making; so they are the spurious, counterfeit believers, or the real infidels to the true and saving faith, as taught by the great apostle whom they profess and pretend to follow, but whom in reality they discredit and reject. This holy scripture—this compound of ancient truth and superstition—this medley of history and romance, of ethics and mythology, taken with all its errors, mistakes, and perversions—taken and believed in literally by priest and people, has led to all this tergiversation, this confusion and falsification of faith.

Modern Christianity as a faith, a belief, or system of doctrines, is not the religion of the early Christians. It did not originate in Judea nor with the earlier disciples among the gentiles. They knew nothing of it. It was evolved out of Greek and African paganism, centuries later.

It is a forgery, a spurious, concocted theory, that was forced on the world against a strong resistance, by the power of the sword, by a fierce and savage fanaticism.

The spirit of the faith to-day is despotic, arbitrary, intolerant, and uncharitable—anti-Christian toward the original faith; while the spirit, the principles, the belief, and practices of Liberals or Freethinkers are such as to place them properly in substantial harmony and accord with the early Christians.

Having the qualities, virtues, and habits, they are the only class justly entitled to the name; so they are in reality the genuine, practical Christians.

Let no one hastily conclude that the views here presented are a fancy sketch of a dreamer, or an effort to support the theory of an eccentric or religious crank.

Every intelligent clergyman or reader of ancient religious literature, unbiased by prejudice, knows they are a substantial outline of the facts recorded and testimony given by the early Christian writers bearing on this subject. No honest student of history can fail to see it. Modern scholarship is unveiling the facts that have for centuries been kept in the background by a conspiracy of silence among theologians. Modern Christianity is rapidly being unmasked and its fraudulent origin exposed. True Christianity was slaughtered by creed-makers in its infancy, its vestments captured; and its name has been flaunted and desecrated by its gentile descendants and brought to infamy and contempt in the eyes of honest and good men. So that Christianity now is but the synonym of fraud and superstition.

Can we as Liberals laboring to enlighten the people and to release them from their spiritual bondage do better than to unfold to the view the mysteries and the sources of their religion? If the multitudes only knew that the truth only can make them free from the bonds and shackles imposed upon them by a blind superstition, that the truth alone can represent our highest conception of the most exalted type of human beings, or even of the Gods, they certainly would not longer cling to their idols, their fables, and their stupid theologies, spending hundreds of millions wrenched from honest toil to perpetuate them and to secure their own and their children's degradation.

Accept this as a contribution to your Christian readers for the purpose of dispelling these sacred ancient illusions. T. E. LONGSHORE.

The Czar and the Protestants.

A Russian in the Independent.

In the Church News (Tzerkovnya Vedomosti), issued by the holy synod of Russia, the petition of the Evangelical Union to the czar and Russia's reply thereto are published. The reply was written by the chief procureur of the synod.

It will be remembered that the present autocrat of Russia ordered the enforcement in the Baltic provinces of an obsolete religious law, thus inaugurating such a religious persecution as was characteristic of the Dark Ages. The Russian law "once orthodox, forever orthodox, and with all the descendants," has lately brought untold misery to thousands of Lutheran families in the Baltic provinces; and the Evangelical Union found it necessary to intercede in behalf of the Protestant subjects of Russia, reminding the czar that his father, the Liberator, had suspended the law so far as the Protestants of the Baltic provinces are concerned.

The czar could make one of two replies, either that his father was wrong, or that he is wrong himself. As he would not admit either, he charged Mr. Pobedonostzeff, the procureur of the synod, to giv the best answer he could. The procureur has written a letter nearly three times as long as the petition of the Union, and yet he has evaded a direct reply to the question squarely raised by the representativs of the Union. In fact, the old professor has delivered a lecture which in plain English would be headed thus: "For the glory of the orthodox church and the shame of the Catholic and Protestant churches." The procureur starts out with the assertion that the religious interests of the Lutherans are as dear to the czar as those of any other subjects, and that the measures now pursued in the Baltic provinces aim at the restoration of order and peace, which hav been violated there for centuries by the Protestants. The German landowners, he charges, supported by the Lutheran pastors, hav always controled the provinces and hindered the nativs from assimilating with the orthodox people of Russia. This cannot longer be tolerated, for certain historical reasons.

Then the procureur plunges into history. He says that God has imposed on Russia a special historical task—to guard the Christian civilization of western Europe against the semi-barbarian Asiatics. This task Russia has faithfully fulfilled; and she is strong enough to do so chiefly because she has been all orthodox, and has known no religious struggles. Not so has it been in Europe generally. In Europe, religion has ever been mixed up with politics, bringing about religious wars—the bloody "nights" and "evenings." The same spirit has been brought to the western border of Russia. In Poland, Romanism, joining hands with Polonism, led a series of revolutions against the Russian state and church. In the Baltic provinces, too, religion and politics hav had similar aims.

"Helas!" exclaims the procureur. "The Lutheran knights of Livonia hav been pursuing the same political ends as the Catholic nobles in Poland. The Protestant barons and pastors hav directed their energy to the possession of the civil power in the provinces, and to the persecution of everything Russian, religion included. And to this very day the descendants of the old barons, under the disguise of religious zeal, strive to keep the nativs in a state of servitude, and violate freedom of conscience. If Protestant Europe would disregard the false complaints of the Lutherans of the Baltic provinces, and would impartially investigate what, in fact, is going on in the towns and villages of those provinces, then they would realize that the orthodox people do not assail, but defend themselvs from, the Lutherans."

Further on, Mr. Pobedonostzeff affirms that "in no other country of Europe do 'foreign' Christians, and even non-Christians, enjoy such liberty as in Russia," thus intimating that the representativs of the Evangelical Union are laboring under a misunderstanding. In conclusion, the procureur insists that the Union shall follow the advice of Ernest Naville, bring about a union of all Christians and fight against Infidels and Materialists.

The Evangelical Union ought to learn from this reply at least one thing, that religious affairs in Russia are ruled not by the czar, but by his representativ in the holy synod, Mr. Pobedonostzeff. In his reply this gentleman does not hesitate to state that eighty millions of orthodox are hard at work defending themselvs against two millions of Lutherans. He boldly affirms that Russia has no religious struggles. But how does it happen that to-day in Russia there are over fifteen million souls deprived of all civil rights, solely because they disregard the mandates of the holy synod in matters of conscience? Are there not even special prisons provided for those who dare to leave the orthodox faith? And among those annually exiled to Siberia and the Caucasus are there not hundreds of "heretics?" All these facts, together with the persecution of the Lutherans, plainly prove that regarding religious freedom Russia has yet everything to learn.

Spiritology.

The teachings of spirit phenomena, and the belief of those who witness them, are quite distinct things. The phenomena in every phase prove all religions false, notwithstanding the communicating spirits may be exceedingly pious, having carried their piety with them to spirit life.

From the time that spirit phenomena were first presented to the public to within a few years of the present time, the communicating spirits were mostly Antichristians, Christian spirits only using mediums to destroy their usefulness by telling for truth all manner of lies, instructing people to do many foolish and, sometimes, wicked things, declaring these manifestations to be witchcraft and the works of the devil, all to frighten the religious and superstitious from further investigation of this new, but powerful, enemy of ignorance and religion; but the Christian spirits, failing to destroy spirit communication by the above godly conduct, hav changed their policy, and are now attempting to capture and use spirit phenomena to prove Christianity true. Christian spirits get control of every medium they can and either rule or ruin them—which has been the policy of Christianity throughout all its existence, rule or ruin, expressed very emphatically in "believe or be damned."

Spirit life is a fact, proved by spirit manifestations of a great variety, and denying or ignoring this fact does not prove it untrue.

How much security is there in ignorance? Pious bigotry thinks ignorance is humanity's greatest blessing, and Liberals who write and talk wisely against spirit phenomena, of which they know nothing, are aiding the perpetuation of superstition, and are attempting to deliver this positiv proof of the falsity of all religions into the keeping of the pious savages called Christians, and permit them to whitewash Christianity, which is a complete system of fraud and crime, with spirit phenomena, which, in the hands of honest and intelligent men and women, afford many of the most overwhelming arguments against the assumptions of Christianity and all other religions.

Spirit phenomena has been and is, very improperly, called Spiritualism and Spiritism, as defined by Webster, "a belief," etc., and, as far as I know, the Christian and religious Spiritualists all follow Webster and "believe." I do not; I am not one of the believers. I know spirit life is, as well as I know this is. I am a knower, and for the knowledge that spirit phenomena hav brought to me I use the proper scientific term, Spiritology—the science of life, both earth and spirit life. I am a Spiritologist, a student of Spiritology.

To get where I am to-day, I hav traveled the road of progress, beginning with the Methodist, then the Baptist, Campbellite, Dunkard churches, Materialism, Christian Spiritualism, Spiritualism without an adjectiv, Spiritism, and now Spiritology. You may ask, What next? I do not know. I shall go where facts and knowledge lead, and go without fear of ridicule or danger.

My travel to Materialism was attended with much mental distress, for I floundered in the darkness of "belief." I sought truth and knowledge in the Christian's holy Bible, where only fraud and superstition exist. I remained a Materialist for about ten years, when I investigated spirit phenomena, with the intention of knowing them to be a fact or a fraud before I would relinquish my purpose. My unbelief was as absolute, as positiv, as any man's could be. I did not believe in spirit life—and do not now, but by the evidence of facts I know it is true.

My friend Reynolds is halting at Materialism, and there he may remain until he passes to spirit life; but, having read this article, when he has got out of his old carcass and looks around himself, he will say, "Well; I believe that fool Willis did know something."

Mr. Reynolds, and many Materialists, ignore and condemn the very knowledge that will do more than anything else yet learned by man to prevent insanity, suicide, and crime. We hav these facts, and is it wisdom to refuse to investigate their cause? You may prevent the perverted use of a power by understanding its mode of operation. The trap of insanity, suicide, or crime may spring upon you by an ignorant touch of the fatal trigger, which, by a little knowledge of spirit life and spirit control, you might safely avoid.

Mr. Reynolds puts great stress on the "gibberings of insanity," apparently forgetting that the talk of a pious fool, while in earth life, is of no value to useful knowledge, and the value of his talk is not increased when he has passed to spirit life. But the fact that he can talk back across the Materialist's and Christian's deadline is of great value to science, and the most deadly blow that ever struck religion, destroying that ignorance which is the foundation of all religions. But Mr. Reynolds refuses to use or even to acknowledge the existence of this weapon of knowledge. He seems to hav formed an idea that there is something Christian, pious, and mysterious about it. His ideas here are all wrong; there is no more kinship between spirit phenomena and Christianity than between truth and falsehood, or light and darkness. The so-called miracles, if they ever occurred, are stolen thunder, stolen from the mediums they murdered for witchcraft; and, as to the mystery, there is no more mystery in spirit phenomena than in the growing of a stalk of corn, and I know as much about one as the other—I know they are facts.

What kind of truth seekers are they who refuse to investigate spirit phenomena, and close their eyes, ears, and reason to this knowledge of spirit life?

Spirit phenomena has, through long ages past, been often witnessed. Their true nature, if known at all, was only known to a few, and kept by them secret from the masses, and used for selfish, tyrannical, and evil purposes; and the honor belongs to America as being the place where the mystery, religion, and superstition hav been taken from these spirit manifestations and the science of Spiritology is being developed, which stands preëminently as the latest and grandest knowledge of facts of the greatest importance to the future development and progress of humanity.

Spiritology givs knowledge, not belief; establishes the universal brotherhood of man; adds its testimony to the fact that eternal and unchangeable law is the governing power of the universe, and does away with religion and all its myths, Bibles, Gods, saviors, angels, miracles, supernatural, divine, create, heaven, hell, devil, and all the pious and mythical words and language that hav no meaning in fact; and any Materialist who refuses to investigate this science of Spiritology is very much like the pious Christian who refuses to see the self-contradictions, the sanction of vice and crime, and the unscientific teachings in his sacred book. Anaheim Organized.

Mrs. K. Parker, secretary of the Anaheim Secular Union, in writing for a charter, informs us of the enthusiasm aroused and the organization effected at the conclusion of President Putnam's course of lectures, especially the one on "The Nine Demands," which was largely attended by the best citizens and well received. Anaheim is the occidental Eden, and stands a crowning glory of what in early days a band of German Freethinkers accomplished. It was the single, solitary exception in this country of successful colonization. While the city has outgrown its foundation phase, it has nevertheless attracted to it men and women of brain and bravery, whom the secretary says "will work for the Union and universal mental liberty, and she hopes that "no prejudice will be allowed to creep in the Union, no bickerings, no strife, but that we shall work together for the liberation of the state from the church, and support our glorious bulwark of freedom, the United States Constitution, entire and intact." This breathes the spirit which should animate every true Secularist. Frank Ely is president, and, it is presumed, will keep a vigilant watch on the enemy. President Putnam's labors in Anaheim, San Jacinto, and Fresno prove what a loyal soldier in the Secular cause can accomplish. We wonder that in the midst of incessant labors and the rush and whirl of travel he can sufficiently compose himself to pen such poetic prose, can gather such glittering dewdrops fresh from perfumed flowers, and giv us such glimpses in word-painting of an actual earthly paradise. May his voice and pen find welcome response in golden showers of prosperity and well-earned approbation.

In proof of the adage that "Nothing succeeds like success" is the favorable notice the Chicago Union is receiving from the city press, when the same lectures and lecturers hav been unnoticed for years. Of last Sunday's lecture the Herald says:

The Forum, the large and handsome new hall of the Chicago Secular Union, was crowded last night, the occasion being a lecture by Judge E. R. Paige, his subject being, "How Worlds Grow." The hall was elaborately trimmed in the vicinity of the rostrum, the central feature being the United States flag hanging above the cross, the emblem of orthodox religion. The Secularism which is typified by the flag above the cross is the silent protest of the society against ecclesiasticism before the state. All who visited the Forum last night were presented with a circular on which was set forth the Nine Demands of Secularism. The fourth Demand in the list is a key to the others. It is thus phrased:

We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished, and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

The exercises of the evening were commenced by the singing of a patriotic glee by the choir. It was a spirited apostrophe to the flag of the nation. Stafford Bolton, secretary, read the minutes of the preceding meeting, which were approved. Another song by the quartet.

President Stevens then introduced Judge Paige, who was greeted with applause. He told of a clergyman who lost the manuscript of his sermon in an auger-hole, and upon rising said that he had a good sermon if he could get at it. The judge said he had a pretty good lecture if he could get at the illustrations which should go with it, but which were unavoidably absent. The speaker alluded to Energy, which is evidently, in his opinion, the power that creates and controls. He said that the world sprang from vapor. There is nothing we know of that cannot be converted into gas. Every atom of sand and rock and glass is in motion. It is an imitation of the great astronomical action of the universe—an imitation of the solar system. All the so-called "fixed stars" are sweeping around at the rate of thousands of miles a minute. Before the solar system was created there must hav been some normal condition. What was that condition? Was it dark chaos? The speaker thought it was not, for nowhere do we find any matter at rest. Rocks are not Nature at rest. Everything is in motion; therefore we can not believe that the normal condition of the earth was inertia. The Energy that was the normal condition of the earth is what has impelled the countless millions of atoms and formed all the systems we know anything about. The microscope shows that there are minute insects we cannot see, and that these insects "hav other fleas to bite 'em." The naked eye beholds the light of suns that has been 125 years in traveling to us at the rate of 186,000 miles a second. There is no great, no small, no time, no distance, no space, that controls our finite minds. Electricity is nature seeking an equilibrium. Newton calls it the "attraction of gravitation." Modern scientists do not exactly agree with Newton. Matter is elastic. A drop of water can be expanded under heat to cover 20,000,000 acres of land. The world is traveling at the rate of 1,000 miles a minute. We do not realize it, but it is true, and our equilibrium is preserved by the pressure of ether, or matter from the outside. In all creation of the living being the first thing formed is the stomach. The first demand is to eat, to consume something. The spiral nebula is a round cart-wheel whirling through space; the solar system is a great stomach. Neptune was thrown off by the revolution of the spiral nebulæ. Then Uranus, Saturn, Jupiter, Neptune, the earth, and the moon were thrown off. When thrown off the earth was a molten mass, but gradually cooled. Thus it was that worlds began and grew. Finally a mineral crust was formed around the earth. The speaker thought the earth was solid to the core. It was foolish to think of the center of the earth as a molten mass of fire, and of the volcanoes as the outlet of this molten mass. One might as well believe that the great Chicago fire could hav been ventilated through a clay pipe. Every leaf has a million mouths to eat carbon. The coral polyp eats carbon. The part which carbon has played in the physical creation of worlds was elaborated at length.

A collection was then taken up in the interest of Energy, while the choir sang "Giv Me a Home by the Sea."

Members of the audience then questioned and criticised the lecture of Judge Paige, and the lecturer replied. This gave a spice to the proceedings which was heartily appreciated.

The Union has passed these resolutions:

Resolved, That the sincere thanks of the Chicago Secular Union is hereby extended to Dr. W. H. and Mrs. Henry, not only for their munificent generosity financially, but for the activ interest and enthusiasm they hav manifested for the society, and especially do we recognize the far-seeing executiv ability by which the doctor prompted the procuring of a permanent home, his intelligent and successful direction in its preparation, and the prominent part he has taken in the upbuilding of Secularism in Chicago; and be it further

Resolved, That we tender our acknowledgments, esteem, and appreciation to Mrs. Dr. Henry for the beautiful and elaborate floral decorations which (even while absent from the city) she has so graciously donated, furnishing unmistakable evidence of her kindly remembrance and sympathy.

Had Dr. McLeod also been absent, we should hav tried to suitably emphasize our deep obligations for years of generous bounty and incessant labor, but it was no use when he was present.

I am busily packing and forwarding bundles of leaflets and literature to contributors to the Campaign Fund, and find the cost of transmission is quite a serious item. I wish all parties would remit enough postage or expressage, and that would help cover the cost of sending further documents. Individually that would be but a small outlay; to the Union it is a considerable expense.

About these leaflets and literature. Do you Liberals realize how little is known of the American Secular Union? Ask your orthodox neighbors, and nine out of ten never hav heard of it. If you believe in the essence of American freedom, it is your duty to enlighten them that we exist, and what we exist for. A simple leaflet will do that. Now let everyone whose eye this meets commence to coöperate for the common cause. The majority of my correspondents deplore that orthodoxy has got a tight grip on their town. Two or three good Liberal workers ought to set orthodoxy out in the cold in any small community. It cannot be done in a day; it takes time, work, judgment, and a little money. Most Liberals possess the requisits, and should do their duty. They should pattern from the success of orthodoxy, and organize. Become a battalion in the army of aggressiv Secularists. If there is none to organize with you, you can assist the work along somewhere by sending us the sinews of war, and help keep the guns well shotted with effectiv literature to open on the enemy. The God-in-the-state party are marshaling their forces to manacle the human mind with fear and superstition. We are recruiting to counteract their schemes, and keep the watch-fires of freedom burning. Who will respond to the muster roll? This is not a fight for bloody conquest or booty, but to light the world with the torch of reason, and lift the race to higher and nobler conditions. At least, we ask you to sustain the Freethought press and the Secular Union advocates. If Secularization is not accomplished, it will be more through our own indifference than any other cause. Why do we revere the memory of the Freethought heroes? They boldly acted out, openly declared, and generously sustained their ideas before the world against opposition the like of which we now can scarcely conceive. The real reverence we should pay them is only that of emulation. Many professed Freethinkers hide their views as much as possible, or relieve themselvs from responsibility by indolently boasting, "I let everyone think just as he pleases!" How condescending! How heroic! When organized orthodoxy is engaged in strangling our liberty, and proposes to make it a crime to think differently from what it prescribes, and even enforces that in some portions of our land to-day. Still, as surely "as truth ever comes uppermost," success will be the reward of an association which, though weak in point of organization, gathers to the support of its principles such a noble host as year by year sustain the American Secular Union. Contrast the high purposes, the unselfish devotion, the chivalrous conduct of this brave band of stalwart Secularists with the petty frauds, spiteful maligners, and pious slanderers whom we rejoice to call our enemies—enemies also to the Declaration of Independence, to the Constitution, and to natural rights.

Seriously consider this proposition. Do not lay it away for future consideration. Liberals, raise up from your lethargy and strike for mental liberty now. To the work before us we invite the coöperation of all who can rise above personal piques of the past and come into cordial union for constitutional, legitimate Secular work, and we will extend to them the right hand of good-fellowship.

E. A. STEVENS, Sec. American Secular Union.

C. B. Reynolds on His Western Tour.

TEMPE, ARIZ., March 18th, 20th.—It is a long, tedious ride of twelve hours from Deming to Maricopa, a dead-alive halting-place, where passengers for Tempe and Phenix hav to lay over seven or eight hours. There is a very neat little depot and a little one-jack hotel. Even the execrable real estate fiend has not yet stuck his stakes at Maricopa to mark off the park, court-house, opera-house, and immensely valuable corner lots. The town is a thing of the "yet to be." At 2:30 P.M. the train started for Tempe, and on arrival here I found the most lovely oasis conceivable; no poet's dream of fairyland could exceed the beautiful realities of this valley. The place was first discovered and settled by that most exemplary and true Infidel gentleman, Chas. Trumbull Hayden, the merchant prince of Arizona. To his untiring pluck, perseverance, and generosity of heart, manifest to all its early settlers, is due the present flourishing condition of Tempe. Mr. Hayden is president of the educational board, and thanks to his influence and untiring zeal the normal school of Arizona is located here, built under his direction, with no stairs to climb; large, well-ventilated rooms, all on the ground floor, with a large piazza all around, keeping the rooms cool and modulating the light, making a splendid model school-building, beautifully situated in a twenty-acre lot.

I found on visiting the school about thirty bright young men and women, diligent students, and the professor a genuin Liberal. No danger of any of the teachers who graduate from the Tempe normal school ever having Bible or any other superstition taught in any schools over which they will preside.

Here I fully realized I was upon the frontier. The picture-askew Indians flock in town each day—their village is only two miles off—and the noble sons of the forest engage half a day at a time in the heroic game of marbles. They are mostly in full paint, and are well-red—so long as they can get red ocher to daub over their revolting, homely phiz. The noble red man is like Santa Claus, Christ, Jack the Giant-killer, and other myths of the nursery—a myth of wild imagination. And the lovely Indian maiden, the peerless Hiawatha, Laughing Water, she exists here—in your dreams. The genuin aborigines are diabolical, revolting, beastly, dirty blacks. The Mexican half-breed is a swarthy, dirty black, like the Indian, only more so. If they were all immersed in the laughing waters of the beautiful river and left under, there would be no real occasion for briny tears to flow. This sounds horridly unpoetical, but it is hard fact, simple truth.

In company with Mr. Hayden I ascended the Olympian hill, known as Hayden's butte, from which one can view a splendid panorama of the valley for a great distance. Immense fields of alfalfa; orchards of peaches, plums, apricots, and figs; acres and acres of vineyards, with the grape roots just starting their bright green leaves (they cut off all the vines, and each year prune clear to the stumps and let them hav fresh start, and thus no stakes or trellis are needed). In this most lovely and healthful valley investment in a few acres of land cannot fail to insure in a few years a competence. It is not speculation, but certainty. Tempe must become the great distribution-point for lumber, coal, and iron ore (so abundant in the adjacent mountains), both south and east, as well as of all supplies for all the rich gold and silver mines which will soon swarm with sturdy miners. Both commercially, agriculturally, and horticulturally it has promis of all that could be desired. There is an abundant supply of water. I could but regret that poverty barred me from investment here, which would insure such ample provision for old age.

From the Hayden butte, with the aid of a field-glass, I looked over the beautiful valley toward the camp of Frank H. Cushing, of the United States bureau of ethnology, about eight miles to the southwest. Mr. Hayden called my attention to the prayers of the ancient Zuni, engraved on the rocks at the very summit of the mountain—strange hieroglyphics to me, but readily interpreted by the skilled ethnologist Cushing. Of one thing I am certain, those prayers reached nearer heaven than any ever uttered in the vale below us.

The next day Mr. Hayden took me to the Mormon settlement (they are not polygamists). They came into the valley about seven years ago; now they hav beautiful homes, shaded with mammoth cotton-trees, and surrounded by fruit-bearing orchards, oranges, apricots, peaches, figs, and extensiv vineyards. Eight years ago this lovely garden was a mere sandy desert.

We next drove to the camp of the Hemenway Southwestern archeological expedition, under command of Prof. Frank Cushing, and received most kind and hospitable greeting. The professor and all his assistants are profound scientists, and as a matter of course genuin Infidels. The camp comprises about fifteen tents, and is located in the immediate vicinity of the ruins of the city and great temple of the ancient Zuni. From beneath gravelly knolls, covered with rank growth of mesquite and sage brush, Mr. Cushing's workmen hav exhumed the debris of a large city fully two thousand years old, with its hundreds of houses, sacred temple, irrigating canals and sakies, large quantities of beautiful fabrics, and the stone bobbins used in weaving, earthern vessels, stone axes, hammers, tools, clubs, and other implements of war; finger-rings of sea-shell, some beautifully engraved; many finely-carved ornaments in shell of suggestiv shapes. Shells are abundant, more than twenty marine species having been found.

The priests were buried in the sacred temple, but the common people were cremated; skeletons of the priests hav been found entombed within the precincts of the sacred temple, many skulls with the teeth all in. Death and the dead had no terrors for these people, for mixed in their daily associations were the urns containing the ashes of their relativs and friends, and the adobe sarcophagi of their priests they passed every day in their entrance to and exit from the temple.

To the talented truth seeker, Frank H. Cushing, alone is due the credit of clearing up all doubts; with unflagging zeal he has pushed the exploration until even the domestic customs and many of the temple ceremonies of these ancients hav been brought to light. Ever since the first expedition of Coronado, the ruins of this valley hav been a source of wonder and speculation as to their original inhabitants.

I delivered three lectures at the A. O. U. W. Hall at Tempe, the first Liberal lectures ever delivered in the vicinity, and awoke deep interest. The best comment I can make to describe the interest is the simple statement of the fact that on my urging the formation of a Liberal society, with Liberal and scientific library and reading-room, $170 was promptly subscribed. To Mr. John Martin, an earnest truth seeker, I am under obligations for making all arrangements, and to him is confided the main responsibility of selecting the library. He is a most energetic Liberal, and his work for Freethought is a very labor of love, and it is made a very joy by the prompt alacrity with which the noble band of Liberals here second his efforts. C. B. Reynolds.

E. C. Walker and the Harmans Free.

From advance sheets of Lucifer of April 20th.

The indictment charged that the defendants, Moses Harman, E. C. Walker, and George S. Harman, deposited in the post-office at Valley Falls a certain obscene, lewd, and lascivious paper entitled Lucifer, which publication was so obscene, lewd, and lascivious as to dispense with its incorporation in the indictment.

Mr. Clemens opened the argument for the defense on the motion to quash the indictment.

He claimed that the statute under which the defendants were indicted was a penal statute and must be strictly construed—that it must be so construed as to make as few offenses as possible and as to embody in a single offense as many elements of crime as possible. The indictment, he said, set forth more than one offense in the same count, and hence was bad for uncertainty. Also, that as the punishment in this case might be imprisonment in the state prison for ten years, the case came within the provision of the Constitution of the United States which provides that no person shall be called upon to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime except upon indictment by a grand jury. Therefore if the indictment was bad it could be in no wise amended or supplemented; and the indictment was bad because it did not set out the alleged obscene matter, and from its face it could not be ascertained whether the defendants' alleged act amounted to a crime or not.

As a further reason for a strict construction Mr. Clemens insisted that notwithstanding the Supreme Court had held the statute in question constitutional in Jackson's case, 6th Otto, yet that was a lottery case, and so far as that case would apply to the case at bar it was a mere obiter dictum, and it was plainly apparent from the reasoning of the court even in that case that the court felt that the statute did to some extent abridge the freedom of the press. Where liberty was at stake, declared Mr. Clemens, all doubts should be resolved in favor of accused.

Mr. Albert Perry, United States district attorney, followed, and claimed that as the indictment designated the paper as Lucifer and gave the date of the mailing, the parties were thereby sufficiently apprised of the matter they were called upon to answer, naïvely observing that when the date of mailing was given the defendants knew what paper it was they mailed.

Mr. Overmyer, interrupting, reminded him that they were presumed to be innocent until proven guilty, therefore it was not to be presumed in advance that they had mailed anything, or that they could know anything about the things the prosecution were thinking about. Mr. Perry made no reply to this, but went on to decry and ridicule Mr. Clemens's asseverations of the importance of guarding carefully the liberty of the individual. He said that if the defendants were not sufficiently advised of the matter alleged against them, a bill of particulars could be furnished them.

Mr. Overmyer, for the defense, followed Mr. Perry. He maintained the positions contended for by Mr. Clemens, and in addition thereto he claimed that even if it should be conceded that the alleged obscene matter could in any case be omitted from the indictment, yet the excuse therefore must not, as in this case, be the mere opinion of the grand jury that it might be dispensed with, but should be that the matter alleged as an excuse should be matter of fact from which the court could judge as matter of law whether the grand jury should hav omitted it or not, and that if even it were possible to frame a valid excuse for not setting out the alleged obscene matter, yet that excuse could only apply to the very words of the matter complained of, and there could still be no reason why the substance should not be set out in proper language. He held that unless at least the substance of the matter complained of was set out, the defendant could not know the nature and cause of the accusation against him, and that this was a sacred right guaranteed by the Constitution. The defendant could not plead either conviction or acquittal in bar of a subsequent prosecution for the same offense. The court could not decide upon the face of the indictment whether an offense had been committed, and no report of the trial would or could advise those who come after us as to what the courts hold to be obscene.

In response to Mr. Perry, he declared that it is just as true now as it ever was that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty; that liberty is the dearest thing on earth and cannot be too much talked about; that the man who on all proper occasions stood up for liberty rendered a great service to humanity, and that he (Overmyer) would always be found talking for liberty when the opportunity was afforded. The idea that there is no need of such talk was a fallacy, and there was just as urgent need for it in this country as in any country or in any age. If liberty is to be preserved, it must be as jealously guarded under a government erected by the majority as under one proclaimed by imperial decree. The laws passed by a majority could be made so as to constitute a despotism as bitter and odious as any that ever existed under the rule of any tyrant.

Overmyer also stated that he was individually of the opinion that those thinkers were right who in the formativ stages of our institutions held that the law should utterly ignore all these matters that are considered nasty, for the reason that if any subject is too offensiv to be mentioned in decent society it is too offensiv to injure any pure person, and if anyone can be affected at all by such utter nastiness, such a one has reached the point where nothing can injure him. The law should throw the mantle of silence and oblivion over any matter too offensiv to go on record, and any matter not thus offensiv should not constitute crime.

As to Mr. Perry's suggestions that the government could furnish a bill of particulars respecting the matters wherein the indictment was uncertain, Mr. Overmyer said the thought could not be entertained for a moment, for the plain reason that the district attorney had no power or authority to do such a thing. If the uncertainty was immaterial then no specifications were needed, but if the uncertainty was material then it was fatal to the indictment, and the defendants had a right to stand upon their rights and demand that it be quashed. The Constitution provides for indictment by a grand jury, and no other officer or body was empowered to make presentments for infamous crimes as in this case. The district attorney could no more furnish a bill of particulars than he could return an indictment. No one but the grand jury could inform the court as to the facts upon which they based an indictment. And while he and his associate counsel knew that Mr. Perry would not mislead them, yet if this practice were permitted the district attorney could bring any paper he pleased and say, "This is the paper the grand jury had in mind when they preferred this charge." Under this indictment he might produce any paper called Lucifer, whether it was published recently and in this country or whether it was published in England centuries ago. To permit such a practice would do away with the grand jury, as the attorney could bring his paper into court and the court could judge of the question of crime upon the face of the paper. But the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that nothing can be added to or taken from an indictment, that an indictment in capital and otherwise infamous offenses is jurisdictional, and if it is not good there is nothing before the court. That the ancient practice, if an indictment showed some defect, was, when the grand jury which returned it was still in session, to return it to them and let them make it good, but no one else can piece it out, no one else can make it good; and as that grand jury is no more there is no alternativ but to quash.

Numerous authorities were cited for the defense from the American and English authorities.

The court promptly sustained the motion to quash upon the ground that as the indictment did not set out the obscene matter it should at least hav described it in some way so as to show the nature and cause of the accusation, and that it was not competent for the district attorney to furnish a bill of particulars.

A German View of It.

From the Anzeiger des Westens.

The ideas of our American fellow-citizens are to us born Germans, or who hav grown up here in German influences, often thoroughly incomprehensible. Lately the president and cashier of a bank in Raleigh, N. C., fled to Canada, the paradise of dishonest officials—not empty-handed, but with all the bank's money. . . . That these clever rogues, up to the time of the discovery of their crime, were very pious, is perfectly natural. It is to the advantage of people who hav positions of trust to pretend piety if they do not possess it, and that they succeed so often in deceiving the honestly pious lies in the nature of the case, and is no shame to the latter class. But that sneak-thieves like those from Raleigh, after their crime is known to everyone, should still retain the respect of their pious fellow-believers, it is that which to us Germans is incomprehensible. When the thievish cashier, White, returned to Raleigh, a crowd of his church friends visited him in prison, and were greatly edified by his assuring them that during all his trials his religion had held fast to him. Yet this rascal had, when arrested, $25,000 of stolen money in his pockets! His friends returned the assurance that his brethren and sisters in the Lord had never doubted him, and that the young ladies whom he taught in the Sunday-school had sent up to heaven an ardent prayer in his behalf. Now, is not this naked hypocrisy on both sides? It seems so, for none of the pious brethren and sisters offered to go his bail.

Personal Liberty.

As I understand it, the principle upon which our government is founded is that the individual may follow the bent of his will so long as he is not a source of annoyance to his fellows. Very well; now I want to know by what authority, or upon what principle, various laws are enacted which decree what days I shall and what days I shall not open my store, or my theater, or giv my Secular concert.

Are the church and the state separate when the state exempts the church from taxation, or recognizes such a crime as blasphemy? Is it anybody's business if my friends and I wish to bet and gamble, or to commit suicide? George Peterson.

Evolution in Civilized Man.

Report, from Science, of Major J. W. Powell's Address before the Annual Meeting of the Washington Anthropological Society.

Nature givs more lives than she can support; there are more individuals requiring nourishment than there is food. Only those liv that obtain sufficient nutriment, and only those liv that find a habitat. Of the multitude of germs, some perish on the rocks, some languish in the darkness, some are drowned in the waters, and some are devoured by other living beings. A few liv because they fall not upon the rocks, but are implanted in the soils; because they are not buried in the darkness, but are bathed in the sunlight; because they are not overwhelmed by deep waters, but are nourished by gentle rains, or because they are not devoured by the hungry, but dwell among the living. A few liv because they are the favorits of surrounding circumstances. In the more stately phrase of the philosophy of evolution, they are "adapted to the environment." Evolution, or progress in life, is accomplished among animals or plants by killing the weaker—the less favored—and by saving the stronger and more favored. Many must be killed because there are too many, and so the best only are preserved. Those a little above the average are saved, and this is called "natural selection."

Competition among plants and animals is fierce, merciless, and deadly; out of competition fear and pain are born; out of competition come anger and hatred and ferocity. But it must not be forgotten that from this same competition there arise things more beautiful and lovely—the wing of a butterfly, the plumage of the bird, and the fur of the beast; the hum of the honey-bee, the song of the nightingale, and the chatter of the squirrel. So good and evil dwell together.

In civilization, man does not compete with plants for existence. Thorns cannot drive him from fruits, husks cannot hide nutritious seeds from his eye, shells cannot defend sweet nuts from his grasp; but he speedily destroys from the face of the earth the plants which are not of the highest value for his purpose, and he plants those that are of value, and multiplies them in a marvelous manner, and by skilled culture he steadily improves their character, making the sweet sweeter, the rich richer, and the abundant more abundant.

In the higher civilization, man does not compets with the beast for existence. There are no howling wolves or bears on our farms, there are no lions or tigers in civilized lands, and there are no serpents in our cities. All these dwell where civilization has not yet conquered its way. Civilized man has domesticated the animal: he hives the bee for its honey, he coops the bird for its eggs, he pastures the cow for her milk, and he stables the horse that his boy may ride on its back.

In the highest civilization, the world is not crowded with men beyond their ability to procure sustentation; for, if some hunger, it is not because of the lack of the world's food, but because of the imperfect distribution of that food to all. Men are not crowded against plants, men are not crowded against beasts, and men are not crowded against one another. The land is yet broad enough for all. The valleys are not all filled, the hillsides are not all covered. The portion of the earth that is actually cultivated and utilized to supply the wants of man is very small; it compares with all the land as a garden to a plain, an orchard to a forest, a meadow to a prairie. Nature is prodigal of her gifts. The sweet air, as it sweeps from zone to zone, is more than enough to fan every cheek; the pure water that falls from the heavens and refreshes the earth, and is again carried to the heavens on chariots of light, is more than enough to refresh all mankind; the bounteous earth, spread out in great continents, is more than enough to furnish every man a home; and the illimitable sea has wealth for man that yet has not been touched. Thus it is that in human evolution over-population is not a factor, as it is in biotic evolution.

In the highest civilization, man does not compete with man in the struggle for existence, and thus human competition is not biotic competition. In biotic evolution the wolf devours the fawn; but on the average he devours the weakest fawn, and the strongest fawn livs to beget a fleeter race of stags; and the evolution of stag life is accomplished by such means. But when the highwayman waylays the traveler, and there is a struggle for existence which ends in a murder, no step in human evolution is accomplished thereby.

Again, in the higher civilization man does not compete with man in the direct struggle for the means of existence as does the brute. In the struggle for subsistence, one ox gores another to drive him from a blade of grass, one wolf rends another to drive him from a bone. Among the animals the struggle for the means of existence is direct, rapacious, and cruel; but in civilized society man shares with his fellowman; the poor and the unfortunate are fed at the table of charity. A maimed beast is driven from the crib, but men and women will vie with one another to serve a maimed man; and one of the highest aspirations of civilized society is to dispense generous hospitality.

Vestiges of brutal competition still exist in the highest civilization, but they are called crimes; and, to prevent this struggle for existence, penal codes are enacted, prisons are built, and gallowses are erected. Competition in the struggle for existence is the agency by which progress is secured in plant and animal life, but competition in the struggle for existence among men is crime most degrading. Brute struggles with brute for life, and in the eons of time this struggle has wrought that marvelous transformation which we call the evolution of animals; but man struggles with man for existence and murder runs riot—no step in human progress is made.

That struggle for existence between man and man which we hav considered and called crime is a struggle of one individual with another. But there is an organized struggle of bodies of men with bodies of men, which is not characterized as murder, but is designated as warfare. Here, then, we hav man struggling with man on a large scale, and here it is where some of our modern writers on evolution discover the natural law of selection—"the survival of the fittest in the struggle for existence." The strongest army survives in the grand average of the wars of the world.

When armies are organized in modern civilization, the very strongest and best are selected, and the soldiers of the world are gathered from their homes in the prime of manhood and lusty health. If there is one deformed, if there is one maimed, if there is one weaker of intellect, he is left at home to continue the stock, while the strong and courageous are selected to be destroyed. In organized warfare the processes of natural selection are reversed: the fittest to liv are killed, the fittest to die are preserved; and in the grand average the weak, physically, mentally, and morally, are selected to become the propagators of the race.

Among bi-sexual animals, one of the agencies of evolution is sexual selection. Brutes fight one another for mates, and in the grand aggregate the weaker are killed, and the stronger are preserved to perpetuate their kind; and various devices are gradually developed for attracting and winning mates, and the forms, colors, and habits of animals are modified thereby. But even in savagery this battle for sexual love is largely avoided, and, that peace may be preserved, marriage institutions are established. It seems at first that men in groups agree to marry women in groups. A group of men holding a group of women in common, defend one another's rights from violation from without, and liv together in peace. On this plan there supervenes another system of institutions for marriage, where a group of men are destined to become husbands of a group of women in severalty, and the selections are not made by the parties themselvs, but by the elders; that is, where marriage is by legal appointment within prescribed groups. Thus marriage institutions change from age to age, and from state of culture to state of culture, until the highest civilization is reached, where the man marries the woman of his choice on the sole condition that he is the man of her choice, and where the man must hav but one wife, and the woman but one husband, and the twain are one in love, in purpose, and in law. But in the course of this evolution of marriage institutions, how many customs hav obtained, how many agreements hav been made, how many laws hav been enacted! And along the entire course of the history of marriage institutions, customs and laws hav disappeared, that new and better customs and laws might take their places; and the struggle for mates existing among the lower animals has been replaced by the endeavor to secure peace and happiness in human society. Thus man has transferred the struggle for existence from himself to his institutions. The marriage ceremony of the beast with its mate is a battle with a rival; the marriage of a man with his mate is a festival of kindred and friends. And wherever any vestige of the beastly struggle remains in human society, there crime is committed, and the course of human evolution is checked. The way from communal marriage to monogamy and personal choice is very long, but every step in it has been taken by man in his endeavor to secure greater happiness.

Comparing animals with men, among the brutes rights and duties are distributed by hoofs and claws and horns and fangs, and by all brutal powers; but among men rights and duties are distributed by institutions.

In this brief review of the growth of institutions, it is observed that forms of government are ever changing, that the constitution of the state is ever changing, and that the laws are ever changing. As these changes proceed, better institutions are selected by men; and thus is secured a "survival of the fittest in the struggle for existence" among institutions. In civilization man does not struggle with man for existence; but by the invention of institutions he emancipates himself from the reign of terror inherent in brutal competition, and transfers the struggle from himself to the institutions of his creation.

All of this statement may be summarized in this manner: man does not compete with plants and animals for existence, for he emancipates himself from that struggle by the invention of arts; and, again, man does not compete with his fellow-man for existence, for he emancipates himself from that brutal struggle by the invention of institutions. Animal evolution arises out of the struggle for existence; human evolution arises out of the endeavor to secure happiness: it is a conscious effort for improvement in condition.

But arts and institutions alone hav not secured the evolution of mankind, for they hav been powerfully aided by two other classes of human invention—namely, linguistics and opinions—and the part which they hav taken must be mentioned.

By human endeavor, man has created speech, by which he may express his thoughts. And out of this endeavor, in all lands and in all time, the unorganized languages of savages hav been developed into the languages of modern civilization; and all this progress, all this evolution, is by human endeavor; and in it natural selection, as that term is understood in biology, has played no part.

Along the course of human progress opinions hav been changing. The cruelty of nature in biotic evolution has been set forth. In this figure of speech, Nature is personified, and, if we still personify Nature, to the savage man Nature was ever a deceiver and a cheat.

Nature tells the savage that the earth is flat, over which the sky is arched as a solid dome; then Nature tells the savage that the sun travels over the flat earth, and under the sky of ice, by day from east to west, and returns again in a cave by night from west to east; then Nature tells the savage that the rain comes from the melting of the ice of the sky. Many, strange, foolish, and false are the stories that Nature tells to the untutored savage. Nature is the Gulliver of Gullivers, the Munchausen of Munchausens. Nature teaches men to believe in wizards and in ghosts. Nature fills the human mind with foolish superstitions and horrible beliefs. The opinions of the natural man fill him with many fears, giv him many pains, and cause him to commit many crimes. Out of all these savage superstitions man has traveled a long way into the light of science. And how shall the opinions of modern civilization be characterized? And who can tell how the knowledge of the highest civilization transcends the knowledge of the lowest savagery? And so opinions hav been changing—old opinions hav died, and new opinions hav been born—and philosophies hav struggled for existence as man has endeavored to learn; and with man forever the struggle to know has been the endeavor to secure happiness, for truth is good, and wisdom is joy.

Through the inventions of mankind his mind has been developed. If we review the history of the human race, and fully comprehend what mental effort has been put forth to invent the arts of civilization and all the arts that hav passed away by being superseded from age to age by better inventions, and fully grasp the mental efforts involved therein, we may comprehend that there is some good reason why the inventor of the electric light is superior to the inventor of the torch, why the inventor of the telegraph is superior to the inventor of the smoke-signal, why the inventor of the machine-shop is superior to the inventor of the flint-factory, why the inventor of the railroad is superior to the inventor of the dog-sled, why the inventor of the newspaper is superior to the inventor of a picture-writing on a bone. It has caused some exercise to bring about all the mental evolution which these differences implied.

Modern industries hav been highly differentiated, or, the political economists would say, in modern industry there is great division of labor. By this division of labor men are made interdependent. No man livs for himself, but every man livs for others.

When a man invents a new thresher, it is not that he may thresh his own grain, but that his neighbors may use it, that all the world may hav it, and they, in return, may contribute to his happiness. If a man invents a new regulation or law, it is not that his own conduct may be regulated thereby, but that some injustice may be removed, or some justice be established, in the relations of the people of the state one to another. The farmer plants a field to raise wheat for his neighbors' bread, the gardener plants the vineyard to raise grapes for his neighbors' wine, the lawyer pleads his neighbors' cause, the physician givs nepenthe to his neighbors' pain, the poet writes for his neighbors' delight, the artist paints for his neighbors' gallery, and the philosopher expounds for his neighbors' instruction.

All honest men are working for other men. If a man works exclusivly for himself, he is a counterfeiter, or a forger, or a swindler, or a sneak-thief, or perchance a highwayman. All love of industry, all love of integrity, all love of kindred, all love of neighbor, all love of country, and all love of humanity, is expressed in labor for others. For this service thus performed a right to a reward is required, and he for whom the service is performed has imposed upon him the duty to render the reward, and the service is rendered in the hope of the reward.

Everywhere in civilized society men are thus working for others. Every man, in all the years of his labor, toils for his fellow-man, and the practice is universal among all honest civilized men, and lasts from generation to generation; and universal practice is gradually becoming crystallized into universal habit. One man is trying to make better houses for his neighbors, another man is trying to make better shoes for his neighbors, another man is trying to make better laws for his neighbors, and another man is trying to make better books for his neighbors. Every man is thus forever dwelling upon the welfare of his neighbors, and making his best endeavor for their good; and thus the habit grows from generation to generation, until at last some men forget that there is reward for service, and labor for their fellow-men because they love their fellow-men.

It has been seen that no man works for himself. The counterpart of this is that every man is dependent upon his fellow-man. That he may hav good and abundant food, he desires the welfare of the farmer; that he may hav good clothing, he desires the welfare of the manufacturer; that his rights may be maintained, he desires the welfare of the statesman, the jurist, and the administrator; that he may hav the truth, he desires the welfare of the author; that he may enjoy poetry, he desires the welfare of the poet; and that he may enjoy art, he enjoys the welfare of the artist. It is thus that man is taught that he who loves the world loves himself, and he who hates the world hates himself. So it is that man toils for others and plans for their welfare, and others toil for him and plan for his welfare; so that every man's good is bound up with every other man's good, and every man's evil is an evil to every other man. And as man forever desires the good of his neighbor for his own sake, from generation to generation the desire for his neighbor's welfare for his own sake gradually becomes the desire for his neighbor's welfare for his neighbor's sake. Thus it is that selfishness is transformed into love, and justice and love are developed into the ethics of mankind. A part of the endeavor of mankind is governed by the principles of political economy, but the greater part is governed by the principles of philanthropy.

Competition is a rivalry among men engaged in the same vocation to render a service to others that the reward may be received. Economic competition has or may hav two factors—emulation and antagonism. By emulation is meant the strife between men for greater excellence—to perform better service for their fellow-men. By antagonism is meant strife in which man endeavors to injure his rival that he may himself succeed. Emulativ competition results in human progress; antagonistic competition results in human retrogression. Generous emulation and all its products are in the line of human progress. But jealousies, unjust criticism, carping detraction, and vile slander lead to no progress among mankind. Every success in art creates among laymen an appreciation and love of art in every way beneficial to the artist himself. The natural man, in his ignorance, spurns all works of art. It is the cultured man that loves art; and the culture which brings appreciation and love of art arises from the ethical training which works of art giv. In art, demand does not create supply, but supply creates demand. It is thus that the broad-minded artist rejoices in the success of his brother.

Among mining, manufacturing, and transporting industries, competition is both emulativ and antagonistic. To avoid the evils of the latter, each class of employers is gradually organizing corporations or trusts; but by these, emulativ competition is also avoided, for the managers of business enterprises no longer compete for business, but distribute business by convention. And in the same manner they repeal the law of competition in the labor market; they seek by convention to establish rates of wages. The employees in these same industries also compete with one another in two ways—by striving to render their labor more efficient by skilled industry, and by offering to labor for smaller wages. The first method of competition is emulativ, the second antagonistic. In all civilized society there is no competition so direful in its results, so degrading to mankind, as that which is produced among the employees of these classes who compete for employment by cheapening labor, for it results in overwork, which is brutalizing, and in want, which is brutalizing; and the abolition of this form of competition is one of the great questions of the day. To avoid the evil, these people organize labor unions, but, while these destroy antagonistic competition, they also result in the destruction of emulativ competition. The great problem in industrial society to-day is to preserve competition, and destroy antagonistic competition. The professional classes hav already solved the problem for themselvs, and they stand aloof and deplore the struggle; but they should learn this lesson from history: that, when wrongs arise in any class of society, those wrongs must ultimately be righted; and, so long as they remain, the conflict must remain; and when the solution comes not by methods of peace, it comes by war.

Injustice is a strange monster. Let any body of people come to see that injustice is done them in some particular, though it may be one which affects their welfare but to a limited degree: they dwell upon it and discuss it, and paint its hideous form one to another until the specter of that injustice covers the heavens, and gradually to that injustice the people will attribute all their evils. If a body of laborers receive unjust reward for their toil, they will dwell upon this evil so long, so often, and kindle their passions to such a hight, that they will at last attribute to the failure of receiving a modicum of reward for their toil all the evils of their own improvidence, all the evils of their own intemperance, all the evils of their own lust; and if fire and flood come, the very evils of unavoidable misfortune will be attributed to the injustice of unrequited toil. Injustice is of such a nature that it must be destroyed by society, or it will destroy society. We dare not contemplate its existence with equanimity, for "behold, what a great fire a little matter kindleth!"

Death Warrant of Jesus Christ.

Literary frauds hav abounded in all ages. Doubtless the chief motiv has been mercenary or mischievous, but in many instances it seems to hav been a desire to uphold or reform some institution or system which the writer believed to be beneficent. In early times, when readers were few and critics fewer, the chances of detection were small; but even now, with all our boasted enlightenment, it is lamentable to see how easily the world is deceived by a clumsy fabrication.

About ten years ago the Religio-Philosophical Journal printed a translation of what purported to be the "Death Warrant of Jesus Christ," discovered in the city of Aquila, in the kingdom of Naples, in the year 1810, engraved on a copper-plate in Hebrew. The editor announced it as "the most imposing judicial document ever recorded in human annals." Other newspapers hav printed the same document, and generally with an editorial assurance that it is no doubt authentic. The date of its excavation is variously printed 1810, 1820, 1200, and 1280. It is said to hav been preserved in the sacristy of the Carthusians, inclosed in a box of ebony, where it was found by the commissioners of arts in the French army that invaded Italy in 1859. A fac-simile of the engraved plate is said to hav been made and owned by Lord Howard, who paid 2,930 francs for it. The translations vary considerably, but perhaps the following is as correct as any:

Sentence pronounced by Pontius Pilate, intendant of all the lower province of Galilee, that Jesus of Nazareth shall suffer death by the cross. In the seventeenth year of the reign of the Emperor Tiberius [A.D. 31], on the 24th day of the month of March [the Sabbath], in the most holy city of Jerusalem, during the pontificate of Annas [A.D. 12-21] and Caiaphas [A.D. 23-36], Pontius Pilate, intendant of the province of Lower Galilee, sitting in judgment at the presidential seat of the prætor, sentences Jesus of Nazareth to death on a cross between two robbers, as the numerous and notorious testimonies of the people prove:

1. Jesus is a misleader.
2. He excites the people to sedition.
3. He is an enemy to the law.
4. He calls himself the son of God.
5. He calls himself falsely the king of Israel.
6. He went into the temple, followed by a multitude carrying palms in their hands.

Order from the first centurion, Quirillis Cornelius, to bring him to the place of execution. Forbid all persons, rich or poor, to prevent the execution of Jesus.

The witnesses who hav signed the execution of Jesus are: 1, Daniel Robani, Pharisee; 2, John Zorabael; 3, Raphael Robani; 4, Capet.

Jesus to be taken out of Jerusalem through the gates of "Tournes" (or "Irunea" or "Strannus").

On the sides of the plate the following words are said to be engraved:

A similar plate has been sent to each tribe.

No further evidence of the fabrication of this document is needed than the attempt to date the sentence. March 24th, in the seventeenth year of Tiberius (A.D. 31), was the Sabbath day of the Jews, when no trial or execution was allowed by that people. And the four evangelists all say that the dead body of Jesus was in the tomb all the hours of the Sabbath day.

One copy of the pretended document has March 25th, which would be our Sunday, and March 27th, which would be Tuesday, but these are probably typographical errors. If such an engraved brass or copper plate exists, or was ever seen, it is a contemptible fraud, like the golden plates that Joseph Smith pretended to find in 1827.

Another fabricated Death Warrant of Jesus Christ appeared in a German newspaper some twelve or fifteen years ago, of which the following is a translation:

Within a few weeks France has experienced sad losses by fire. As already stated, by the burning of the very ancient Lorraine Museum at Nancy, antiquities which cannot be replaced hav been destroyed. A few days later the archbishop's palace at Bourges was burnt down; and here highly precious manuscript and antiquities perished in the flames, together with a particularly important historical document, the order of the execution against Jesus Christ. This satisfactory and authentically proved document was for hundreds of years in the possession of the family of Latour D'Auvergne, and was preserved as a precious relic in the archbishop's museum. We giv below a verbatim translation from the Latin text:

"Jesus of Nazareth, of the tribe of Judah, found guilty of disturbance and rebellion against the godly power of Tiberius Augustus, emperor of Rome, for this treason condemned to die on cross by the decision of Judge Pontius Pilate, and approved by our master Herod, representativ of the emperor in Judea, shall, early to-morrow, the 23d day of the Ides of March, at the common place of execution, under accompaniment of prætorian guards, suffer death. The so-called king of the Jews shall be taken out by the Strunium gate. Accompanying public officers and subordinates of the emperor are hereby ordered to giv a hand to the carrying out of this judgment. Jerusalem, the 22d day of the Ides of March, in the year [A.U.C.] 783 [A.D. 31 or 32]."

The forgery of this document is betrayed by the expression, "23d day of the Ides of March." There were but eight Ides in a Roman month, and they were reckoned backward, to wit, from the 13th to the 6th in all the months but March, May, July, and October, when they were reckoned from the 15th to the 8th. See table in Bullion's Latin Grammar, Appendix, where the Ides of March begin with the 15th and end with the 8th.

But the crucifixion could not hav occurred before March 26th, the earliest possible day for the Jewish Passover.

It is perhaps needless to add that the forger has made another fatal blunder in dating the death sentence one day before the crucifixion. The arrest of Jesus was on the night before his trial and execution. There was a hearing before the high priest during the night, but he was not brought before Pilate until the morning.

Finally, the date of the crucifixion, A.D. 31 or 32, is wrong according to the early Christian authorities. Clement of Alexandria (A.D. 200) positivly affirms that Jesus suffered in the fifteenth year of Tiberius (A.D. 29); and Tertullian not only says the same, but fixes the day March 25th. But unfortunately for Tertullian, March 25, A.D. 29, though it happened to be Friday, was not a Passover Friday. There was a full moon March 18th, but the Passover never occurred before the 26th of March. The next full moon was April 16th, which was Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath, when no trial or execution could take place.

The reason why the year of the crucifixion could never be ascertained is that there was no Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate. The death of Jesus occurred a hundred years earlier; he was stoned and hanged by the Jews some time before their country was taken by the Romans. ANTICHRIST.

Impending Danger.

Is it possible that the people of the United States are in danger from the female suffrage agitation? I hav some fears in that direction. I once advocated the doctrin myself for four or five years before I discovered the feline claws in the meal, which must be as visible to others' eyes as mine. The scheme seems to be gaining ground slowly. Even Liberals, who are and should be on the alert to detect the track of the cloven-footed priest, are frequently advocating it. Does not every intelligent man and woman know that female suffrage at the present time would giv every office, from president to poundmaster, over into the hands of the Romish church? In proof of my assertion, let facts tell.

The Catholic vote now comprises about one-third of the votes cast in the United States; double the Catholic vote and you hav two-thirds of the votes cast. The Romish church is the best organized and disciplined political party in the world. The pope through his bishops and priests has only to giv the word of command and it is done. Every Catholic man and woman in the United States would vote one and the same ticket; the exceptions to the rule would not be worth counting (vide the order to establish parochial schools two years ago). The other women not Catholics would antagonize and neutralize each other's vote.

The truckling politicians who seek only to be on the winning side would soon see the point and avail themselvs of the opportunity. Remember the pandering to the papal power of both candidates and both parties at our last presidential election, and the presents made to the pope by our would-be candidate for reëlection. Can anyone say my fears are groundless or my picture overdrawn?

The success of the movement in the West proves the danger possible. Can any woman not a Catholic desire the ballot at such a cost, with the example of Catholic-cursed countries before their eyes, and the history of their rule in the past in their hands?

I well know and appreciate all the arguments in favor of woman suffrage, such as their being more competent than negroes, Indians, and ignorant foreigners, and the degradation of being classed with irresponsible persons, as idiots and insane persons, all of which, when placed in that light, no gentleman denies; but the necessity of voting to secure her rights, legally or otherwise, is not apparent to me, for you would go a long way to find the man that would not make much greater sacrifice to secure the rights or redress the wrongs of his mother, wife, or sister, or even of any other good woman, than he would for himself under the same circumstances.

Sunday Legislation.

A very timely book has been written by A. H. Lewis, D.D., of Plainfield, N. J., and published by a New York firm. It is entitled, "A Critical History of Sunday Legislation from 321 to 1888 A.D." Mr. Lewis is the author of several other works upon the Sunday question, and though a practicing preacher, takes a broad view of the matter; but rather leaving his readers to form their own conclusions from the facts he presents than having any hobby of his own to advocate. The church, which is now endeavoring in many states to arouse a public opinion which shall insist upon the enforcement of all Sunday laws, will not like the book, for its facts are that such legislation as is demanded has ever sprung and must ever spring from religious feeling, and none knows better than do the clergy that if they make their plea boldly for religion the people will reject it, as savoring too much of the union of church and state which once existed in New England, and which was overcome only after years of struggling against religious persecution.

Sunday legislation, aside from Jewish commandments, is something over fifteen hundred years old, and from its inception has been of religious origin. Constantine's famous edict was issued when he was a pagan, and when the Romans considered religion a department of the state. As pontifex maximus in all religious matters, especially in the appointment of sacred days, the emperor commanded his subjects to venerate the day of the sun. From the date of this edict to the fall of the Roman empire Sunday legislation was a combination of the pagan, Christian, and Jewish religious beliefs. In the Middle Ages the legislation became more Judaistic. The English Reformation introduced a new theory, and the laws of that period were theological treatises as well as civil enactments. Here we meet, says Dr. Lewis, for the first time the doctrin of the transfer of the fourth Commandment to the first day of the week. The Sunday laws of the United States are the direct outgrowth of the Puritan legislation of that time, and notably of the Cromwellian period. Every legislativ enactment on this subject is based on religious grounds, and to say the present Sunday laws do not deal with the day as a religious institution is, emphatically says Dr. Lewis, "to deny every fact in the history of such legislation. The claim that such legislation is not based on these grounds is a shallow subterfuge." It is interesting, then, as well as instructiv, to see to what lengths the piety of our forefathers led them.

The first Sunday—venerable day of the sun—edict had no penalty attached, for which credit should be given the pagans over the Christian Puritans. And under the Roman empire, following Constantine, the central idea of Sunday legislation was not to protect the day as a Christian institution, but was in accordance with the pagan conception of a state church. The term, "Lord's day," did not appear in Roman edicts for sixty-five years after the edict of Constantine. But as the Christians gained in power they utilized the sun's day for their Sunday, and it was kept sacred by law. But Roman legislation always treated it as a pagan institution till after the fall of the empire, and Christians were drawn to pagan practices instead of their elevating the heathen.

In A.D. 538 we arrive at the prototype of our Puritan Sunday legislation. The people were bidden to abstain from plowing, cultivating vines, reaping, mowing, threshing, or clearing their gardens, and the penalty was punishment as the ecclesiastical powers should direct. Forty years afterward the yoking of cattle was prohibited. In 585 the people were forbidden to labor, and commanded to go to church. Charlemagne (813) decreed that servil labor should be abstained from on Sunday, "and, that buying and selling shall be less likely to happen, there shall be no judicial trials, unless concerning capital crimes." Sunday was evidently regarded by him as a holiday upon which it was desirable to rest, but Pope Nicholas I. (858) taught the Burgundians who had just embraced Christianity that it was lawful to do works of necessity upon Sunday—"such as journeying, fighting," etc. But, if necessity did not prevent, Sunday ought to be spent in prayer. His directions involved also other Catholic holy days, and violators were subject to such punishment as the clergy saw fit to impose. But Sunday was no more holy than other sacred days; and this is the position generally maintained by the Continental Romish church, and is the reason that in Catholic countries, after a worshiper has been to church, he is free to amuse himself as best satisfies his tastes. In England, however, the Saxons went beyond the "holy Roman empire" in Sunday legislation, even as early as 725 A.D., and a lord who should force his slave to work on that day was obliged to free him, while a freeman who labored was straightway made a slave. The Saxon law of 901 A.D. was the same, but included other holy holidays as well. The laws were gradually expanded, but never became universally obeyed, as we find that in 1362 it was necessary to plead with the priests and people to honor Sunday and the feast days.

From the Saxon laws, however, the English kings gradually evolved Sabbatic legislation of a stringent nature, and in 1409 Henry IV. ordered that anyone playing unlawful games on Sunday should be imprisoned six days. Elizabeth, though not regarding Sunday as above other religious days, enjoined that in all parishes three or four "discrete men, which tender God's glory," should be appointed to see that the people went to church. They were the forerunners of the Puritan constables who performed the same offices and of the tipstaves who still survive as a relic of barbarism in New Jersey courts. Other laws were passed from time to time, fining Sunday-breakers five shillings, or imposing upon them two hours in the stocks, but the laws generally contained so many exceptions that the people could do pretty nearly as they wished.

The central twenty years of the seventeenth century saw a great change. From 1640 to 1660 the English Puritans strove to make the people religious by law, and prohibited the doing on Sunday of about everything they could think of, and enforced the prohibition by the appointment of special officers and the collection of heavy fines. Disturbers of religious gatherings were imprisoned six months. The following is the legal occupation of the people prescribed by Cromwell's Puritan Parliament in 1644. It is the "directory" from which were copied the forms of Sabbath observance which prevailed in New England in colonial times:

"The Lord's day ought to be so remembered beforehand, as that all worldly business of our ordinary callings may be so ordered, and so timely and seasonably laid aside, as they may not be impediments to the due sanctifying of the day when it comes.

"The whole day is to be celebrated as holy to the Lord, both in public and in private, as being the Christian Sabbath, to which ends it is requisit that there be a holy cessation or resting all the day, from all unnecessary labor, and an abstaining not only from all sports and pastimes, but also from all worldly words and thoughts.

"That the diet on that day be so ordered as that neither servants be unnecessarily detained from the public worship of God, nor any other persons hindered from sanctifying that day.

"That there be private preparation of every person and family by prayer for themselvs, for God's assistance of the minister, and for a blessing upon the ministry, and by such other holy exercises as may further dispose them to a more comfortable communion with God in his public ordinances.

"That all the people meet so timely for public worship that the whole congregation may be present at the beginning, and with one heart solemnly join together in all parts of the public worship, and not depart till after the blessing.

"That what time is vacant, between or after the solemn meetings of the congregation in public, be spent in reading, meditation, repetition of services (especially by calling their families to an account of what they hav heard and catechising of them), holy conferences, prayer for a blessing upon the public ordinances, singing of psalms, visiting the sick, relieving the poor, and such like duties of piety, charity, and mercy, accounting the Sabbath a delight."

Mr. Lewis's research into Scotch history shows that the Sunday laws were but lightly regarded previous to the establishment of Presbyterianism, but that religion dominated the state, the laws being mostly expressions of the theories of the leaders of the church. After the establishment of Calvinism, Parliament passed severe laws enforcing the observance of fast days, and it is significant that the penalties attached were greater than those for the violation of Sunday. Holland, also Protestant and Puritan, possessed Sunday laws of about the same tenor, fining and imprisoning Sabbath-breakers. Ancient Ireland had no Sunday laws, but its people were essentially sun-worshipers, and made Sunday a pagan festival day. The duties of an Irish king were scheduled, each day being devoted to a different pursuit; Sunday was "for drinking ale, for he is not a lawful chief who does not distribute ale on Sunday." English law was first introduced in Ireland in the twelfth century, but it was little obeyed until the latter part of the sixteenth century. In many instances the old pagan laws were in force until the time of James I. Since then the Sunday laws of Ireland are essentially the same as those of England. In Wales no Sunday legislation was known previous to its union with England in 1282 A.D. Both Sunday and Monday were "no days," a fact arising from the people's worship of the sun and moon.

It rested with the Puritans of New England to make of Sunday the most hated day of all the week, and to enforce its religious character by cruel penalties. "The civil government which these men adopted," says Dr. Lewis, "was the direct outgrowth of their religion. The theocracy of the Hebrews furnished the model after which it was patterned. The result was more than a union of church and state—it was a state within a church. Hence the civil laws of those times were the practical expression of orthodox theology; and the execution of those laws was an index to the vitality and power of the prevailing religion."

Taking this view, the progress of the Puritans, and their growth and backsliding in piety, may be known from the following list of penalties attached to Sabbath-breaking:

In June 10, 1650, the general court ordered that offenders against Sunday legislation should be whipped.

In 1651 they should pay ten shillings or be whipped.

In 1658, be fined or sit in the stocks.

In 1661 absentees from church were fined ten shillings.

In 1662 a person who desired to travel on Sunday should procure leave from some man appointed to issue tickets.

In 1665, those who went to sleep in church were put in the stocks.

In 1669, tobacco smokers who used the weed on Sunday within two miles of the meeting-house paid twelve pence.

The foregoing were Plymouth Colony laws. Massachusetts Bay Colony had these statutes:

In 1629 the people were commanded to cease labor at 3 P.M. Saturday, and spend the balance of the day as the ministers ordered. "Catechising and preparations for the Sabbath" were standard occupations.

In 1644 the elders announced that "the gathering of sticks with a high hand on the Sabbath-day may be punished with death, when a lesser punishment might serve for gathering sticks privily."

In the first draught of the laws by Mr. Cotton, revised by Mr. Winthrop, profaning the Lord's day in a careless or scornful neglect or contempt thereof was made a capital offense.

In 1646 absentees from church were fined five shillings.

In 1653 children who played in the streets; strangers who walked abroad, or went on board ships; youths and maidens who went out of doors, "uncivilly," were fined, and if unable to pay the fine were whipped. This law was posted on every meeting-house door.

In 1658 it was observed "by too sad experience, the sun being set, both every Saturday and on the Lord's day, young people and others take liberty to walk," therefore the court decreed that all such who did not giv a satisfactory account of themselvs should "suffer corporal punishment."

In 1665 those who "contemned God's house" were fined and whipped.

In 1667 tithing-men were appointed to apprehend and commit to prison all Sabbath-breakers. Disturbers of public meetings were to be put in a cage set up in the market-place of Boston.

In the same year constables were ordered to make diligent search for Quaker gatherings, and if denied admittance, to break down the doors and arrest the congregation. Absentees from church who could not swear that they were "necessarily absent by the providence of God" were adjudged guilty "and punished accordingly."

In the same year another law empowered tithing-men to enter private houses to prevent the "profanation of the Sabbath." No one was suffered to leave town after sunset Saturday night.

In 1668 Sabbath-breakers were fined "ten shillings for the first offense, and for every offense after to be doubled; and, in case the offense herein be circumstanced with profaneness or high-handed presumption, the penalty is to be augmented at the discretion of the judge."

After Massachusetts Bay Colony and Plymouth Colony were merged into Massachusetts the substance of these laws was reënacted.

In 1711 twelve hours' imprisonment was one penalty for Sabbath-breaking. A month's continuous absence from church was punished by a fine of twenty shillings and "three hours in the stocks or cage." In 1760 a general amendment condensed these laws into one, to the end that all persons on the Lord's day shall "carefully apply themselvs publicly and privately to religion and piety."

In the New Haven Colony Sunday legislation took much the same form, with additions. The following statute on the "Profanation of the Lord's day" shows the additions:

"Whoever shall profane the Lord's day or any part of it, either by sinful servil work, or by unlawful sport, recreation, or otherwise, whether willfully or in a careless neglect, shall be duly punished by fine, imprisonment, or corporally, according to the nature and measure of the sin and offense. But if the court upon examination, by clear and satisfying evidence, find that the sin was proudly, presumptuously, and with a high hand, committed against the known command and authority of the blessed God, such a person therein despising and reproaching the Lord, SHALL BE PUT TO DEATH, that all others may fear and shun such provoking, rebellious courses. (Numb. 15: from 30 to 36 verse.)"—New Haven Colony Records, 1653–1655, p. 605.

In the Colony of Connecticut Sunday was held to be much better or much worse than other days, for in the law against burglary we find this:

"And if any person shall commit [such burglary, or] rob, in the fields or houses on the Lord's day, beside the former punishments, he shall, for the first offense, hav one of his ears cut off; and for the second offense in the same kind, he shall lose his other ear in the same manner, and if he fall into the same offense the third time, he shall be put to death."—Public Records of the Colony of Connecticut prior to 1665, p. 514.

The colony also looked after and punished Sabbath-breakers, compelled the people to attend church, catechise their children and servants as to holy things, and maintain regular family prayer. Travelers on Sunday were fined twenty shillings. Staying outside a meeting-house cost a man three shillings; gathering in the street or elsewhere on the evening before or after Sunday, or on the evening after any fast day, subjected the gatherers to a fine of three shillings or two hours in the stocks. Twenty stripes were the penalty for non-payment of a fine.

Rhode Island in the early part of this century punished the second offense of Sabbath-breakers with ten days in jail. New York fined them, or if they were slaves and their masters refused to pay the fine, gave them thirteen lashes. Pennsylvania fined the ungodly, or put them in jail. Virginia ecclesiastics got their revenge on church absentees by fining them from one to fifty pounds of tobacco.

And these laws were not only made, but enforced. Pages could be filled with instances in detail where men, and women, and children, and servants were "admonished," whipped, placed in the stocks, or put in prison for breaking the Sunday laws. We do not find that anyone was put to death, even in the New Haven Colony, but that punishment was inflicted upon blasphemers, witches, and Quakers. The Puritans who left England for Holland, and finally settled at New Plymouth, were fanatics and intolerants of the most wretched kind. It is their descendants who are now trying to take the country back two hundred years by enforcing the Sunday laws which are on the statute books of nearly all the states—survivals of the intolerant reign of Christianity—but now happily dead letters in all well-ordered communities.

The Church in Mexico.

Two hundred and fifty wealthy Mexicans arrived at and left this city in the early part of the week on a pilgrimage to Rome, with presents for the pope, and several large political schemes in hand to which they will endeavor to secure Mr. Pecci's approval. One scheme is, according to Mexican authority, to settle the difficulties between the church in Mexico and the Vatican, the second is to reconcile the differences between the church and government of Mexico, and the third is to obtain the sanction and aid of the pope to the establishment of the Roman Catholic church in that country on a basis akin to that upon which the church rests in the United States. The trouble between the church in Mexico and the Vatican dates back to the earliest times, and is a continuation of troubles which once existed in Spain. The church in Spain was originally independent of the pope of Rome. It had its own liturgy, called the Mozarabic, and the king was the head of the church. In 1085 the Roman liturgy was adopted and the pope recognized as the head of the church, but many Spanish priests still favored a national church. This feeling was transferred to Mexico, and, as far back as 1770, Lorenzano, archbishop of Mexico, had the Mozarabic liturgy republished, and attempted to use it instead of the one recognized by the church of Rome. He was not successful, but there has always been a strong element in Mexico in favor of the national church.

The fight between the Mexican church and the government culminated seriously in 1857, when a Liberal constitution was adopted, and the laws of the Reforma were passed. Mexico at that time was in the hands of the church, and suffered as all countries do which are dominated by ecclesiastics. Under the Reforma laws all of the churches and church property were confiscated by the government, and all church orders and societies forbidden. Some three hundred church buildings and an immense quantity of wealth passed into the hands of the government. Many of the priests and members of church orders left the country, and Mexico was practically without any church at all, though nine-tenths of the population is besottedly Roman Catholic. Under the few years of Maximilian's rule the church again came into power, but this ended with the restoration of the republic. The laws of the Reforma were so rigidly enforced that no one was allowed to appear upon the streets in ecclesiastical garb, and the church, in retaliation, excommunicated any and every one who was in any way connected with the government. Through each succeeding year a bitter fight has been going on between the church and state parties, and it has only been under the administration of President Diaz that any efforts hav been made to conciliate the two factions. The feeling is still very intense on both sides, and in some of the Liberal districts the laws of the Reforma are enforced with the greatest severity. At the present time the churches of Mexico are used by the priests under a special permit from President Diaz, but the bans of the church still rest upon everyone connected with the government.

The hope of many of the church people, therefore, is that the pope and President Diaz may come to some agreement, by which the government will allow the church to exist without interference. If this is assured, the future is brilliant for the church. The Mexicans are more ignorant, superstitious, and devoted to the church and her mummeries, if possible, than the French Canadians of Canada. If the government will only remove restrictions upon the amount of property the church may hold, and allow the priests to manipulate the people to the full extent of their power, Roman Catholicism will soon possess the country in fee simple, and the government may dissolve. The result of this pilgrimage must therefore be awaited with interest by Mexico, and also by the United States and England, whose citizens are spending many millions of dollars of capital in building railroads and working the mines of that country. With the church again in absolute control of the republic of revolutions, the little progress toward civilization now being made there would cease at once.

Indictment Quashed.

We heartily congratulate the two Harmans, father and son, and E. C. Walker upon getting out of the clutches of the Comstock crowd in Kansas. The quashing of the indictment by the judge is one of those acts of justice which law sometimes commits. But we feel sure that had Benedict been upon the bench no escape on that plea would hav ensued. Mr. Bennett's indictment was faulty in the same regard, but he was tried, convicted, and the conviction upheld. The technicality, too, which saved Mrs. Slenker would, if shown and allowed, hav saved him. We fancy the United States district judges, with the exception of Benedict, are getting tired of being used as catspaws by the disreputable agents of an ecclesiastical society, and allow its victims to escape by the easiest means possible. We hope it is so, at any rate.

Messrs. Walker and Harman are engaged in advocating and upholding personal and religious liberty. It is a splendid occupation, and ought to be the pursuit of every man and woman in the country. The charge that the language used in Lucifer was obscene is ridiculous. The article complained of was unnecessarily coarse, but that was all; and if rough language is a penitentiary offense who shall remain at liberty? In this case the freedom of the press was menaced because the press happened to be Infidel. But the war which Mr. Bennett and his friends maintained in defense of the liberty of printing bids fair to bring forth fruit, and to finally result in victory. People—even Congressmen and judges—are beginning to see, dimly perhaps, but surely, that the laws passed at the request of a gang of ecclesiastics can be used for other than legitimate purposes, supposing Congress could legitimately legislate upon the morality of mail matter.

Again we congratulate our Kansas friends. Their counsel were shrewd, the judge was an adherent to law, and they were lucky. May they always get out of trouble as easily!

THE Catholics of Massachusetts are viciously opposing the proposed law to prevent illiteracy by state inspection of all schools, public and private. The Catholics recognize the undoubted fact that their schools fall far below the moderate standard that the state requires, and they do not want their teachers examined. Before the legislativ committee which has the bill under consideration the Rev. Mr. Maginnis made a speech, in which he contended that the limit of education to be required by the state should be reading and writing; the state had no right to insist upon more. And religion, he maintained, should be taught in the school as well as in the church and the home. This, of course, is good Catholic doctrin. The pupils must be able to read the catechism, and they should also know how to write their names, so that when they grow up they can fill out checks payable to the priest. These two accomplishments attained, the rest of their education may be confined to learning religion. This would put the future population of the country under the feet of priests, and that is where the church wants to see it.

THERE was once a good Christian down in Cuba—and he is probably there now—who had a sick wife. It seems that he loved her, for he went to the church and knelt before the idolatrous representation of his particular saint, praying for her recovery, and promising the saint for his good offices a silver woman. The wife found her health, and the husband redeemed his promis. He gave the saint his silver woman, and the priest who took care of the metallic lady promptly sold it for old silver. Thus the representativ of holiness came into the possession of our friend George Newton (and parenthetically we may state that this is the only way Mr. Newton can ever obtain holiness), who has transferred the milagro, or miracle, to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, whose desk it now ornaments to the great edification of the devil who builds the editorial fire. There are three things peculiar in this transaction, namely, the economy of the husband in fulfilling his promis; the nonchalant promptness of the priest in turning the silver lady over to the iconoclastic jeweler; and the small quantity of woman which it takes to satisfy a saint. If we were a saint and a worshiper promised us a woman, and then brought a small, flat object two inches and a half long by one inch wide in the broadest part, with a cold, metallic glare in its eye, and no ear to speak of, and feet invisible, and a hole in the back-hair to hang her up by, we should not consider that he had filled the contract; and after all, we cannot much blame the priest for casting her into the melting-pot. Mr. Newton complains that the miracle is one of the means by which the priests "gull the gawkies," but it occurs to us that the gawky gulled the saint, "saving his soul and winter pork with the least possible outlay of salt and sanctity"—that is to say, saving his wife with the least possible outlay of silver. In any way you look at it, the transaction is fraudulent.

Letters from Friends.

LA CYGNE, KAN., Feb. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Malachi ii, 11, says: "For Judah has profaned the holiness of the Lord which he loved, and hath married the daughter of a strange god." Who is that strange god, and how many daughters did he hav? Please answer me if you can, and oblige, A subscriber, H. E. BUTTS.

CARIBOU, ME., March 14, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I now propose to write you a few lines upon the subject of Spiritualism. I hav heard and read a good many ghost stories that seemed to me to be well authenticated. Now, what are we going to do about it—believe them, or call everybody a pack of liars? I think we are practically and virtually forced to do one or the other. Or what is the apparition that people see and swear to, if it is not a spirit from the unseen world? Perhaps Mr. Kelso will condescend to respond to the above ideas.

Yours for information, H. H. GILMAN.

NETTLETON, MO., March 12, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed money for subscription and list of books. I consider THE TRUTH SEEKER the best Liberal paper that is published. It is just what we want—the key for unlocking the doors of superstition. The Christians, as they call themselvs, are afraid to read it for fear it will cause the scales to fall from their eyes, as the following will show: One of my neighbors called in the other day—a good Baptist—I got him interested in Heston's cartoons, etc., and wanted him to take papers home with him to read. But, "No." I asked him his reason for not wanting to read Liberal papers. His answer was that he was afraid he might believe them. Respectfully yours, FRED. PAWSEY.

HAMILTON, ONT., March 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL. If there ever was a place under the control of the church, it is this. The population of Hamilton is forty-five thousand. We hav twenty-six churches, five Gospel Temperance Reform Clubs, several Young Men's Christian Associations, and a hell-tearing Salvation Army. Hamilton requires more Secular teachings than any other city in Canada. Mr. Watts sometimes lectures here, but not often enough to do much good. A good lecture once a week would no doubt arouse great interest. The churches of this city fear Mr. Watts as though he was a demon sent from hell. WM. BANGERTH.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M., March 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: C. B. Reynolds, the noted Freethinker and lecturer, delivered a series of lectures at Grant's Opera House, this city, on the evenings of March 2d, 3d, and 4th. He was greeted by large, attentiv, and intelligent audiences, who manifested their approval of his logical reasoning and gems of wit by hearty and frequent applause. One of the pleasant and encouraging features of his visit was the vast amount of Liberal literature which he disposed of while in our midst, and he assured the writer that he sold more Liberal works and papers in Albuquerque than in any other town since leaving New York. He has made many friends here who wish him success in his noble undertaking.

J. Q. WILLS.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., March 14, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER should claim the honor of being father or sponsor to Freethought. What a paper it is!—"a perfect gem!" we hear on all sides. Long may they wave, one on the eastern, the other on our western shore. They are the beacon-lights to the orient and to the occident.

The ANNUAL arrived safely. It is perfection itself. Why doesn't Heston issue a book of his pictures? Is he afraid he would immortalize himself? He would, without a doubt. Each one is a volume.

With best wishes for all and for the "white flowers of truth" which they are planting, I am,

Yours for humanity, MARY B. FINCH.

OTO, IOWA, March 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time, and would not do without it. I think it is one of the best papers for the household printed. There is no reading matter that can excel it in aiding comfort, truth, honor, and honesty in the family, and if many of our people that call themselvs Christians would read it and get to understand more about science, and learn that not only a few of their neighbors are Infidels—as they call them, and low, contemptible devils, as is taught in the pulpit—but that our best and smartest men and women are Liberalists, and that every genuin reform and improvement came from that class, it might hav a tendency to soften the hearts of some of the hard-hearted ones until they would use their neighbors better, and perhaps some husbands use their wives and children better. There are plenty that need a little reform in that line. I never yet knew of a person reading your paper that did not become interested, and I shall do what I can to help circulate your paper. E. S. FURGASON.

GRANTFORK, ILL., March 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am a subscriber to your paper, and think it the best in existence for the masses of the people. It should be in every household. Any reader that will giv a fair, impartial judgment of its doctrins cannot help but say it is founded on sound reason and argument, and is killing to superstition and priestcraft. I think I am doing as much for Freethought as any of my size and weight. I hav copies of the paper always on the go; get them back and giv to others. I think there are a lot of former church-members here that will begin to do their own thinking and come to the conclusion that with self-thought, self-reliance, and reason they can see as far into a millstone as any preacher.

Further, Mr. E. A. Stevens, you can consider me a member of the American Secular Union. That is, I cannot do any lecturing, but I can do my part in contributing toward paying for lecturers, and the National Defense Association. You may call on me at any time, and I will respond for the cause all I am able to. ANTON J. KRAFT.

SEWARD, NEB., March 1, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I suppose you hav the letter of Mr. Boyes, giving you an account of Mrs. Freeman's two very successful lectures, and how well pleased the Liberals were, and also of Rev. Mr. Darley's "reply" to her lectures. As Mr. Boyes was absent last Sunday evening when the Rev. Mr. Presson of the Methodist Episcopal church also replied—if reply it could be called—to Mrs. Freeman, I will let you know he did not make one good point against her, and frankly acknowledged that he did not believe in a personal devil; and I hav been told that he does not believe in any hell, save the hells we hav on this earth. I should suppose that his right place in the line of progress was the Unitarian or Universalist camp. It is a little singular that neither of the preachers has offered a word of testimony to show that the Bible is the "book of God," though they call it so. "The world does move," and little by little superstition and bigotry are dying out; ere long the plain statement of Paul, "For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," will be acknowledged as the whole truth of Christianity, and people will find some better way than scolding, cursing, bitter denunciation in the pulpit or out of it, or war to settle their differences of opinion or any other differences. C. M. CLARK.

CENTERVILLE, UTAH, March 6, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I want another copy of Miss Helen H. Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods;" also Colonel Ingersoll's Defense of C. B. Reynolds; also an ANNUAL.

I do not like some of the remarks on Mr. Shoemaker. Has not he the right to tell you to stop his paper if he thinks well to do so? I expect he paid honorably for it as long as he took it. Then why should anyone cast any unpleasant insinuations on him or anyone else, because he does not appear to agree with their opinions? As you well know, there are no two of us alike.

The cartoons I still admire. Mr. Heston must hav taken the preachers' advice and searched the scriptures. I hav some London Freethinkers sent me by my brother; one has a picture of Shamgar the son of Anath, which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox-goad (Judges iii, 31). By thunder, how he must hav swung that ox-goad around and laid those Philistines out right and left! It was a caution! Just think of it—six hundred men! He must hav carried the belt of Israel at that time.

Well, I cannot say much of our holy Zion. It seems you publish letters but seldom about this infernal, beastly, treasonable Mormon humbug. WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

ELKHORN, MONT., Feb. 11, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am at this place the only subscriber to your valuable and interesting paper, which we think one of the grandest reformatory mediums of the present age. But its few supporters here and at all other places where its circulation may be small is largely, if not wholly, due to the indifference or apathy which we as Freethinkers manifest toward our principles and the instrumentalities by which they become generally known and recognized. This I state not theoretically only, but largely from observation and practical tests. For illustration, not long since I gave a lecture, when shortly afterward I had quite a number of calls requesting papers and pamphlets presenting our principles and illustrating our intentions, and as a result I find considerable interest aroused and inquiry prompted. Therefore I ask, Why shall not we, who honor ourselvs as truth seekers according to the glorious privilege of independent thought, and strive to environ our lives with the hallowed influences of resplendent Liberalism, devote more time and attention toward the dissemination of the grandest, purest, and loftiest rules and precepts ever brightened by the eternal orb of endless day? My Liberal friends, I want to ask you a question and from you request a favor. Is it not our duty, a commanding necessity devolving upon us, to spread, defend, and support our claims if we consider them beneficial to humanity? If answered in the affirmativ, then let us unite in sympathy and in effort, that we may more harmoniously perform our work with skill and effect, well knowing that as the legitimate outcome of our teaching we shall be highly appreciated, and duly rewarded for all energies put forth.

REV. H. BANTA.

ODESSA, MO., Feb. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav concluded to write you a friendly letter frankly stating my views concerning Colonel Ingersoll's late departure; I mean his doctrin, "We do as we must." I confess that I am at a loss to see how a great and good man like Colonel Ingersoll; a man who has said so many beautiful, so many sublime, so many wise and useful things, and has said them so eloquently, could hav wandered off onto such untenable ground, ground so incompatible with freedom and Freethought, and so near akin to his hated doctrin, Presbyterianism. If we always do as we must, then, as he says, man is justified; yes, and that, too, without distinction. The thief, the assassin, the incendiary, the murderer, come in for their equal share of justification. The cannibal, the heathen, the pagan, the Christian, the Infidel, and what not are by this doctrin justified, for none can do otherwise than as he does, none can do better than he does, therefore none can be justly accountable for what he does. It is most evident that all human law is useless, is an imposition; all punishment, human or divine, is gross injustice, in the eye of this doctrin. I confess that I cannot see the difference between this doctrin and downright Anarchism. I can't help feeling sorrow that the colonel has drifted off into this untenable ground. I love the colonel. I am not blaming him. I am inclined to think that in this he did as he must, and I feel that I do as I must in differing with him. But I do not always do as I must. I feel quite confident that I am to a considerable extent a free agent. If we are not such, I say again, all punishment is injustice. If you, or the colonel, or anybody else can make this doctrin reasonable to me, I will feel thankful, for I do not like to differ with my friends. I am ready to admit that in view of the laws of heredity and the science of phrenology we must see that we are to a very great extent the slaves of circumstances and environments; still, I think it is in the power of man to make himself quite a free man.

Please find inclosed stamps for two copies of the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1888. W. L. WORLEY.

ROCHESTER, N. H., March 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: My husband just came in with the noble old TRUTH SEEKER, and as I am an invalid, it was thrown in my lap. The first thing of note that met my eye was the Kansas outrage, and when I had read that I was so moved I could hardly control myself. I would like to ask my Freethinking and Liberal-minded brothers and sisters if ignorance and superstition are always going to be uppermost all over our bright and beautiful land, or arc we as Freethinking and Liberal-minded people coming forward to assert our rights? The church will tell us because we are Liberalists and want everybody to hav equal rights we are bloodthirsty Anarchists. God forbid. I saw enough bloodshed in the late Rebellion. All we want is liberty and the right to think and act as we please as long as we do not interfere with other people's rights.

Now, I say let every Liberal-minded person come to the front and express his opinion as every liberty-loving person should, and the churches and Comstock hirelings will soon see we are a people that will not be trodden down.

Brothers and sisters, let us stand by each other and try to encourage one another, for right makes might always, and when any one of you feels discouraged remember you are not alone in the world. Why, bless you, there are people here in Rochester who would take my husband and myself and string us up to the nearest tree if they dared. I would like to hav some good Freethought lectures here to arouse the people to see the error of their ways—as the ministers say. It would be a blessing to society.

The next article that met my eye was: "What Jeremiah Hacker Has Done." If Mr. Hacker has done any good—and I know he has—let him hav a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER and pay him for it; for our good and noble-minded men and women are few, and when they do come to the front let us help them all we can. If I could walk and work as well as I could four weeks ago, I would see what I could do to help Brother Hacker pay for his little home. I will now close, hoping I hav given some discouraged Liberalist a little hope. If there is any sister who would like to correspond with me, I would like to hear from her. MRS. I. A. BROOK.

HOT SPRINGS, ARK., Feb. 23, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber of your very valuable and entertaining paper only for four weeks. I am well pleased with it so far. I hav been a Freethinker since boyhood. First I began to doubt the Bible's being written by inspired men. The next thing was to investigate the other side. The result was, I am a confirmed Infidel. I look upon the Bible as being only the work of man, written and dictated by men for the purpose of ruling and moving masses of people through their most weak and universal organs of the brain, called superstition. To illustrate this idea I will take Moses and Joshua for examples. Everyone who is familiar with the scriptures knows Moses had the good fortune to become a member of the king's household when an infant; that he grew up with all the advantages of an Egyptian education, got an insight into state and church matters, and, in fact, developed into a very smart and ambitious man for his day and time. He put up a job on Pharaoh; preyed on the imagination, superstition, and ignorance of his brethren; got them out of bondage, and set up a little kingdom of his own. I say, Well done for Moses! I do not blame him one bit. Anyone would like to be king or monarch. Ambition prompts men to strike for something high in life. My idea is that in this respect human nature has been the same in all ages.

Next to Moses comes Joshua, a regular fire-eater, on the war-path as soon as old Moses was dead. I take it for granted Moses got too old and feeble to fight much along toward the last, and, as war was another one of the Jews' weak points at that time, how natural it was for Joshua to take advantage of it along with their superstition, cross the Jordan, murder, steal, and put to rout the Amorites and Canaanites! A regular Napoleon Bonaparte was Joshua. He made those people believe God commanded him to do those things, otherwise I believe some one would hav said, "Let's don't." If the God of the olden time commanded such things to be done, I am proud to know he has reformed. The Christians all say he is like a father to his children now; doesn't show any partiality either. He doesn't make the sun stand still, or hand down any more laws written on stone, in our day and time. It would be rather annoying in haying-time to hav every farmer in the country yelling up to heaven: "Sun, stand thou still upon America until I get this hay crop gathered!"

Well, enough on this score. My idea is this—the origin of man is a mystery no one can solve. All that has been written on the subject is merely conjecture. In regard to the future state of the human race, to my mind this much is clear: When we die life ceases. Our bodies molder into dust, and become a part of Mother Earth and the natural forces that control it. This much I can comprehend. For me to view it in any other light is merely guess-work or freaks of fancy. I sometimes hope for immortality of the soul. What evidence hav I? None. I cannot believe in something if I cannot find any evidence on the subject. Who could prove in court there is a heaven or a hell, witnesses all being duly sworn? I fear a close cross-examination wouldn't locate either place. JAMES L. BEERY.

INDIAN GROVE, MO., Feb. 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am an avowed Agnostic or Infidel. This has been my creed for the last ten years. I read the Investigator, but like THE TRUTH SEEKER best. However, I don't think much of those cartoons. I am opposed to intolerance, Secular as well as orthodox. I stand on the broadest Liberal platform, and am willing to accord to others the privileges claimed for myself. Burlesque, sophistry, sarcasm, invectiv, and social ostracism are the arguments used all along the line of the orthodox ranks. I believe in a truthful, candid, and logical exposition of theological dogmas.

Some time ago I heard a certain Bible-pounder by the name of Bell, of the Methodist persuasion, deliver his first address at the beginning of the conference year. Among other things, he said: "What kind of a man is our preacher? Is he a perfect specimen of moral excellence, an exemplary man in faith and practice? If he is not, he is not a proper man to be a leader of the people." Some time subsequently I heard this same fellow preaching at the same place, where he wished to pose as a leader of the people, and before he had fairly got through his preliminaries, which consisted chiefly in passing the contribution-box, into which the writer cast his mite with the rest, he turned himself loose on Infidels, saying that he would not want an Infidel to come into his house; that an Infidel was not good enough to eat with hogs. From this you see how he would direct the faithful to treat unbelievers. This same Mr. Bell was seen reading THE TRUTH SEEKER in a store at Salisbury, Mo.; and, when asked where he got it, said that he found it. However, it was ascertained upon inquiry that no one of THE TRUTH SEEKER family in Salisbury had lost his paper.

MR. EDITOR: That sturdy Freethought veteran, C. B. Reynolds, has just favored us with a visit, and the bowels of orthodoxy are troubled in consequence. Heretofore the itinerant pulpit-pounders, of the various Christian creeds, hav made this a favorit winter resort. The ranchmen and cowboys who make up our population are noted for their generosity, and their latchstrings are always on the outside. Black-coated preachers and blue-shirted miners are equally welcome. Such being the case, the former class had secured a preëmption right on this place as a winter feeding-ground. They gave us an occasional sermon for continual grub—spiritual nourishment for physical refreshment, as it were. They had organized a puny church, and from that coign of vantage raided the surrounding country. The chief article of their creed was: "Salvation is free, but you must put up your cash continually to make it free. The Lord loveth a cheerful giver, bless his holy name." The advent of Mr. Reynolds was like that of an unbidden guest at the banquet. They didn't hav a seat for him. In fact, they got out of the country like snakes from a burning brush-pile. And during his four lectures here, neither the love of the Lord nor the fear of the devil could get them within a mile of the place of meeting. It is well, perhaps, for their peace of mind that they kept away, for the Infidel handled the clergy without gloves, and his arguments fell like the blows of a broadsword. No sooner had Mr. Reynolds gone his way than the frightened priests crawled from their holes, and met in solemn conclave to devise means to counteract the good work which he had inaugurated. What! do away with the devil, and shut up the gates of hell! That would never do, for we preachers would hav to go to work, or starve. After a long and painful deliberation, it was decided to send for a noted evangelist and start a new revival. This has been done, and at present night is made hideous by the rantings of that idiotic mob.

At our neighboring town of Delta Mr. Reynolds delivered a course of lectures, an admission fee being charged for the last one, the proceeds of which were given to a poor widow. On the following night Judge Gerry delivered a lecture for the benefit of the Presbyterian church, the proceeds of which were to be applied to purchase a new organ for that denomination. The former lecture netted by far the greater amount. Comment is unnecessary. PIONEER.

BOULDER CITY, MONT., Feb. 20, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: In the summer of 1881 I fell into possession of a number of books and pamphlets containing discussions of various kinds. About the first volume that I took up for examination happened to be one entitled, "The Humphrey-Bennett Debate." Well, I read the book through quite hurriedly, after which I changed my abiding-place, leaving the books behind, and hav not been able to find them since. I remember, however, a very silly argument adduced by Rev. Mr. Humphrey which I purpose to show the foolishness of. The nonsensical item to which I refer was penned by the clerical fellow when he endeavored to prove the divinity of the Bible. I cannot use his exact language from memory, but will giv the substance of it. He claimed, for instance, that the size of the scriptures was a perfect evidence of its divine origin, "because," said he, "the Bible is not so large that one caunot carry it around in one's pocket, neither is it so very small as not to be able to contain information relativ to the origin of all things, man's duty here below, and be a guide to eternal salvation." Now, if Mr. Humphrey had read the Bible a little more understandingly he should certainly hav noticed that that volume mentions many books which it does not contain, and furthermore that it commands to be read in churches some of the books mentioned but not found in that unique jumble. Here is one: "And when this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans and that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea" (Col. iv). That epistle, mark you, is not found in the "saintly pages." Again: "And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people, and they said, All that the Lord hath said will we do and be obedient" (Ex. xxiv). Still more: "Wherefore it is said in the book of the wars of the Lord what he did in the Red sea and in the brooks of Arnon" (Num. xxi). Read on: "And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselvs upon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher?" (Josh. x).

Humphrey's argument becomes rasher and rasher,
When we inquire, Where, oh, where's the book of Jasher?

Then again: "Now the acts of David the king, first and last, behold, they are written in the book of Samuel the seer, and in the book of Nathan the prophet, and in the book of Gad the seer" (1 Chron. xxix). A few more: "Now the acts of Rehoboam, first and last, are they not written in the book of Shemaiah the prophet and of Iddo the seer, concerning genealogies? And there were wars between Rehoboam and Jeroboam continually" (2 Chron. xii). "Now the rest of the acts of Jehosaphat, first and last, behold they are written in the book of Jehu the son of Hananion who is mentioned in the book of the kings of Israel" (2 Chron. xx). I could cite many more instances to show that if the Bible were all together one could scarcely wheel it around in a wheelbarrow.

Sincerely, M. G. MACAULAY.

WEST UNION, O., Feb. 27, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I attended church here a short time ago, and heard the Rev. Chas. Luck make and affirm some statements that do not agree with authentic history: 1. That Voltaire's last words were, "Crush the wretch" (meaning Christ); 2. That "all the brainy men were believers in Christ"—meaning Jefferson, Webster, Franklin, and others.

In answer to the first statement I will refer the reader to the American Cyclopedia, Vol. XVI, pp. 406-7, and will quote the exact words: "He [Voltaire] delighted in spending his fortune in the improvement of his property, in constructing better habitations for the poor laborers, in befriending indigent literary men, and in entertaining the host of friends attracted by his fame. Nothing gave him greater celebrity than his efforts in behalf of oppressed Protestants. He even built a church at Ferney, which he dedicated to God, but which the ecclesiastical authorities refused to recognize and consecrate." Page 407: "At Paris his carriage was drawn by the people; his rooms were crowded with the grandees of politics, society, and letters from morning to night, and his visits to the theaters were ovations in which he was crowned with laurels and roses, and all the arts conspired to do him homage. Among his last words were these: 'I die worshiping God, loving my friends, not hating my enemies, but detesting superstition.'" In the name of common sense, let me ask, what was wrong with that kind of a life? Will the clergy never stop robbing the great thinkers of their just dues and the grave of its sacred dead?

2. The same authority (American Cyclopedia) says of Franklin (Vol. VII, p. 435): "He had read Shaftesbury and Collins, and becoming a skeptic at the age of sixteen, he applied himself to skilful devices of argumentation gathered from the 'Memorabilia,' practiced them as exercise in conversation, and often defeated antagonists whose cause and understanding were, as he afterward confessed, deserving of the victory." Speaking of Jefferson, the same authority (Vol. IX, p. 595) says: "He carried the order of subjecting everything to the test of abstract reason in matters of religion, venerating the moral character of Christ, but refusing belief in his divine mission." What has been said of Voltaire, Franklin, and Jefferson can truthfully be said of Washington, Lincoln, and many other "brainy men" too numerous to mention in the empyrean of statesmanship; while in the world of science and literature the doubters embrace the majority of the "brainy men." To make this assertion good, we need only refer the reader to Huxley, of England; Max Müller, of Germany; Dr. Réville, of France, and Proctor, of America—the most learned men living in the world to-day. Then, there were Bruno, Galileo, Shakspere, Goethe, Pope, Byron, Burns, Schiller, Darwin, Tyndall, Ingersoll, Bradlaugh. Doubt is the mother of investigation, and honest investigation is the true road to wisdom. When one is confident of a truth, or conscious of a fact, the best proof of sincerity is a cordial invitation to the test. My motto is:

Accept the truth, wherever found,
On heathen or on Christian ground.

On the Tuesday night following the assertions made by the sky-pilot above referred to, after being driven into the last ditch, and finding his little squibs falling harmlessly and fruitlessly to the ground, he attempted to cover his defeat by heaping abuse and contumely on the head of the writer, forgetting that abuse would not fill the place of argument. He exclaimed with terrible emphasis: "By the eternal gods! I am here, and will hold the fort—die or kill somebody!" He abused the writer and others for speaking their sentiments on the street, in the grocery, and also for reading the New York TRUTH SEEKER—just as though I ought to ask him or anyone else what I should read. Where did he get his right to hav his say, and how did I lose mine?

They hav shut themselvs up in their coward's castle and refused to accept challenge after challenge, well knowing the weakness of their position and of their weapons; hence it becomes the duty of all the true soldiers of Secularism to follow them into their castle, drive them to the ramparts, and hurl them from the battlements to a swift destruction.

The grim destroyer of superstition has been found, the great Archimedean lever has been discovered—viz., the printing-press; and the fulcrum on which the lever rests, while it is moving us onward with such giant strides, is the brains of the doubters of the world, living and dead, who hav done so much to redeem us from the fagot, thumbscrew, rack, and dungeon, auxiliaries used by the church with relentless hand while she had the power. And it must be remembered that the church which is claiming to-day to be the salt of the earth, the light of the world, the friend of humanity, and the harbinger of peace to the world, is the very same church that deluged the earth with blood, burnt Bruno at the stake for teaching the rotundity of the earth, persecuted the thinkers of all other beliefs, and where she had the power burnt men and women at the stake for witchcraft, and in her blindness attempted to destroy the printing-press, and said Benjamin Franklin was crazy when he bottled the lightning.

In fine, we are indebted to the church for nothing that tends to make life useful, comfortable, and happy; while, on the other hand, what has been accomplished has been in the teeth of the most bitter opposition and persecution that could be invented by a fanatical and bloodthirsty priesthood. For an example of fiendishness, unequaled even among savages, I will refer the reader to Chitty's Blackstone, Vol. II, Book 4, p. 312—a barbarity which methinks could only be learned from examples laid down in "that holy book called the Bible," Num. xxxi, 17; Judges xxi, 11; Gen. xxxviii and xxxix. I imagin that the priesthood must look back with a longing, yearning desire for the return of the good old days of yore when their word was law, and men were compelled to obey or suffer persecution and death. R. J. WILSON.

ELBA, O., March 15, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: This community has been afflicted with a disaster in the shape of a Methodist revival. When we received the copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER contaiuing Heston's representation of "howling Methodists," we wondered how he could picture our meeting without seeing it. Were you with us in disguise, Mr. Heston? For a number of years the Methodist preachers sent to this place to preach the beauties of an eternal hell hav been quite commonplace in comparison with the young man here at present, judged, I may add, by their success in producing monomaniacs. Those who hav never witnessed the scenes of a Methodist revival in a rural district, where educational advantages are not the best, caunot form a correct idea of the performance without seeing it. A glance at a "mourners' bench," with a dozen "mourners" kneeling there, with the old women and old fogies of the congregation howling in their ears, and all together making a noise similar to that described by Dr. Sunderland in his Cape Cod experience, would make you laugh, but if you should watch them night after night your sympathy for these misguided beings would bring a cloud of sadness upon you.

It is said that a love of the marvelous is characteristic of the masses, and the imagination is constautly endeavoring to break away from the ties which bind it to reason, yet it is astonishing that such false ideas and illusions wield so great an influence in this day and age of the world. Intelligence and education are obstacles in the path of the revivalist, but superstitious ideas that hav been instilled into people for ages work a silent influence that is difficult to overcome. If we could apply the millions of dollars that are used to propagate error to Secular education and teaching the truths of Liberalism, we could guarantee a higher civilization in the near future. Christian dogmas are degrading in their tendency. Teach a child that he is depraved and that there is no good in him, and he will not feel under obligations to be very good. Teach men that a crime may be atoned for by shifting the burden upon some other being, and they are not apt to be so careful what they do.

Christians tell us that if they are wrong, they are as well off as we are anyway. They do not stop to consider what a paradise we might hav here if their efforts were directed to that end.

A Methodist revival makes one feel that the world is retrograding, but in spite of the vast influence of Christianity the world is advancing. At least, let us hope that Liberal influence will eventually destroy the superstitious ideas of even a Methodist community.

We hav a few outspoken Liberals here now, but it will be slow work for them to substitute the truths of Liberalism for the general superstition. The people must be prepared for it, and the process is that of evolution, which is necessarily slow. The people must first be able to understand that the result of believing and acting a certain way is the same whether what is believed is true or false.

We expect J. E. Remsburg here some time this spring. One of our church-members, who considers himself the leader of the church to which he belongs, told the preacher that a few years ago he and another member, now deceased, were called to the bedside of one of our substantial citizens to offer a prayer to our unchangeable God for the beuefit of this alleged dying man's soul. The preacher mentioned the circumstance from his pulpit as another example of the horribleness of Infidel deathbeds. The citizen heard of the story, brought the parties together, and asked the church-member before the preacher if he had told such a story. He answered, Yes, but acknowledged there was no foundation for the story. At another time the preacher was repeating the story of Ingersoll's daughter joining the Presbyterian church, when he was handed Ingersoll's "Truth of History." You may imagin the effect produced.

When such stories as these are told and believed about people right among us, is it any wonder that people believe such tales about dead men?

We like Heston's pictures. Those in the last TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL are excellent. We will get several new subscribers here, and send their names this month.

Yours truly, AGNOSTIC.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

We Float No Other Flag.

The entire people of this country are under the protection of the government represented by the stars and stripes, and by none other.—Lowell Morning Mail.

The flag that floats upon our forts,
That sails upon our seas;
The flag that fights for freemen's rights,
Giv only to the breeze.
That flag protects our ships and ports,
That flag flies o'er our camps and courts,
Before it falsehood flees,
Beneath lie liberties,
Behind, its shadow frees,
Above stream heaven's honest lights.

Chorus:
We float, we float no other flag;
The stars and stripes are freedom's types,
Away, each paltry party rag!
For freedom's types are stars and stripes,
We float no other flag.

Let all who Lincoln's legend quote*
Learn well the sense it bears;
Let all who see our land so free
Throw off all foreign cares.
Let all who cast a freeman's vote,
Let all who note the flag we float,
Before no banner flare;
Behind no other dare;
Beneath, no false-face wear;
Above but heaven's arches be.

Chorus: We float, we float no other flag, etc.

That flag at home spread to the winds,
Unfurl it on our school;
That honored sheet bear through our street,
It marks our manly rule.
That flag ensigns our claim for minds,
That flag to truth and justice binds;
Before it priestcraft fails;
Behind it reason hails;
Beneath it treason quails;
Above, storms on it harmless beat.

Chorus: We float, we float no other flag, etc.

The people's Union stands for all
Who walk Columbia's sod,
The people's vote that Reason wrote,
And Right our only god.
The people's voice a potent call,
The people's flag shall never fall;
Before, giv not a rod;
Behind, our fathers trod;
Beneath is freedom's sod;
Above, the clouds alone shall float.

Chorus:
We float, we float no other flag;
The stars and stripes are freedom's types,
Away, each paltry party rag!
For freedom's types are stars and stripes,
We float no other flag. JOAN P. GUILD.

* To the end that a government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.—A. Lincoln.

My Visit to India.

I had returned from my trip to India, and was comfortably rested after my great fatigue.

One evening the Coleman children came rushing into my study and requested a story.

"A story, auntie," said Charley, "and let it be about India."

"Well, if I must, I must," said I. And to begin at the beginning, I embarked with Captain Sherman in his fast-sailing craft the Mary Ann and set sail for India. The weather was delightful with the exception of one night, when we encountered a brisk gale, but the wind was generally fair, so that we went right along. One evening the captain called me to come on deck, saying he wanted to show me something fine.

"Now, Miss White, just look at the ocean. Did you ever see anything equal to that?" and the captain's eyes sparkled with genuin admiration.

Truly, I never did. As far as the eye could reach, one could see what seemed like wavy flame and fire. I never before saw anything so lovely. The ocean was like a sea of gold, and leaping and dancing jets of yellow light played on every billowy wave.

"What is it, captain?" I inquired.

"I'll tell you, Miss White," and the jolly old man laughed at my look of wonder and admiration. "The inhabitants of the vasty deep are having a high old political jubilee to-night. Yes, ma'am, the fishes are out on a racket, and old Neptune is giving 'em an electric light illumination."

"Science would not say that, captain," said I, quite willing to display my learning. "It is a phosphorescent light coming from big and little fishes and other marine creatures. Only when the atmosphere is in a peculiar condition can this display be seen. Ahem!"

"Yes, madam; no doubt you are right, but the political meeting may be going on all the same, you know." And the captain tucked a huge quid of tobacco inside his cheek, and walked away.

"Do big fishes eat the little ones?" inquired Charley.

"Certainly," replied I; "or else the water would soon be swarming and overstocked, and navigation would be obstructed, for fishes are very prolific and hav large families."

We arrived in Madras, and shortly after we cast anchor, my friends came on board, and were very glad to see me. They were Mr. and Mrs. Preston, and their only child, Annie, about twelve years old. Mr. Preston's bachelor brother, Uncle Alick, and Annie's nurse, Tamsee, came with them. I was glad to set my feet once more on the solid earth, although it was a strange and foreign land. The streets were full of people, busy, gesticulating, and jabbering in a dozen different languages. Just ahead of us was an Arab with a long line of camels laden with valuable goods—silks, spices, drugs, and sandalwood. After getting rid of this merchandise, he will giv his camels all the water, beans, and straw they want, and then he will start for the Mohammedan quarters, where he has friends. Mr. Preston knew this Arab very well. Presently I saw some elephants walking along, sedately enough. It seemed to me all nations were represented. A great many carried parasols of white calico. A little way on I noticed a queer-looking man on his knees in front of a big basket, playing on some sort of instrument like a flute. The man's cheeks were puffed out, his eyes dilated, and the tunes he played reminded one of Freda Frink. Presently he opened the basket, and out popped a dozen serpents. They began dancing and hopping about the man. "Good Lord!" I exclaimed.

"It is a snake-charmer," said Mr. Preston. "Don't be afraid."

I hate snakes, so we hastened on, and soon arrived at Mr. Preston's home, where I removed my hat, and was told to get in a hammock. I did so, and was at once surrounded by Indian servants; one bathed my aching head, while another gently fanned me, and still another brought me a delicious sherbet. Tamsee took little Annie to her own room, and gave her a bath of perfumed water.

The next morning I arose quite refreshed, and took a walk through the gardens. Tamsee went with me. There were pomegranate blossoms, the passion-flower, jessamine, and the largest carnations I ever saw, and beautiful, mellow fruit on all sides.

Tamsee was a ventriloquist, and was not afraid of snakes. She had collected a large number of insects, and Annie had a pretty little museum of curiosities in that line.

"Did you go to Bengal?" inquired Bertha.

"I did not, for they said that is one of the hottest places on earth, and it was hot enough in all conscience at Madras."

In Mr. Preston's house they had what is called a punka. It is like a big fan, whirling round and round, thus keeping the air in motion and cool. They wring sheets out in cold water and stretch them on wires in the rooms, and that makes the air cool and nice. The people eat a good deal of rice, eggs, and fruit. They also eat curry. I don't know how it is made, but it is very hot with red pepper, and the hotter the weather the more red pepper goes into their bodies.

When Annie was twelve years old, which occurred while I was there, she had a grand party.

Correspondence.

GRANTFORK, ILL., March 27, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: You were so kind as to publish my brother's letter; I hope you will see fit to publish this. I would like the girls that appear in the Children's Corner to correspond with me. I am twelve years old. I go to school every day. I like to read the letters from children. My mamma sowed some seeds in the hot-bed and they are up already and are growing nicely. We hav an organ and a guitar. My sister plays the organ and I play the guitar. I hav three brothers and four sisters. My letter is long enough for the first time. I remain,

Yours and the children's friend,
EMMA B. KRAFT.

OAK MILLS, KAN., March 30, 288.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I was glad to learn that Miss Maude M. Morrison had established a fund for the relief of that brave old worker, Father Hacker. She paid a noble tribute to him, and I agree with her in everything she said of him, and will do my best toward raising the fund. If it is but little, I think it will help some, and I think if everybody follows Miss Maude's example, we can help Father Hacker considerably. He has been a lifelong worker for the advancement of humanity, and now, although an old man, he uses his pen with courage and energy. I hav heard enough of Father Hacker to know that he is an honest, kind, and charitable old man; that his life has been devoted to the advancement of a good cause, and for this he deserves the respect and gratitude of everybody. His life and examples are worthy of imitation by all, and the good work he has done will never be forgotten. Wake up, everybody, and help the good old man all you can; I know he will thank you, and love you till death finally calls him away. With three cheers for Father Hacker, and best wishes to the Children's Corner and its brave editor, I remain, Faithfully, GEO. J. REMSBURG.

STRASBURG, ILL., March 12, 1888.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: My papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for seven years. I like to read the Children's Corner, so I thought I would write to you. I am twelve years old. Our school closed last Friday; we intended to hav an exhibition at night, but the Methodists tried to get up a protracted meeting in the school-house, and we gave up to them and practiced our pieces at home and in the blacksmith-shop. Friday morning, the teacher concluded to hav school another week in order to hav the pieces better prepared, not thinking that the school-house would be wanted for church purposes next week; but, about noon, four female "captains" of the Salvation Army came in and wanted to know why school was to continue another week, when they wanted the school-house. The four captains furnished only one scholar. I would like to correspond with some little girl or boy about my own age. As this is my first letter, I will close, hoping to see this in print.

From your friend, PEARL YORK.

S. AOWORTH, N. H., March 18, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav never seen any letters from this part of the country, I thought I would write a few lines. I am eleven years old. I go to school all the time when school keeps. It is not keeping now. School will commence again about the 1st of May. Last year I went to school twenty-four weeks. I had to go two miles and a half, but a new school-house will be built this summer and then I shall hav to go only one mile and a half. I like to read the Children's Corner and the letters from the boys and girls. I hav the "Story Hour" and the four volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World." My father has all the rest of D. M. Bennett's books and all of Aunt Elmina's and Colonel Kelso's and Remsburg's, besides several others. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER eight years. I like to look at the pictures; some of them are very funny. We hav just had the most severe snow-storm that was ever known in this part of the country. Nearly three feet of snow fell, and the wind blew a gale; the roads and railroads were all blockaded; no mails were received for four days, though we should hav had three every day. This is my first letter to a paper. If this is worth printing, I will write again some time.

From your friend, JAY C. ALLAN.

CHICAGO, ILL., April 9, 1888.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Mr. E. A. Stevens read your letter before the Society at our meeting last Thursday night, and, as a mark of appreciation for your interest in our behalf, we tendered you our hearty vote of thanks, and would like to hav an announcement of our organization made in the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

It is not likely we will be able to start the Sunday science school for about two weeks, as it will take us till the 1st of May to get our young people's Secular Mutual Improvement Society on a good working basis. We intend to hav a regular Secular debating and musical society, and, to judge by our enthusiasm, it will be a first-class one. We organized on the 1st of April, and hav now a membership of twenty-five, which number, by the 1st of May, will certainly be nearly doubled.

We meet for our debating society every Wednesday evening. Trusting to be able to mail you a copy of our constitution and by-laws in a short time, we are,

Respectfully yours,
341 Hudson ave. R. J. MIDGELY, Sec.

[It is with great pleasure we note the opening of the first Secular Mutual Improvement Society of Chicago. It is bound to be a success—of that we may be sure. We extend hearty greetings and earnest congratulation, and shall watch eagerly for the announcement of the first meeting of the Sunday science school, a most important and valuable adjunct to the S. M. I. S.—ED. C. C.]

CATHARINE C.—There is no better or more instructiv book that you can put into the hands of your children than Mrs. Slenker's "Little Lessons." Every page contains valuable information that will remain with the children as long as they liv. Her other books are good and instructiv. "John's Way," "The Handsomest Woman," "The Darwins," are all excellent reading, and entirely free from the taint of superstition.—ED. C. C.

One Thing at a Time.

A little boy while playing fell down the steps and hurt himself severely. His mother scolded him for his carelessness, and he sobbed out: "Mamma, please don't scold me till I get done hurting."

He Appreciated Them.

Little Charlie was visiting at his three old maid aunties, and one night they had damson preserves for supper. As Charlie smacked his lips and passed up his plate for more, he remarked, "I'm very fond of preserved damsels."

The Confectionery of India.

All kinds of India sweetmeats are made of brown sugar, many of them molded into various shapes of birds and beasts. Tubes also are made, filled with honey, and twisted into various forms. Then, there are balls of sugar and clarified butter. These confectioneries are soft and melt in the mouth. Those made by the higher caste differ from those made by the lower, so absolute are the laws of caste.

An African Mocking-bird.

A Kaffir vanished, and groans were heard. He was searched for without result, but on the following night groans were still heard. The search continued, and the man was found murdered. His murderer was arrested and executed, but the groans still continued, to the dismay of their auditors. At last they were traced to a mocking-bird. That bird alone of living things had seen the deed of blood, and now from day to day reproduced the piteous moaning of its victim.

Profane Jokes.

Here is a story about a little lady over three. She is, or rather has been, unwell. "Come, now, you must eat something; what would you like? Tell me and you shall hav it." Says baby, after a pause: "An angel's egg." Near baby's bed there was a picture of a lady with wings.

A teacher in a Sabbath-school was speaking to his class of the miracle of Jonah in the whale's belly. After exciting the wonder of the children by the narrativ, he said, "Could any of you imagin a miracle more wonderful than that?" "Yes, sir," said a precocious little fellow, shaking his head vigorously. "What?" said the teacher. "A whale in Jonah's belly," was the reply.—The Freethinker.

IN A PHILADELPHIA SUNDAY-SCHOOL.—Teacher: "Now, children, I am going to tell you about the prophet Daniel, who, though cast into a den of lions——" New scholar (fresh from New York): "Hav you only just got onto that here?"

OLD lady (to grocer's boy): "Don't you know, boy, that it is very rude to whistle when dealing with a lady?" Boy: "That's what the boss told me to do, mum." Old lady: "Told you to whistle?" Boy: "Yes'm. He said if we ever sold you anything we'd hav to whistle for the money."

LITTLE PHILIP'S SCHOLARSHIP.—Philip, who is seven years old, is proud of his standing at school. "Well," said his uncle, who had heard the boy speak rather delightedly about his school triumphs, "what is your relativ rank in your class?"

"I—I don't know what you mean, uncle."

"Why, I mean, where do you stand in your classes?"

"Oh, in the reading class I stand on the crack just in front of the big desk, and in the 'rithmetic class I don't stand at all, 'cos we just sit on the recitation bench."

Reminiscences of a Preacher,

A RADICAL ROMANCE.

By WILLIAM McDONNELL,

Author of "Exeter Hall," "Heathens of the Heath," "Family Creeds," "Beautiful Snow," etc., etc.

The story is used by the author to teach Freethought, to remove superstition from the minds of those who would not read a polemical essay, and to urge facts against the various churches, believing which their supporters will desert them. The book is an argument as well as a novel, but the serious predicaments of the hero are skilfully used to lure the reader along, and to induce him to take the antidote to theological poisoning without knowing it. Mr. McDonnell writes effectivly and convincingly, and always braces his romances with facts on one side and figures on the other. Those who hav read his previous works need not be advised to purchase this; they will probably do so at once.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. That Badger Boy At Sunday-School.

THE LESSON OF JACOB AND ESAU.

"Now, my dear children," said the teacher, "I will read you the interesting story of Jacob and Esau, the twin brothers, you know;" and she read the romance, discreetly skipping those passages that are to be read only in well-regulated and adult Christian circles, wherein saints Colgate and Comstock are shining lights, that Badger boy then setting his buzz saw in motion, as it were, that he might cut out solid chunks of information for a later day in life.

"What's a birthrite, mum? Is it anything like a birthday or birthmark, mum?"

"Anything like a birthmark? Why, you silly boy, no—the idea! A birthright is—is—er—well, a birthright is—er—something you are not old enough to understand, James."

"Yes'm. What did the kid see, mum, that they called him Hesaw for?"

"They didn't call him Hesaw, you stupid, but Esau—E-s-a-u—understand?"

"Yes'm. Was he all over hair, like a gote, mum?"

"Something like, I suppose, dear."

"Yes'm. The old man liked him 'cos he cood shoot bucks and giv the old duffer lots of ven'son, didn't he, mum?"

"James Badger, you must not talk that way of the ever living and saintly Isaac!"

"No'm. Ain't he dead yet, mum—Ike?"

"In the flesh, yes, but not in the spirit, James."

"No'm. But he's too dead to eat ven'son, ain't he, mum?"

"James Badger!"

"Yes'm. The old woman was cute, when she played off that smooth-faced sharp for the hairy-faced hunter, by stickin' gote skin onto him, warn't she, mum?"

"Y-e-s, she—well, you know she was very fond of Jacob——"

"Yes'm. But the old man smelt a mice when the second hairy cuss come in for a blessin', didn't he, mum?"

"Yes; poor, blind Isaac! he thought it strange, James, and no wonder."

"Yes'm. That Jake was a snide for doin' such a mean trick, if the old woman did want him to, warn't he, mum?"

"Oh, you mustn't talk so of dear Jacob, for he was beloved of the Lord!"

"No'm. Did the Lord love skins and sharps, mum—mean cusses and beats, I mean, mum."

"James Badger, you're awful!"

"No'm. Didn't that Jake beat Eser outen his birthrite when he ketched him all done up and hungry for grub, and only giv him a bowl of porrige for it?"

"You boy, Esau was willing to sell it, and Jacob bought it."

"Yes'm. But it was a dead skin, all the same, mum!"

"If you don't stop talking that way I'll send you right home, James Badger!"

"No'm—please don't, 'cos I shoodn't see your lovely obbun hare, mum."

"Oh, you James Badger, you are learning young to flatter!"

"Yes'm. What's flatter, mum? I gess I know, 'cos pop told ma his wallet was flatter'n a pancake, this mornin'."

"Dear me! You are so funny, James."

"Yes'm. How Esar squealed to the old man about Jake's beatin' him outen his birthrite and the old cock's blessin', didn't he, mum? And I don't blame him—I'd a busted the snoozer in the eye, if he was my bruther, you bet!"

"James, James, that's awful talk for Sunday-school! Don't, dear."

"No'm. I don't go much onto the old duffer, Ike, 'cos he'd orter called Jake in and giv him a layin' out, and took back the blessin' and giv it to Eso, 'cos Jake plade it onto him so; don't you think so, mum?"

"Oh, you mustn't ask me, James. Jacob was in God's hands, and grew to be great in the Lord, you know."

"Huh!—what for, mum? 'Cos he was a skin and dead-beat? He makes me tired. How he skinned old Labe, his unc——"

"And served him just right, the idolator!"

"Yes'm. Was them brass gods that one of Jake's wives stole from her pop, mum?"

"Yes, they were—horrid brass idols, dear!"

"Yes'm. Is brass gods N.G., mum?"

"Brass gods are nothing but brass, you boy—images, that's all!"

"Yes'm. How she fooled pop, when he come nosin' round after his lost gods, didn't she, mum?"

"Yes, she did; I glory in her for that!"

"Yes'm. Ain't brass wuth sumthin', mum? And didn't she steal brass?"

"No, she didn't—not when it was made up into horrid gods, you heathen boy, you!"

"No'm. Old Labe was a fly old fake, too, wasn't he, mum? How he fooled Jake on the rong gal, and got seven years more work outen him for the uther—bully for Labe!"

"James Badger, you stop, now!"

"Yes'm. Ain't brass gods, that you can see and feel and know where they are all the time, mum, jest as good as invisible gods that you can't?"

"You James Madison Badger, you blasphemous little wretch——"

"What's blasfimus——"

"You go straight home this minute! You are perfectly shocking! The class is dismissed." And thus terminated the Jacob and Esau séance. SI SLOKUM.

RATIONAL COMMUNISM.

The Present and the Future Republic of North America.

BY A CAPITALIST.

A book advocating associate life as a remedy for poverty, vice, and crime. It deals with the present conditions of society in this country, pointing out their imperfections, and showing how it is almost impossible that the people should be other than poor and vicious under our present system. The remedy, the author thinks, is in communal life, and he has drawn a vivid picture of the future Republic of North America, as it will be when society shall be organized on the principles of Rational Communism. The book is vigorously and interestingly written.

A SPLENDID WORK.

Mr. Charles Eckhard, treasurer of the American Secular Union, has published

THE NINE DEMANDS

in a more attractiv form than any in which they hav previously appeared. At the head of an engraving on heavy plate paper, 24x19 inches, are the cabinet-sized likenesses of JEFFERSON, WASHINGTON, and PAINE, the Fathers of our Republic. At the sides are FRANKLIN and JOHN ADAMS, and between these two are printed the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union in conspicuous type. At the foot are LAFAYETTE, GIRARD, and INGERSOLL, making eight likenesses in all. Inscribed beneath each portrait is some radical sentiment quoted from the author pictured over it. In the space between the portraits and around them are arabesques of vines and flowers in profusion, and the panel inclosing the Nine Demands is surmounted on each corner by Mr. Eckhard's design of the flag above the cross. The whole makes an exceedingly handsome work for framing. The artistic part is equal to the best, and the portraits are as true to nature as the photographs from which they were transferred. The design will be sent postpaid by mail for $1 by

ARGUMENT

BY

Robert G. Ingersoll,

IN THE

TRIAL OF C. B. REYNOLDS

FOR

"BLASPHEMY,"

AT MORRISTOWN, NEW JERSEY.

Stenographically reported, and revised by the author.

Handsome 8vo, 86 pp., beautiful type, fine paper. Price, cloth, 50 cents; paper, 25 cents, or $2 per dozen.

In this argument Mr. Ingersoll again shows his great forensic powers. All his heart and brain are in it. It is one of his greatest productions. It is in his chosen field of intellectual combat, and we see him as the splendid champion of human liberty and the rights of man. His love of freedom and justice, hatred of tyranny and chains, sympathy for the oppressed, misguided, and enthralled, his courage and candor, hav in this Argument full scope of expression, and he makes grand use of the opportunity. Such a flood of light—of eloquence, legal learning, logic, pathos, poetry, and patriotism—is not often poured out in a court of justice.

The many calls for this Argument in complete and accurate shape hav led to this publication, as revised by Mr. Ingersoll himself. All other publications are the merest fictions—reprints from meager and misleading newspaper references.

Lawyers and advocates will find this the model of an address to a jury; statesmen and politicians a clear exposition of Constitutional rights and powers; and intelligent, patriotic, and free men and women everywhere, a Magna Charta of their rights.

THE community receives intelligence that a million or more Chinamen hav been killed by an earthquake, and is shocked almost as severely as if an American pugilist had lost a fight with a foreigner. There is altogether too much misery in China for the people of the United States to worry at the loss of a few hundred thousand lives. Sufferers from the Yellow river floods had our sympathy, of course, but not our money. Perhaps it has been spent—and perhaps not ill-spent—in supporting the missionaries of four denominations in remote corners of the earth. What ho! Without there! Sunday-school superintendents for another hundred million Chinamen! Clothing and food, too? Assuredly not. The heathens are trying to swindle us.—Tid-bits.

"MY beloved brethern," announced a preacher from his pulpit, "on Sabbath morning next a collection will be taken up for our blessed Feejee mission." "Amen!" rang fervently through the congregation. "And I would add," went on the preacher impressivly, "that 'amens,' however resonant and sincere, make but little rattle in the contribution box."

LADY (to bosom friend): "What's the good of keeping a clock in my bedroom? I always know what time it is when my husband comes home. If he makes a noise, I know it is early yet, say half-past 10 or 11. If he is very friendly and bids me good-night, then it has got rather late, about 12 or half-past. But when he pulls off his boots outside and comes to bed without a light, I am perfectly sure that it has already struck 2 A.M."

GOTHAM sensational preacher: "What bundle is this?" Wife: "It was left here by a messenger boy." "My gracious! They say if they printed it they'd be arrested by Anthony Comstock." "Too bad! Your work is all lost, isn't it?" "Oh, no; not so bad as that. I can use it for a sermon."

MEG, dear, I'm quite sorry Lent's over,
For I've been having no end of fun.
I havn't missed balls and receptions
One bit since the season was done.
What with luncheons, and teas, and my riding,
The sewing class, study, and dress,
And poker—I've made lots of money!
That devotion was crowned with success.
I've put in a most charming season,
And really I'm sorry it's o'er,
If it were not for the bonnets at Easter,
I shouldn't mind forty days more.
Don't talk about sin, death, and folly—
Such topics are best ones to shun.
Do you know, I think Lent is so jolly,
And sackcloth and ashes such fun!

HE had made his declaration of love, and it had been heard with a lowering of the fair head; with a blush on the soft cheek. But he could not help saying something to fill in, while he waited for her answer. "When I say I hav never loved till now," he said, "it is not an empty word. My lips hav never touched the lips of any woman—except my mother's; my hand has never pressed a woman's hand; I do not dance, and my arm——" A look of strange wonderment came over the beautiful face, and the deep eyes grew large as she listened. "Is this true, George?" she asked, with hushed breath. "It is," he answered; "it is literally true." The look of wonderment merged into a glance of icy sternness as she rose to her full hight and confronted him. "Then, for heaven's sake, George," she said, "go somewhere and practice till you get a record."

Gems of Thought.

THE real oppressor, enslaver, and corrupter of the people is the Bible. That book burnt heretics, built dungeons, founded the Inquisition, and trampled upon all the liberties of man. That book spreads the pall of superstition over the colleges and schools. That book puts out the eyes of science, and makes honest investigation a crime. That book fills the world with bigotry, hypocrisy, and fear. How long, Oh, how long! will mankind worship a book? How long will they grovel in the dust before the ignorant legends of the barbaric past?—Ingersoll.

How are we to be guided in these troublesome days when rash persons hav insisted upon revealing the open secret, and the esoteric creed of the sensible man has been proclaimed so that they who run may read? On the whole, the sensible man would reply: You had better hold your tongue. We at least, who hav no new gospel to preach, will not set up for prophets. Let us look on as calmly as may be at the huge turmoil of conflicting controversy; smile with equal calmness at the bigots who would damn people for losing their way in the dark; at the pompous dogmatists who would face it out that they can see as clearly in the dark as in broad daylight; at the feather-headed enthusiasts who take the first will-o'-the-wisp for a safe guide, and patch up a new religion out of scraps and tatters of half-understood science; and at the simple-minded philosophers who fancy in all seriousness that men are about to become reasoning animals. —Leslie Stephen.

AN act which at first is meritorious as a means, tends inevitably to become meritorious as an end. Moreover, actions frequently repeated for some definit reason, come to be repeated when that reason is absent. Thus, the reading of sacred books, originally a profitable exercise to the mind of the reader, is soon undertaken for its own sake, whether the mind of the reader be concerned in it or not. And the action, having become habitual, is stereotyped as a religious custom, and, therefore, a religious obligation. The words of the holy books are read aloud to a congregation, without effort or intelligence on their part, perhaps in a tongue which they do not comprehend. Even if the vernacular be employed, there is not the pretense of an effort to penetrate the sense of difficult passages. Holy writ has become a charm, to be mechanically read and as mechanically heard, and the notion of merit—arising in the first instance from the high importance of understanding its meaning with a view to practicing its precepts—now attaches to the mere repetition of the consecrated word.—Viscount Amberley.

THE priest-like father reads the sacred page,
How Abram was the friend of God on high;
Or Moses bade eternal warfare wage
With Amalek's ungracious progeny;
Or how the royal bard did groaning lie
Beneath the stroke of heaven's avenging ire;
Or Job's pathetic plaint and wailing cry;
Or rapt Isaiah's wild, seraphic fire;
Or other holy seers that tune the sacred lyre.
—Burns.

IT had been hard for him that spake it, to hav put more truth and untruth together in few words, than in that speech, "Whosoever is delighted in solitude, is either a wild beast or a god," for it is most true that a natural and secret hatred and aversion toward society, in any man, hath somewhat of the savage beast; but it is most untrue that it should hav any character at all of the divine nature, except it proceed, not out of a pleasure in solitude, but out of a love and desire to sequester a man's self for a higher conversation.—Bacon's Essays.

HE who must needs hav company, must needs sometimes hav bad company. Be able to be alone; lose not the advantage of solitude and the society of thyself; nor be only content but delighted to be alone and single with Omniency. He who is thus prepared, the day is not uneasy, nor the night black unto him. Darkness may blind his eyes, not his imagination.—Sir Thomas Browne.

As no man can be happy if he is wicked, foolish, or indolent, so no man can be wretched if he is virtuous, brave, and wise. Glorious is the life of that man whose virtues and practice are praiseworthy; nor, indeed, ought that life to be escaped from which is deserving of praise, though it might well be cut short if it were a wretched one.—Cicero.

EVEN so doth God protect us if we be Virtuous and wise. Winds blow and waters roll
Strength to the brave and power and deity,
Yet in themselvs are nothing! One decree
Spake laws to them and said that by the soul
Only the nations shall be great and free.
—Wordsworth.

THOUGH, speaking for myself, I admit the possibility of revelation, I totally disbelieve that the almighty ever did communicate anything to man, by any mode of speech, in any language, or by any kind of vision or appearance, or by any means which our senses are capable of receiving, otherwise than by the universal display of himself in the works of creation, and by that repugnance we feel in ourselvs to bad actions, and the disposition to do good ever.—Thomas Paine.

INSTEAD of trampling juvenil criminals still lower into the earth, society now adopts the view which Robert Owen was the first to popularize—although not the first to enunciate—that a man is better or worse according to the conditions surrounding the parents previous to the birth of the child, and those which surround the infant itself during its childhood, and accompany the boy or girl during youth. Young criminals are now sought to be made less criminal by being placed for lengthy periods under conditions which shall modify and improve their characters.—Bradlaugh's Five Dead Men, etc.

BELIEF in the Phenix was no sign that the early Christians were incapable of receiving a spiritual religion, but surely it is one among a hundred signs that their intellectual development of it might be incorrect; that they had reflected but little on the nature and laws of evidence.—Coleridge's Biographia Literaria.

THE prohibition of bull-fighting in the Mexican state of Guanajuato by Governor Gonzales is the latest step of those Mexican reformers who are anxious to lead the Mexican republicans up to the higher civilization. It is to be presumed that Gonzales will not continue to be governor of Guanajuato for any great length of time.

THIRD Assistant-Postmaster-General Harris has stated his qualifications for the job of carrying Balaam in these words: "A paper or magazine already granted the privileges of the mails is hard to deal with, but a new publication is entirely within the power of the department. There is too much printed matter; too many magazines already."

"THAT sermon was the finest effort I ever heard," said a man on his way home from church. "I wouldn't hav missed it for $20." "I'm glad you enjoyed it, John," said his wife. "Yes, I enjoyed it; but there was one thing that annoyed me." "What was that, John?" "I had no change in my pocket less than half a dollar for the contribution box."

ONE hundred years ago the town of Wilton, N. H., passed the following vote: "That the town provide one barrel West India rum, five barrels New England rum, one barrel good brown sugar, half a box good lemons, two loaves of loaf sugar, for framing and raising said meeting-house." That is a very small proportion of sugar for so much rum, and indicates that our forefathers took theirs straight.

THE Rev. Dr. Talmage has buckled on his armor as chaplain of the Thirteenth New York regiment, and one night last week he dined and wined the colonel and officers of the regiment and a few members of the Veteran Association at his home at 1 South Oxford street, Brooklyn. One of the guests said that the menu was an excellent one, and that the four kinds of wine which the chaplain had provided served to enliven the festivities.

THE Detroit, Mich., Commercial Advertiser prognosticates: "Slowly but surely a condition of affairs seems approaching that will force the masses into abject submission or determined revolt against the oppression of scheming capitalists. It is a frightful state of affairs to contemplate, but it is folly to assert that events of almost daily occurrence do not point directly to coming peasant slavery or an era of popular revolution in the United States. . . . The working classes are being driven like a great herd of cattle up a slowly narrowing cañon. When they reach the impassable cliffs they will turn, and the history of all race or class oppressions will be repeated."

THE exodus from Ireland has reached such dimensions as to force the British steamship companies to announce that they must refuse to book any more steerage passengers for America. The exodus from Germany is also of unusual proportions, and so is that from other northern countries of Continental Europe. We are likely to see more Italians at our port this year than ever before, and the expulsion of Jews from Russia will enlarge the influx of the Semitic element.

THE government of Spain has introduced a new marriage law negotiated with the Vatican. This enforces all the rules of ecclesiastical law in marriages between Roman Catholics, and allows only the intervention of the civil authorities at the religious ceremony for the purpose of registering the contract, and tolerates the civil marriage only in the case of Spaniards who are not Roman Catholics. The new law is much criticised by Republicans and Liberals, as a fresh evidence of the influence of the Vatican at the court, even under a Liberal cabinet.

THE Sun calls a short roll of pulpit philosophers in New York city who are preaching somewhat novel doctrins on Sundays outside of the regular churches. The more prominent of them are Prof. Felix Adler, who preaches in Chickering Hall; Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost, who preaches in Masonic Hall; ex-Father McGlynn, who has preached all winter in the Academy of Music, and Rev. Charles McCarthy, who preaches at his quarters uptown. Mr. Adler and Mr. McCarthy hav held their ground for a good many years; Mr. Pentecost and Mr. McGlynn are newcomers in the independent business. One of them preached last Sunday on the tariff; another scolded his enemies, and another attacked the project of building an Episcopalian cathedral in this city. All these independent preachers get hearers who cheer their more sensational utterances.

THE best known of the cannibal tribes on the upper Congo are the Bangala, who yelled, "Meat!" very loudly when they chased Stanley down the river, but who hav conceived the idea that their recent intercourse with the whites has given them considerable polish, and lifted them several points higher in the social scale than the neighboring tribes. For two years past they hav been utilized as Congo state soldiers, steamboat hands, and station laborers. They dress in Manchester cottons, carry guns, and hav acquired a smattering of the French language. They used to make war for cannibal purposes upon the people of Ngombé, and nowadays, when a steamboat draws up at Ngombé with a lot of Bangala on board, the people flock down to the river and heap abuse upon the ancient enemy with all the epithets at their command. To this torrent of Congo billingsgate the Bangala hav only one response. They collect at the prow of the boat and shout: "Savages! savages!" at the top of their lungs. Travelers say it is an interesting spectacle to see these reformed cannibals thus vaunting their superior civilization.

Land Reform in 1848 and 1888.

GEORGE HENRY EVANS AND HENRY GEORGE.

The renown gained by the popular writer and agitator, Henry George, has obscured for the time being the memory of a man whose untiring labors and self-denial in efforts to abolish involuntary poverty were heroically displayed long before Mr. George wielded a pen, or was even born. These men, whose names suggest each the other, although conspicuous in the same subject of reform, belonged to wholly separate generations, and differed widely in their views as to the measures required to effect the cure of our monster social and industrial evil—unlimited private control of the land.

They were both Democrats and free traders, but even as early as 1844 Democracy meant either the kid-glove Van Buren politics, or the Slam and Rantoul "locofocoism." Mr. Evans was never, however, a partisan or a politician in the office-seeking sense, but a devoted advocate of principle. He was a printer, and a newspaper man of note—the same as Mr. George.

The question of allotment of land has been one of fundamental importance to every people known to history. At the very inception of national life most peoples hav attempted a solution of it, and nearly always with much discernment and forecast. The plan of the Hebrew lawgiver, for the distribution, management, and periodic re-distribution of the land, is too familiar to require particular notice. All primitiv societies hav looked correctly upon its cumulativ dominion under an individual or a class as the one danger to the public good, or to the national life, which demanded effectiv safeguards. The Agrarian law of Rome, so far from being the revolutionary and property-destroying measure which the servil talents and learned ignorance of historians and scholars hav represented, was in fact the fundamental principle of the Roman constitution, which required that every citizen should be a landowner. It was through an encroaching assumption of the state, making the land state property and leasing it to the citizens, that there came, by imperceptible gradations, the large estates in land, and the impoverishment both of the soil and of the cultivator, the decay of Roman citizenship, the suppression of the republic, and, finally, the death of the Roman nationality.

Our country had been colonized from Europe at a time when feudalism was breaking up before the advance of commercialism, which was aiming at the ascendency in all civilized human affairs. The title to the land, by a stupendous legal fiction, under feudalism had been held to be in the monarch, and "every common right had become a right of the crown," and "the bond between the king and lord and vassal was the tenure of land," as shown by the British Encyclopedia, article Government. Land ownership in England to-day has no other legal foundation, and its change to commercial ownership has been made without warrant in law, as it is in logic. When, therefore, it was declared that all power was derived from the people, the title to land not yet passed to private, allodial ownership was assumed to be in the whole people.

Hence the disposal of our public lands became a matter of early interest. Mr. Hamilton, who deemed that whatever belonged to the people was for the use of the government, conceived the idea of realizing a fund for the payment of the "war debt," and other uses, by disposing of the dominion of these lands to a wealthy aristocracy the people had repudiated as political rulers. Hence negotiations were opened with foreign capitalists and nativ land companies, while the actual settler and pioneer, unless able to purchase at least one square mile, were not treated with by the government, under the ruling of the treasury department, of which Hamilton was chief. It was not, I think, till after another treasurer was appointed that this unjust discrimination was reformed. This was done at the instance of General Harrison, who was delegate from the "Northwest Territory," and who eloquently depicted to Congress the inconvenience and suffering to which the actual settlers were subjected by the "land companies" and private land speculators, whose rapacity was tempered with no sentiment of humanity or justice, or even pretense of honesty. By his eloquence and personal influence he obtained the passage of a law requiring the land office to sell in quarter sections (one hundred and sixty acres). But still the forestalling speculators had greatly the advantage of the honest buyer. It was not till the second term of General Jackson that the principle of "limitation to the sale of land" was distinctly made, and which was subsequently carried out, thus putting an end to the traffic by confining sales to one hundred and sixty acres to any person, and to actual settlers. Even at that early date, through the efforts of men some of whom I shall presently notice, the popular mind had been so aroused to the evil of land speculation that General Jackson was sustained in recommending this measure to Congress. The same reformers, among whom Mr. Evans was conspicuous, kept up the agitation for the "free homestead" for a quarter of a century, when at length, in the supreme peril of the nation, a law was passed in 1862. It was but a partial measure, however, leaving the field still open to those corrupt "land grants" which hav stamped our national legislation with everlasting infamy.

But the Homestead act at most was a temporary measure, and its salutary effects hav been quite counterbalanced by the mammoth corporation "steals." This agitation, however, led on directly to the discussion of a higher question, "limitation to private land ownership." I am unable to say positivly who first propounded this plan. It originated, I think, in this country quite fifty years ago. At that time there was much agitation on the labor question. The workingmen had elected a member of Congress, Eli Moore, from the city of New York, and here the "bread riots" had occurred in 1837. The first public utterance connecting land ownership with the subject of labor reform I am able to find is in an address, drawn up by John H. Hunt, for a public meeting held in City Hall park, March 6, 1837, and at which "more than thirty thousand persons were present." The rioters who had raided the flour-store of Eli Hart & Co. had gone from a similar meeting three weeks before, but for that the management of the meeting was shown to be in no manner responsible. In his address at this second meeting Mr. Hunt distinctly raised the question between a monopoly of the land and the low wages of labor and high prices of bread. He did not at that time, however, state any method by which the evil of this monopoly could be prevented. Mr. Evans is regarded as the father of "land limitation," but I am not aware that he claimed to hav originated it. And Mr. George's "sovereign remedy" was in no respect original with him. It was not till Evans commenced the publication of the Workingman's Advocate in 1844 that I find "limitation" distinctly enunciated as a political measure, when "Vote yourself a farm," at first sneeringly given as a motto by opposers, was definitly adopted by the reformers.

From 1832 or earlier the labor agitation had been vigorously prosecuted by a number of talented men. I can name only a few of them: Dr. Douglass, Jacob Frieze, Theophilus Fisk, Seth Luther, Jeremiah Hacker, of New England; Dr. J. E. Snodgrass, of Maryland; John Shedden, Geo. Lippard, A. J. H. Duganne, of Philadelphia; Louis A. Hine, John Pickering, of Cincinnati; Geo. H. Evans, H. H. Van Amringe, Wm. Leggett, John Windt, John Commerford, Allan E. Bovay, Thos. A. Devyr, Dr. Sheppard, Mr. Haskett, F. Byrdsall, Moses Jaques, Lewis Masquerier, William Rowe, James McClatchy, Dr. A. D. Wilson, of New York, and numbers of other devoted men, equally worthy of mention, who gave their best efforts to the work. Not all I hav named accepted fully the doctrin of Mr. Evans's "land limitation," but most of them did. A great number of papers were started in different states, advocating the homestead and limitation laws, and the question continued to grow in interest till the fall of 1848, when it was absorbed and swamped in the Van Buren and Adams canvass, which sported a spurious "Free Soil" banner, and seduced the less intelligent from their allegiance to principle, by exciting hopes of some immediate success. Are we to hav a repetition of this consummate asinin stupidity in 1888?

Some of these reformers had been conspicuous in what was called the "Loco Foco" party. They had been largely instrumental in promoting in this state the abolition of "imprisonment for debt," the repeal of the "market monopoly," exemption of the homestead, household goods, and workmen's tools from execution, the passage of laws giving married women control of their property, and also of "mechanics' lien laws." At a meeting called by Mr. Whitney at the Tabernacle they squelched his Pacific railroad project. I mention these things to show that they were the leaders of progressiv thought on the subjects of land and labor of their time. Two of them previous to 1848 had been nominated on the independent ticket for mayor of the city; first Moses Jaques, and then John Commerford, each receiving several thousand votes, when the aggregate vote was only about thirty-five thousand. Mr. Hunt was a brother of Governor Hunt and of Freeman Hunt, founder and editor of the Merchants' Magazine. He was the author of the "Slavery of Poverty" and of "The Honest Man's Book." A number were brilliant writers and journalists. James McClatchy subsequently emigrated to California, and made a national reputation as the publisher and editor of the Sacramento Bee. John Commerford, on his appearance before a Congressional committee with a petition and address, was highly complimented by John C. Calhoun.

Mr. Evans was a writer of remarkable vigor, though lacking polish, and a good public speaker. He was thoroughly trusted by the workingmen, whose interests he never betrayed. He was approached by the managers of the United States (Biddle's) Bank, at the time the Courier and Enquirer went over, and was offered "patronage and money" if he would advocate its claims. He was at this time not only poor, but involved in debt, yet the bank could not buy him. He continued to publish Young America and to lead the forlorn hope until his death in 1855, though, for a few years, he had been too poor to issue it regularly. After Mr. Evans's decease the Land Reform Association kept up its organization until the appearance of Mr. George's "Progress and Poverty." It opened correspondence with the Land Tenure Association, and also with the Land League of England, before Mr. George assumed leadership of the agitation for Land Nationalization. It exerted itself in petitioning Congress, sending remonstrances, publishing and circulating speeches, pamphlets, etc. I am not informed whether, since the death of its venerable president, the lamented William Rowe, in 1886, it has held regular meetings. It originated the Brotherhood of the Union, which was absorbed during the war by the Union League. A full quarter of a century before Mr. George's book appeared, Mr. Pickering's "Workingmen's Political Economy" had been published and one of Hunt's two books had been given to the world; also two or more by Mr. Hine. And ere "Progress and Poverty" had been named, Duganne's "Acres and Hands," "Keep it Before the People," "A Billion of Acres of Unsold Lands," and other stirring ballads had thrilled two generations of the people. Now, it was upon a field thus toilfully prepared by the lifelong and devoted labors of earnest and talented men that the semi-pessimistic gospel of "Progress and Poverty" made its advent, and challenged for its author leadership in the movement for land reform. To show how easy it is to overlook the labor of the past:

> Mr. Powderly is now boasting of the great things done by the managers of the Knights of Labor in the days of their power, and especially of their agitation against land monopoly. In the official proclamation which he has just sent out to his followers he says: "To no other organization belongs the credit of calling attention to the ravages of land speculation." As a matter of fact, before Mr. Powderly was born the old land reformers were in that line of business with their land-limitation program; they also had an organization for carrying it on; they likewise kept up an agitation over it; and the Homestead law and other measures were the result of their efforts.—Sun, Nov. 26, 1887.

I do not propose to discuss the respectiv claims of George and Evans as authorities on the land question, nor, at any length, the nature of their peculiar plans or schemes; but will state the "measure" of the one, and the "remedy" of the other, briefly, leaving you to judge between them as reason or prejudice may determin. So far as a statement of the pernicious influence of land monopoly is concerned, Mr. George has simply reiterated the arguments and statements of the early reformers, and if in more attractiv phrase, it does not necessarily follow that the influence of his utterances will be more enduring. So far the two men and their eras present no important differences. Only in respect to: "What is to be done?" do they differ. They represent in this not only different eras, but quite different systems of philosophy, social and political. It is true they agree that reform must come through the ballot and through legislation. But Mr. Evans belonged to the school that believes government to be a necessary evil, and that we are to hav as little to do with it as possible. That nature is to be relied on mainly, and that to correct the evils of already existing legislation is the great aim to be sought by the reformer. Thus far he is an optimist. The line of Mr. George's thought is decidedly pessimistic. He accepts the theories of Malthus and Ricardo that rent, that synonym of all subjection and the oppression men suffer from it, is a result of natural law, which can only be eliminated through statecraft and the rule of force, and that the onward march of progress, with its natural adjunct, poverty, can only thus be stayed. He has some way, however, of applying the optimistic rule to interest and profits; at any rate, has never proposed that these should be taxed back for the benefit of the state, although admitting they are equally uncompensated by service, and are as truly "a gratuity of nature" as is the use of land.

Praying Machines Wanted.

The Episcopal bishops are about to go to England and join their brethren there in holding a convocation at Lambeth. Forms of prayer are sent out by the bishops to all their clergy, to be repeated in the churches, asking the Lord to carry out a sectarian program which the bishops in their despair hav already dictated, and in a sacerdotal and official way hav telegraphed to the almighty.

Parry, moving north on his great ice floe, found the floe moving south. The bishops find the churches caught by warm currents, moving with them and melting. It is high time the Lord was jogged, and reminded of his neglect.

The Thibetans fasten their prayers on water-wheels, and so by chronic thumps keep their gods awake with constant reminders. The bishops send theirs to windmills; church fashion requiring this method in celestial diplomacy. There is a power in numbers, so all the praying machines are summoned to duty, and a call made for additional ones. The bishops are sending out, as autumn leaves, their copper-engraved portraits, furnished at the expense of the missionary societies in New York. The funds collected in the churches throughout the country are supposed to go among the heathen, but there are tithes at the clerical receipt of customs, New York. Saints first, sinners afterward. But is it honest to take the money collected for missions and expend it to furnish the public gratuitously with their pictures, and pay the tourist expenses of bishops and their parasites, while they tell the people this is necessary to carry on the work of the Lord? The public can see through shams. They know what grists the prayer-mills grind. Yesterday some "promises to pay" of bishops were offered in Wall street; the holder had one bid of five cents on a dollar. If the prayer-mills can bring manna and manhood to the "successors of the apostles," multiply the mills.

New York, April 13, 1888. G. E. O.

The Crucifixion, as Reported by Pontius Pilate.

The Rev. W. D. Mahan, of Boonville, Mo., has published a pamphlet entitled, "A Correct Transcript of Pilate's Court, as taken from Tiberius Cæsar's Records in the Vatican, giving a correct account of the apprehension, trial, and crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth." Mr. Mahan first heard of the existence of this document in 1856, from a learned German, who said he had seen it in the Vatican, and who thought a transcript of it might be procured. The German having returned to his nativ country, Mr. Mahan succeeded in obtaining through him the transcript in Latin, made by the chief guardian of the Vatican, at a cost of $62.44, and then he had to pay $10.00 for an English translation. This was in 1859. Twenty years later he published the English translation in a pamphlet, with a preface in which he says:

> Though it is not inspiration, yet the words burnt in my heart as the words of Christ in the hearts of the disciples, and I am satisfied from the spirit it bears that it must be true.

The document purports to be a report made by Pontius Pilate to Tiberius Cæsar. It reads like a sensational story written for a magazine or newspaper. Pilate describes his first sight of Jesus, leaning against a tree and calmly addressing the multitude:

> His golden-colored hair and beard gave to his appearance a celestial aspect. He appeared to be about thirty years of age. Never hav I seen a sweeter or more serene countenance. What a contrast between him and his hearers, with their black beards and tawny complexion!

Pilate, not being able to understand Hebrew, requested his secretary, Manlius, to listen and report the speech to him. Never did any philosopher equal Jesus in wisdom. Despite all the complaints of the scribes and Pharisees whom Jesus denounced as "a race of vipers" and "painted sepulchers," Pilate tolerated him. But the pressure became so strong that he "wrote to Jesus requesting an interview." The golden-haired young man of celestial aspect came, and at the sight of him Pilate "trembled in every limb." But as soon as the procurator could speak, he said:

> Jesus of Nazareth, I hav granted you for the last three years ample freedom of speech, nor do I regret it. Your words are those of a sage. I know not whether you hav read Socrates or Plato, but this I know, that there is in your discourses a majestic simplicity that elevates you far above these philosophers.

But inasmuch as Pilate had been accused of being indirectly leagued with Jesus for the purpose of depriving the Hebrews of the little civil power Rome had left them, it was necessary that the young agitator should be more circumspect.

The dialog continues at considerable length. Jesus is stubborn, and Pilate is at last constrained to convert his request into an order. But he allows Jesus the last word, and reports it as follows:

> Prince of the earth, I came not to bring war into the world, but peace and charity. I was born on the same day on which Augustus Cæsar gave peace to the Roman world.

What a pity that this important fact of the date of the birth of Christ should hav been hidden in the archives of his vicegerent at Rome until 1859, when it was disclosed to the Rev. W. D. Mahan, of Missouri, for $72.44! In this document Jesus himself said he was born April 4, five years before Christ! Farewell Christmas!

Pilate goes on to describe the arrest, trial, and crucifixion in grandiloquent style, but carefully avoiding any contradiction of the gospel narrativ, and screening himself from just censure. But when the eloquent, though uninspired, penman comes to the climax of the death scene, he givs himself away by betraying his ignorance of the Roman time-table. He says:

> By degrees the day darkened like a winter twilight, such as had been at the death of the great Julius Cæsar. It was likewise toward the Ides of March.

"Toward the Ides of March" is a fatal blunder. The Ides of March were March 8th to 15th inclusiv, reckoned backward, and the Jewish Passover never occurred earlier than March 26th.

Another proof of forgery is the statement that:

> Dionysius, the Areopagite, is reported to hav exclaimed, "Either the author of nature is suffering, or the universe is falling apart."

When Paul visited Athens, which was at least twenty years after the death of Jesus, Dionysius the Areopagite became one of his converts (Acts. xvii, 34). The same Dionysius is said to hav become the first bishop of Athens; and the Roman Catholics claim that he was the famous St. Denis who converted all France. The Catholic church, doubtless, invented the story of Dionysius, in which it is said that he was in Egypt when the crucifixion happened, and observing the eclipse that accompanied it (half a day before the full moon rose), exclaimed, "Either God himself is suffering, or he sympathizes with some one who is suffering" (Chamb. Enc.). From this fabricated history the forger of the modern Report of Pilate drew the above exclamation, which Pilate is said to hav written down "on the same night that followed the fatal catastrophe"—as if Dionysius was in Jerusalem, or his exclamation had been telegraphed from Egypt!

The Ante Nicene Christian Library, Vol. xvi, published fifteen years ago, contains "Pilate's Letter to Tiberius Cæsar" and "The Report of Pilate" (both quite different from the one palmed off on Mr. Mahan); also "The Death of Pilate," "The Narrativ of Joseph" (of Arimathea), "The Acts of Pilate," etc., all early forgeries.

Several years ago, Mr. Mahan announced in a circular a book ready for publication "by subscription or state rights," containing the foregoing and numerous other ancient documents, found in "the Vatican at Rome and Constantinople." Among these are several Jewish records, "which Constantine carried to Byzantom in 337, and are still preserved at Constantinople," for example: "The Report of Melker, Priest at Bethlehem," "The Report of Gamalial in his interview of Joseph and Mary, in regard to the child Jesus," and "The trial of Ciaphas by the Sanhedoin." (Note the spelling of the circular, Byzantom, Gamalial, and Ciaphas.)

In the preparation of this work Mr. Mahan says he has employed "two experts, the finest scholars in the world, Drs. McIntosh, of Scotland, and Twyman, of England."

And so the Christian forgeries multiply in modern times.

The story of the crucifixion as told by the four evangelists is false. There was no Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate. The real, historical Jesus lived a hundred years before. He practiced magic, and was stoned and hanged for sorcery by the Jews in the reign of Queen Alexandra, 78–69 B.C.

ANTICHRIST.

Our London Letter.

Eight years ago the admittance of an avowed Atheist to Parliament was opposed most strenuously by the combined piety of every description, and now the bill for the abolition of oaths brought before the House by that same Atheist is supported by some of the very men who then denounced him in such unmeasured terms, and did their utmost to prevent him from securing his legal rights. In 1880 it was resolved by a majority of forty-five in the House of Commons that the junior member for Northampton should be not permitted either to make an affirmation or to take the oath, and in 1888 a majority of one hundred carry the second reading of the Oaths bill introduced by him. I should very much doubt if this is owing to any conscientious change of opinion, except, perhaps, in the case of one or two members. The strenuous opposition then was due in a great measure to fear through want of knowledge, as those who are ignorant on the subject look upon an Infidel as synonymous with the orthodox devil, but when they become familiar with him and find he is, on the whole, much like other men, only a little more in earnest, they forget the terror which once inspired them, and are able to listen rationally to what he has to say. It sadly undermines the power of the priest when professed Christians are on friendly terms with Atheists, and the more this exists the quicker will be the decline and fall of Christian and other supernatural religions.

The Baptist Missionary Society does not appear to be in very good spirits, judging by the report given in a provincial paper of a meeting held a few days back. The chairman stated that out of twelve hundred millions of people, there were only something like one hundred millions who even professed any knowledge of Christianity, and an urgent call was made for money to send out more missionaries for the purpose of imparting the blessed gospel to the remainder of the world's population, who, it is stated, are at present "sitting in darkness." The quite unnecessary statement was made that if the funds were forthcoming, there would be plenty of missionaries—though I can never understand why missionaries should want money, when all the outfit required for such a life is only faith and prayer. A colored minister from Jamaica was the chief speaker, but he could not hav been properly instructed by the committee, or else did not carry out his instructions, for he stated that Jamaica did not want any more missionaries, being now in a position to manufacture enough of the article for local requirements, and consequently did not wish to depress prices by flooding the market by the importation of white goods. But he was good enough to recommend his hearers to pay up all the same, as there were plenty of places in other parts of the world where, no doubt, they would be properly appreciated. It will be a good thing for the societies when the North Pole is discovered, as this should be a fine field for missionary enterprise. Of course, not the most enthusiastic evangelists would think of going there; but then, no one does know exactly where they do go, or what they do—it is only necessary for them to keep out of the way of those who know them, and send reports in now and again, dated from some unpronounceable place, and the trick is done. The Manhattan Liberal Club.

The organization of the Liberal Club of the city of New York resulted from the action of Mr. D. T. Gardiner and other activ Liberals, and the publication of a circular dated Sept. 14, 1869, proposing an "organization where men of Liberal ideas can meet and exchange their thoughts in an unbiased manner upon these important topics"—literature, positiv science, and social economy—"one in which the welfare of humanity will be the controling influence, and in which the intellectual will be the only standard." Mr. Horace Greeley was for several years its president, and Mr. Gardiner its energetic promoter and secretary. In later years it elected for president Mr. J. Wilson McDonald, Mr. James Parton, and Mr. Simon Sterne. Its meetings were held every Friday evening at Plimpton Hall, 30 Stuyvesant place, until May, 1876, when it moved to Science Hall, 141 Eighth street.

The Club increased in numbers, interest, and influence until toward the time for election of officers in April, 1877, when its elements took on unusual activity, differentiations ensued, fission or spontaneous division naturally eventuated, with the result that the New York Liberal Club took a hall up-town, where it died of inanition in February, 1878, while the Manhattan Liberal Club continued at its old hall, with the following members as officials: James Parton, W. L. Ormsby, Jr., A. L. Rawson, P. H. Vander Weyde, D. T. Gardiner, Porter C. Bliss, Hugh Byron Brown, David S. Plumb, Henry Evans, Courtlandt Palmer, T. B. Wakeman, and John H. Staats. Since 1882 the Manhattan Liberal Club has held its meetings in the pleasant and commodious German Masonic Hall, 220 East Fifteenth street, Mr. T. B. Wakeman presiding until the election of Prof. Van Buren Denslow as president, April, 1887.

The proceedings of the Club generally consist of a lecture of an hour's duration or less, by some member of the Club or invited guest, followed by a debate by members in speeches of ten minutes or less, until 10:15, when the speaker of the evening again takes the platform, and is allotted fifteen minutes to reply to critics. The Club adjourns at 10:30 P.M. The Club continues to be made up mainly of radical, progressiv people interested in reformatory movements, with perhaps more marked differences than similarity of views, but as a Club it is not devoted to any set of opinions, to any "ology" or "ism," except Liberalism, in so far as that means not only a toleration but a cordial welcome of any new, original, or well-presented thought on subjects appropriate for discussion before a mixed audience. Its audiences are appreciativ of profound dissertations on philosophical subjects, but perhaps prefer "popular lectures" on timely topics, and especially delight in lively debates. Its membership fees are small, just enough to cover current expenses, and new members in accord with its objects are desired. There are many silent members who never appear upon the platform in debate, and some who are seen but rarely at its meetings; but all kinds are equally desired, and can by moral and financial support help to sustain and improve the oldest free platform in the city of New York, and an educational institution which has and asks for no other endowment than the voluntary support of liberal, intellectual people having the welfare of humanity at heart. If all such in the city would aid in some manner, the Manhattan Liberal Club would become known far and wide and its utility be greatly multiplied.

Religion In San Francisco.

From Freethought.

Our clergy hav been stirring themselvs to find out how their business stands in this city, and they giv these figures:

Total population	330,000
Seating capacity of churches	45,000
Occasional church-goers	55,000
Steady church-goers	30,000
Wholly indifferent	245,000

Of these wholly indifferent, it is fair to presume that the odd 45,000 are down in the gutter below the Salvation Army. But the other 200,000 hav risen up into the realm of common sense, and do not need clerical advice. The figures are quite encouraging.

HE who would keep up with the progress of the age must not look to general literature, but to science; must not lose time on the antiquities of classical courses of universities, but study science. Progress is the tail of the great comet of science, therefore keep an eye on the comet.—Social Science Review.

Dictatorial Deadheads.

Monday morning a mournful assemblage of some three hundred divines held forth at Farwell Hall, representing the Chicago contingent of the Evangelical Alliance. The press referred to it as an "enthusiastic" meeting, but if the exhibition of bile these vendors of glad (?) tidings gave can be so denominated, then perhaps it was a rollicking affair. The gospel-howlers were out of sorts with things in general, and with the people who mind their own business and try to enjoy themselvs on Sunday in particular. This meeting was called to emphasize their abhorrence of these continuous violations of the "holy Sabbath," which they assumed were liable to land us in the demnition bowwows, and they did it in a manner to strengthen the suspicion that their breakfasts did not agree with them, or that their liver was not in good working order.

Dr. Goodwin, chairman, vented himself in a violent philippic against saloons, theaters, mayor, aldermen, and Sunday newspapers.

Dr. Arthur Little deplored that the evils of Sabbath-breaking had become so frequent that church people hav become accustomed to them and make no effort for their abrogation. Among the preponderance of chaff there was a grain of good advice which is as applicable to Liberalism as to Christianity, and much more necessary. It is: "To advance our movement, we must not sleep on it." He related the reply of Senator Benton, when asked how he managed to secure the passage of certain unpopular measures, which was, "By ding-dong;" and urged work as well as talk—that ceaseless work would certainly accomplish their purpose. As usual, the little doctor advised them to part company with truth and "tell the employer that the millions he is accumulating will be at the mercy of the mob in the future unless he and others of his class assist in the work of regeneration. Our part is to make the truth patent to the world, but others must assist in the work if it is to be brought to a successful close. Everybody in this country talks of equal rights and liberty. How can these great factors of happiness be enjoyed by the Christian majority in America if their most sacred privilege, the enjoyment of a quiet Sabbath, be denied them? . . . The people want a clean Sabbath. All Americans want it, and the foreigners who come to us with their ideas molded from European models should not, and will not, be allowed to interfere." This little man of God also urged combination and work for legislation and litigation, as the closing of one saloon was a victory worth showing.

Dr. Ridgway indorsed Little and added another "kink," advising them to "pray hard also." He called this the "Secular period," which proves that he is not altogether demented, but he suddenly slopped over hopelessly in this wise: "The church is the slave of the state, and the great truths of Christianity are blotted and blurred by the apathy and carelessness of the people."

A Mr. Grinnell, of Iowa, expressed great commiseration for railroad men, which he proved was entirely unnecessary, for he admitted that out of seven hundred he had questioned only seven objected to working on Sunday.

Dr. Edwards, editor Northwestern Christian Advocate, advised them to make haste slowly and not to be so rabid about "enforcement," as more could be accomplished by persuasion than coercion.

Several others consumed ten minutes each in successful attempts to prove that they had nothing to impart, when these resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the moral law summarized in the Ten Commandments is of perpetual obligation.

Resolved, That if the fourth Commandmcnt be denied or disregarded, there is no way of preserving the other portions of that law.

Resolved, That we will present this subject to our congregations, provide for its discussion in our ministerial and ecclesiastical gatherings, and urge the editors of our religious papers to energetically take it up, and that we will continue so to do so long as there may be need of such action.

Resolved, That a committee of fifteen be appointed to prepare and present to our railway officials, newspaper managers, street railroad officers, and all others who employ laborers seven days in the week our protest and petition against this violation of the law of God.

Bishop Fallows, of the Deformed Episcopal church, was elected perpetual chairman of the Chicago branch, and a "committee on persuasion" appointed, consisting of laymen and clergy. Among the former was Victor F. Lawson, publisher of the daily Noose. An adjournment was taken till the 27th, when the committee are expected to report.

At the same hour the Chicago presbytery had a session, at which Dr. J. L. Withrow's resolutions were adopted, concerning the liquor question:

The presbytery of Chicago believes the traffic in intoxicating beverages to be the prolific source of an overwhelming proportion of all the crime, poverty, and misery that dishonors and degrades our fair land and city. We therefore rejoice in the rapidly rising power of public sentiment against the further extension of the liquor traffic and in favor of its restriction; and, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this Presbytery, representing ninety-one Presbyterian clergymen, and 280 elders and 12,109 members of our churches in the city of Chicago and its suburbs, urges on the aldermen of Chicago to establish by an ordinance the measures for restricting the sale of liquor which City Collector Onahan has submitted, and which the daily press of the city are unanimous in favoring.

Dr. Withrow was appointed to present the request of the presbytery to the mayor and city council.

Then followed the reading of a memorial to be presented to the general assembly touching the colored question. The reading of this preamble created a profound sensation throughout the assembly. Dr. Gray protested that if such an utterance as that went forth as the deliberate expression of the opinion of a body of Christian ministers a quarter of a century after the closing of the war, it would be most infamous and disgraceful. "It means that we shall go down there with arms," said the venerable clergyman, "and resuscitate all the old issues of a bloody and nearly forgotten war. These two churches alone of all the fighting armies appear inclined to reawaken and perpetuate the conflict. The presbyteries of Florida, Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee hav already signified a desire to come over to the reunion, but not a man of them would come in face of such an insult as this. After the soldiers hav united, after the citizens hav united, God forbid that such a wicked crime as this should be fostered and encouraged by the Presbyterian church."

The brethren and sistern are boosting Brother Brushingham, the pastor on trial for wicked doings; they are passing votes of confidence, which may be sadly needed, but are seemingly out of place. The preliminary meeting of the ecclesiastical court foreshadows its purpose to "whitewash," having decided to exclude the testimony of the civil courts, and as the plaintiff nor any of the witnesses for the prosecution are likely to be present, it is hoped to make a jubilee and feast of brotherly love for J. P. Brushingham. We are glad to see that fellow-feeling exhibited which at this juncture the Ada street pastor must feel is wondrous kind.

Intolerance, and Error's Fearful Penalty.

It would be amusing, were it not so pitiful, to hear persons who ought to know better expatiate on the good that the Bible and Christianity hav done mankind. For eighteen hundred years Christianity has persistently fostered a spirit of intolerance, hate, persecution, credulity, and fanaticism. It is impossible to conceive of any teaching more pernicious, any spirit more fiendish, than that inculcated by the Bible and the churches.

Study the instructions of the gentle savior, and never again wonder that even avowed Liberals are bigoted and intolerant. It is simply the result of Christ's own teachings, of centuries of heredity. "And whosoever shall not receive you, nor hear your words, when ye depart out of that house or city, shake off the dust of your feet. Verily, I say unto you, it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city" (Matt. x, 14, 15).

If the Jew, reared in monotheism, at the dictation of an ignorant tramp did not at once repudiate the religion of his fathers, ignore the plainest and most positiv declarations of his God; if he did not accept the savior, which his reason, his Bible, and his God reject—"Before me there was no God formed, neither shall there be after me. I, even I, am the Lord: and beside me there is no savior" (Isa. xliii, 10, 11; read Isa. xlv, 4, 5, and Hosea xiii, 4)—then, says Jesus, he shall be eternally tortured in hell-fire.

The same loving, gentle spirit prompted the savior's declarations: "But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me" (Luke xix, 27); "If a man abide not in me, he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered; and men gather them, and cast them into the fire, and they are burnt" (John xv, 6). These teachings of Christ justified the Inquisition, gave Torquemada Bible authority—gospel authority for the use of the rack, the torture chamber, and the stake.

Nor do we find that the holy comforter had any more gentle means of "bringing all to the unity of the faith in the bonds of peace." "Deliver such an one unto Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus" (1 Cor. v, 5).

Says the holy Paul: "But though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we hav preached unto you, let him be accursed" (Gal. i, 8). Says the beloved John: "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrin, receive him not into your house, neither bid him Godspeed" (2 John x).

Here is the very essence and spirit of Christianity: Torture, curse, abuse, hate, kill; do not admit to your house, nay, do not wish well, any who differ with you.

Many Christians are troubled that the wicked Infidel is not struck dead. They wonder God does not so deal with him; they would if they were God. Let all such be comforted with the blessed gospel's words of cheer and sweet comfort: "You who are troubled, rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ" (2 Thess. i, 7, 8).

Does not Jesus insist that the most intense and despicable hate is a prerequisit to Christian privileges? "If any man come to me, and hate [Greek miseo, to abhor, to loathe, to detest] not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26). Why? Because the loving heavenly father, in the last great day of redemption, declares: "I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury; and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in my heart" (Isa. lxiii, 3, 4). Christians are admonished they must cultivate hate. They must learn to hate even their own little children, for we know if the little ones hav dared to doubt, they are surely damned. Unless this lesson of hate were well learned, Christian parents would fail to delight in the sight of God trampling upon their helpless little ones till their blood gushes out.

We are assured the genuin saint shall enjoy this fearful sight. "The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance; he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked" (Ps. lviii, 10). How vile and infamous the Infidels who reject such holy teachings!

Liberalism claims that to select the good, and reject the evil, is a right that every man and woman should be allowed honestly to exercise without incurring hate, ostracism, or persecution here or threats of punishment hereafter.

But, alas! Heredity is hard to overcome. Evolution is but a slow process. "We are all poor critters!"

Oppose the opinions, reject the pet hobby, expose the scheme of self-aggrandizement of some avowed Liberals, and how the old leaven at once manifests itself! How they denounce, curse, hate, and seek to injure those who differ from them!

These things ought not to be. If no longer Christians, let us no longer cultivate the Christian spirit of hate and intolerance.

Remember, if we do not award to others the freedom of opinion, the right to differ, we claim for ourselvs, we are developing the curse of Christian heredity, and we and our children will hav to pay error's fearful penalty. Would it not be better in love to reason with than in hate to club those who reject our opinions, projects, or pet hobbies?

C. B. REYNOLDS.

More of Colonel Ingersoll's Opinions.

From a Symposium of "sacred and secular sentiment on the Relations of the Church to the Theater" in the New York Mirror.

I hav come, said the interviewer to Colonel Ingersoll, to talk with you a little about the drama. Hav you any decided opinions on that subject?

Nothing is more natural than imitation. The little child with her doll, telling it stories, putting words in its mouth, attributing to it the feelings of happiness and misery, is the simple tendency toward the drama. Little children always hav plays, they imitate their parents, they put on the clothes of their elders, they hav imaginary parties, carry on conversation with imaginary persons, hav little dishes filled with imaginary food, pour tea and coffee out of invisible pots, receive callers, and repeat what they hav heard their mothers say. This is simply the natural drama, an exercise of the imagination which always has been, and which, probably, always will be, a source of great pleasure. In the early days of the world nothing was more natural than for the people to reënact the history of their country—to represent the great heroes, the great battles, and the most exciting scenes the history of which had been preserved by legend. I believe this tendency to reënact, to bring before the eyes the great, the curious, and pathetic events of history, has been universal. All civilized nations hav delighted in the theater, and the greatest minds in many countries hav been devoted to the drama, and, without doubt, the greatest man about whom we know anything devoted his life to the production of plays.

I would like to ask you why, in your opinion as a student of history, has the Protestant church always been so bitterly opposed to the theater?

I believe that the early Christians expected the destruction of the world. They had no idea of remaining here, in the then condition of things, but for a few days. They expected that Christ would come again, that the world would be purified by fire, that all the unbelievers would be burnt up and that the earth would become a fit habitation for the followers of the savior. Protestantism became as ascetic as the early Christians. It is hard to conceive of anybody believing in the "Five Points" of John Calvin going to any place of amusement. The creed of Protestantism made life infinitly sad and made man infinitly responsible. According to this creed every man was liable at any moment to be summoned to eternal pain; the most devout Christian was not absolutely sure of salvation. This life was a probationary state. Everybody was considered as waiting on the dock of time, sitting on his trunk, expecting the ship that was to bear him to an eternity of good or evil—probably evil. They were in no state of mind to enjoy burlesque or comedy, and, so far as tragedy was concerned, their own lives and their own creeds were tragic beyond anything that could by any possibility happen in this world. A broken heart was nothing to be compared with a damned soul; the afflictions of a few years, with the flames of eternity. This, to say the least of it, accounts in part for the hatred that Protestantism always bore toward the stage. Of course, the churches hav always regarded the theater as a rival and hav begrudged the money used to support the stage. You know that Macaulay said the Puritans objected to bear-baiting, not because they pitied the bears, but because they hated to see the people enjoy themselvs. There is in this at least a little truth. Orthodox religion has always been, and always will be, the enemy of happiness. This world is not the place for enjoyment. This is the place to suffer. This is the place to practice self-denial, to wear crowns of thorns; the other world is the place for joy, provided you are fortunate enough to travel the narrow, grass-grown path. Of course, wicked people can be happy here. People who care nothing for the good of others, who liv selfish and horrible lives, are supposed by Christians to enjoy themselvs; consequently, they will be punished in another world. But whoever carried the cross of decency, and whoever denied himself to that degree that he neither stole, nor forged, nor murdered, will be paid for this self-denial in another world. And whoever said that he preferred a prayer-meeting with five or six queer old men and two or three very aged women, with one or two candles, and who solemnly affirmed that he enjoyed that far more than he could a play of Shakspere, was expected, with much reason, I think, to be rewarded in another world.

Do you think that church people were justified in their opposition to the drama in the days when Congreve, Wycherley, and Ben Jonson were the popular favorits?

In that time there was a great deal of vulgarity in many of the plays. Many things were said on the stage that the people of this age would not care to hear, and there was not very often enough wit in the saying to redeem it. My principal objection to Congreve, Wycherley, and most of their contemporaries is that the plays were exceedingly poor and had not much in them of real, sterling value. The Puritans, however, did not object on account of the vulgarity; that was not the honest objection. No play was ever put upon the English stage more vulgar than the "Table Talk" of Martin Luther, and many sermons preached in that day were almost unrivaled for vulgarity. The worst passages in the Old Testament were quoted with a kind of unction that showed a love for the vulgar. And, in my judgment, the worst plays were as good as the sermons, and the theater at that time was better calculated to civilize mankind, to soften the human heart, and to make better men and better women than the pulpit of that day. The actors, in my judgment, were better people than the preachers. They had in them more humanity, more real goodness, and more appreciation of beauty, of tenderness, of generosity, and of heroism. Probably no religion was ever more thoroughly hateful than Puritanism. But all religionists who believe in an eternity of pain would naturally be opposed to everything that makes this life better; and, as a matter of fact, orthodox churches hav been the enemies of painting, of sculpture, of music, and of the drama.

What, in your estimation, is the value of the drama as a factor in our social life at the present time?

I believe that the plays of Shakspere are the most valuable things in the possession of the human race. No man can read and understand Shakspere without being an intellectually developed man. If Shakspere could be as widely circulated as the Bible—if all the Bible societies would break the plates they now hav and print Shakspere, and put Shakspere in all the languages of the world, nothing would so raise the intellectual standard of mankind. Think of the different influence on men between reading Deuteronomy and "Hamlet" and "King Lear;" between studying Numbers and the "Midsummer Night's Dream;" between pondering over the murderous crimes and assassinations in Judges and studying "The Tempest" or "As You Like It." Man advances as he develops intellectually. The church teaches obedience. The man who reads Shakspere has his intellectual horizon enlarged. He begins to think for himself, and he enjoys living in a new world. The characters of Shakspere become his acquaintances. He admires the heroes, the philosophers; he laughs with the clowns, and he almost adores the beautiful women—the pure, loving, and heroic women born of Shakspere's heart and brain. The stage has amused and instructed the world. It has added to the happiness of mankind. It has kept alive all arts. It is in partnership with all there is of beauty, of poetry, and expression. It goes hand in hand with music, with painting, with sculpture, with oratory, with philosophy, and history. The stage has humor, it abhors stupidity. It despises hypocrisy. It holds up to laughter the peculiarities, the idiosyncrasies, and the little insanities of mankind. It thrusts the spear of ridicule through the shield of pretense. It laughs at the lugubrious, and has ever taught, and will, in all probability, forever teach that Man is more than a title, and that human love laughs at all barriers, at all the prejudices of society and caste that tend to keep apart two loving hearts.

What is your opinion of the progress of the drama in educating the artistic sense of the community as compared with the progress of the church as an educator of the moral sentiment?

Of course, the stage is not all good, nor is—and I say this with becoming modesty—the pulpit all bad. There hav been bad actors and there hav been good preachers. There has been no improvement in plays since Shakspere wrote. There has been great improvement in theaters, and the tendency seems to me to be toward higher artistic excellence in the presentation of plays. As we become slowly civilized we will constantly demand more artistic excellence. There will always be a class satisfied with the lowest form of dramatic presentation, with coarse wit, with stupid but apparent jokes, and there will always be a class satisfied with almost anything; but the class demanding the highest, the best, will constantly increase in numbers, and the other classes will, in all probability, correspondingly decrease. The church has ceased to be an educator. In an artistic direction it never did anything except in architecture, and that ceased long ago. The followers of to-day are poor copyists. The church has been compelled to be a friend of, or rather to call in the assistance of, music. As a moral teacher the church always has been and always will be a failure. The pulpit, to use the language of Frederick Douglass, has always "echoed the cry of the street." Take our own history. The church was the friend of slavery. That institution was defended in nearly every pulpit. The Bible was the auction-block on which the slave-mother stood while her child was sold from her arms. The church, for hundreds of years, was the friend and defender of the slave trade. I know of no crime that has not been defended by the church, in one form or other. The church is not a pioneer; it accepts a new truth last of all, and only when denial has become useless. The church preaches the doctrin of forgivness. This doctrin sells crime on credit. The idea that there is a God who rewards and punishes, and who can reward, if he so wishes, the meanest and vilest of the human race, so that he will be eternally happy, and can punish the best of the human race, so that he will be eternally miserable, is subversiv of all morality. Happiness ought to be the result of good actions. Happiness ought to spring from the seed a man sows himself. It ought not to be a reward, it ought to be a consequence, and there ought to be no idea that there is any being who can step between action and consequence. To preach that a man can abuse his wife and children, rob his neighbors, slander his fellow-citizens, and yet, a moment or two before he dies, by repentance become a glorified angel, is, in my judgment, immoral. And to preach that a man can be a good man, kind to his wife and children, an honest man, paying his debts, and yet, for the lack of a certain belief, the moment after he is dead be sent to an eternal prison, is also immoral. So that, according to my opinion, while the church teaches men many good things, it also teaches doctrins subversiv of morality. If there were not in the whole world a church, the morality of man, in my judgment, would be the gainer.

What do you think of the treatment of the actor by society in his social relations.

For a good many years the basis of society has been the dollar. Only a few years ago all literary men were ostracized because they had no money; neither did they hav a reading public. If any man produced a book he had to find a patron—some titled donkey, some landed lubber, in whose honor he could print a few well-turned lies on the fly-leaf. If you wish to know the degradation of literature, read the dedication written by Lord Bacon to James I., in which he puts him beyond all kings, living and dead—beyond Cæsar and Marcus Aurelius. In those days the literary man was a servant, a hack. He lived in Grub street. He was only one degree above the sturdy vagrant and the escaped convict. Why was this? He had no money, and he lived in an age when money was the foundation of respectability. Let me giv you another instance. Mozart, whose brain was a fountain of melody, was forced to eat at a table with coachmen, with footmen, and scullions. He was simply a servant who was commanded to make music for a pudding-headed bishop. This same was true of the great painters, and of almost all other men who rendered the world beautiful by art, and who enriched the languages of mankind. The basis of respectability was the dollar. Now that the literary man has an intelligent public, he cares nothing for the ignorant patron. The literary man makes money. The world is becoming civilized, and the literary man stands high. In England, however, if Charles Darwin had been invited to dinner, and there had been present some sprig of nobility, some titled vessel holding the germs of hereditary disease, Darwin would hav been compelled to occupy a place beneath him. But I hav hopes even for England. The same is true of the artist. The man who can now paint a picture for which he receives from $5,000 to $50,000 is necessarily respectable. The actor who may realize from $1,000 to $2,000 a night, or even more, is welcomed in the stupidest and richest society. So with the singers, and with all others who instruct and amuse mankind. Many people imagin that he who amuses them must be lower than they. This, however, is hardly possible. I believe in the aristocracy of brain and heart; in the aristocracy of intelligence and goodness, and not only appreciate but admire the great actor, the great painter, the great sculptor, the marvelous singer. In other words, I admire all people who tend to make this life richer, who giv an additional thought to this poor world.

Do you think this liberal movement, favoring the better class of plays, inaugurated by the Rev. Dr. Abbott, will tend to soften the sentiment of the orthodox churches against the stage?

I hav not read what Dr. Abbott has written on this subject. From your statement of his position, I think he entertains quite a sensible view, and, when we take into consideration that he is a minister, a miraculously sensible view. It is not the business of the dramatist, the actor, the painter, or the sculptor to teach what the church calls morality. The dramatist and the actor ought to be truthful, ought to be natural—that is to say, truthfully and naturally artistic. He should present pictures of life properly chosen, artistically constructed; an exhibition of emotions truthfully done. If vice is presented naturally, no one will fall in love with vice. If the better qualities of the human heart are presented naturally, no one can fail to fall in love with them. But they need not be presented for that purpose. The object of the artist is to present truthfully and artistically. He is not a Sunday-school teacher. He is not to hav the moral effect eternally in his mind; it is enough for him to be truly artistic. Because, as I hav said a great many times, the greatest good is done by indirection. For instance, a man livs a good, noble, honest, and lofty life. The value of that life would be destroyed if he kept calling attention to it—if he said to all who met him, "Look at me!" he would become intolerable. The truly artistic speaks of perfection; that is to say, of harmony not only of conduct, but of harmony and proportion in everything. The pulpit is always afraid of the passions, and really imagins that it has some influence on men and women, keeping them in the path of virtue. No greater mistake was ever made. Eternally talking and harping on that one subject, in my judgment, does harm. Forever keeping it in the mind by reading passages from the Bible, by talking about the "corruption of the human heart," of the "power of temptation," of the scarcity of virtue, of the plentifulness of vice—all these platitudes tend to produce exactly what they are directed against.

I fear, colonel, that I hav surprised you into agreeing with a clergyman. The following are the points made by the Rev. Dr. Abbott in his editorial on the theater, and it seems to me that you and he think very much alike—on that subject. The points are these:

1. It is not the function of the drama to teach moral lessons.
2. A moral lesson neither makes nor mars either a drama or novel.
3. The moral quality of a play does not depend upon the result.
4. The real function of the drama is like that of the novel—not to amuse, not to excite; but to portray life, and so to minister to it. And as virtue and vice, goodness and evil, are the great fundamental facts of life, they must, in either serious story or serious play, be portrayed. If they are so portrayed that the vice is alluring and the virtue repugnant, the play or story is immoral; if so portrayed that the vice is repellent and the virtue alluring, the play or story is moral.
5. The church has no occasion to ask the theater to preach; though, if it does preach, we hav a right to demand that its ethical doctrins be pure and high. But we hav a right to demand that in its pictures of life it so portray vice as to make it abhorrent, and so portray virtue as to make it attractiv.

I agree in most of what you hav read, though I must confess that to find a minister agreeing with me, or to find myself agreeing with a minister, makes me a little uncertain. All art, in my judgment, is for the sake of expression—equally true of the drama as of painting and sculpture. No poem touches the human heart unless it touches the universal. It must, at some point, move in unison with the great ebb and flow of things. The same is true of the play, of a piece of music, or a statue. I think that all real artists, in all departments, touch the universal, and when they do the result is good; but the result need not hav been a consideration. There is an old story that at first there was a temple erected upon the earth by God himself; that afterward this temple was shivered into countless pieces and distributed over the whole earth, and that all the rubies and diamonds and precious stones since found are parts of that temple. Now, if we could conceive of a building, or of anything, involving all Art, and that it had been scattered abroad, then I would say that whoever finds and portrays truthfully a thought, an emotion, a truth, has found and restored one of the jewels.

Communications.

The New Editor's Experience.

My Dear Brother: It has been an abnormally protracted period since you hav permitted me to seat myself and pen you a few lines for publication. If you search your memory carefully I am confident you will find among your tender recollections the fact that my last communication was not printed by you. If you do not publish this one I shall withdraw my support from your paper and let the whole establishment drop. I notice of late a tendency among editors to exercise their own judgment about what they shall print instead of taking the advice or dictation of correspondents or other editors. It should be discouraged.

You can hardly imagin how little I hav seen of New York since I came to San Francisco, but this was to be expected, though if I had thought about it perhaps I shouldn't hav come away. I miss the Manhattan Liberal Club greatly. Hav you heard any of the members express the same sentiments in regard to myself? Judge Goodell, one of your subscribers in Sacramento, called on me the other day, and said he feared the Manhattan Liberal Club had been broken up, as he had seen no reports of its meetings since late last fall. He said he wished you would continue the reports of its meetings in the interesting style in which they had been published for some years past. I trust you will look to this matter, as Judge Goodell is a substantial citizen and a great admirer of The Truth Seeker.

One object I hav in writing this letter to you is to draw a little information from the fountain of your experience. You are two years older than myself and hav been an editor much longer, and I presume you hav met many people of diverse views and hav found it necessary to agree mainly with them all. I think I am doing pretty well in that direction myself, but I would like to inquire what course you pursue when your harmonious communings with an anti-smoker hav brought him almost to the subscribing point, and a jovial patron enters and offers you a fifteen-cent cigar. Supposing you hav just agreed with a Prohibitionist that the saloons must go, and a jolly German interrupts the proceedings by inviting you to join him in a glass of beer, "steam oder lager?" You may communicate the information here sought in a letter marked personal, and I will not publish it.

San Francisco, whence I send you this, is a city of considerable religious laxity. Sabbath observance is not compulsory, as in New York, and the theaters present their plays on Sunday evening without the roof falling on the actors, as you hav been taught that it would do. Churches pay taxes. The other day counsel in a law suit inquired of the jury how many attended church, and I believe eleven of the good men and true owned up to never doing such a thing. When I was in Maine a few years ago I met a lady from this state who was a member of a Good Templars' lodge. It was told me that when the committee examined her as to her eligibility for initiation they inquired concerning her knowledge of a deity. She replied that she was recently from California and had not yet formed a thorough acquaintance with Eastern residents. She did not know what they had in the Aroostook in the way of deities, but out here they were scarce when she left. Such is still the case. This reminds me that a pamphlet by Secretary Stevens has just been published called, "God in the State." A man who saw the title bought it at once. He had not previously heard that God was in the state, and he wanted to know what part of it he had located in. He expressed no surprise that the deity had chosen this coast as a residence.

You are probably aware that there are sections of the country where the residents entertain feelings of local pride. You hav doubtless observed conspicuous instances of patriotism. People in many places hav an affection for their home, but you will hav to come West to see the flower of this affection in perennial bloom. It does not manifest itself here as a mere sentiment. It is a sacred Cause, which each individual citizen will raise his voice and his hand to defend. The "glorious climate of Californy" is no joke. It is an institution to be respected like the law and the Constitution. I suppose there are here three hundred days of beautiful weather in every year, two hundred of them, perhaps, in succession. And yet as one cloudless dawn succeeds another with a persistence that would almost suggest monotony, the resident rises to remark to another resident that we are having fine weather and that this is the climate for him. When he sits in his open door and reads of snowstorms and blizzards in the East he is lost in amazement that people should elect to risk their lives by remaining longer in such a dangerous country. And his admiration for local climate is not without reason. The weather is all-pervasiv. You become permeated and impressed with it. It attracts your attention, and you pause to view and contemplate it as though it were a landscape. It asserts itself and will not be overlooked. It is what D. M. Bennett would call a tutelary deity, and it is not surprising that people should ignore any other when this one brings them so many blessings.

There are a great many Freethinkers here. They were born so, I guess. Californians don't need Liberalizing on the religious question so much as they need galvanizing. The religious and ecclesiastical element is here, as in the East; it is reaching out after the same control and the same privileges it has there, and I am afraid that Freethinkers will carry their toleration and their Liberalism to such an extent that they will grant to others rights which they will not take the trouble to claim for themselvs. The San Francisco dailies are as respectful and even truckling to the Catholic church as your New York papers, and the testimony of experience will be contradicted if the people here are not some day forced to eat the bitter fruit of their present indifference.

We hav no Liberal organization here, though the sentiment of all the Freethinkers is in favor of one, and there is a good prospect. Six or eight hundred people came together on the anniversary of Paine's birthday, which is evidence enough that the material is here awaiting the organizer.

If you will allow me to say it, without misconstruing my remarks into an advertisment, there is a Freethought paper here of modest dimensions as yet, but with great expectations as to its ultimate size and circulation. I hav the honor to look after its interests at the office while Mr. Putnam carries the tidings throughout the coast. His "News and Notes" and my own thinklets are presented weekly to a forbearing constituency.

I meet a good many of your subscribers. You send them the paper year after year, but you havn't the pleasure of their personal acquaintance, and so you miss a great deal. One of the latest I hav become acquainted with is Mr. R. H. Bliss, "Dick" Bliss, he says they call him. He is from Camptonville, Yuba county, away back in the Sierras. I take it he is a sort of miner-in-chief there. He is a man of magnificent proportions, measuring something like a fathom around the shoulders, and has that hearty, open way about him that you read of in descriptions of the typical miner. He commissioned me to tell you that if you ever come his way you will find his latchstring where you can get hold of it.

Another is Thomas Beeson Smith. He has spent his life in the mines, and came near losing it there. Injuries he received hav shattered and bent and warped and half paralyzed him, but his brain and heart are in their normal position. Geo. T. Bruce, the temperance man, says he noted a street preacher, not long since, talking to a crowd on a corner, but over on the opposit corner was Thomas Beeson Smith, Truth Seeker in hand, reading and expounding, to a rather larger crowd, the law and gospel of Freethought.

Perhaps I hav lost a good deal of fun this winter by not being in the East to enjoy your roystering blizzards that paint the town white, but I hav seen your papers with two-column scare heads and am satisfied. Your New York journals take advantage of small events to build a sensation upon. We had a nice hair-raising earthquake here two weeks ago and our dailies said nothing about it. When a real estate boom is on, something more than a mere local seismic disturbance is required to divert attention from business.

I am several thousand miles away from The Truth Seeker office, but am often with the boys in the light and bright composing-room, and see the familiar "forms," as it were. I see Stevens tapping around the stone, Colby making eccentric and apparently unnecessary marks on the proofs, Mellis groaning over a "take" of long primer, Blake snatching the type from his case, and looking forward to four figures in Saturday's bill, and the rest with contracted brows studying the quirks and turnings of their manuscript. I attend again the little parties at the Society's parlors and see all the faces there, Dr. Foote head and shoulders above the rest, Brother Eckhard walking through the Virginia reel with stately motion, Philosopher King lost in the wilderness of the Saratoga Lancers—the room full of girls and melody and laughter and light. And sometimes I find myself once more up in your editorial room, resting my elbow upon your desk and stretching out an inky and black-leaded hand for copy. And as the answer sometimes came then, "No more to-night," I take your words to close this long letter with. No more to-night. But yours always,

Geo. E. Macdonald.

[A Secret Imparted.—Dear Brother: Trusting to your promis not to print the information I giv you, I will tell you how we manage things here when the dilemma you describe falls upon us. You know that the tendency of industry in this century is toward a division of labor. Formerly, a shoemaker took a hide from the tannery and made a pair of shoes complete, all by himself. Now, some score of workmen are employed on a pair of shoes, each making a part. In the newspaper office, too, where I learned how to wash rollers, set type, and, when the proprietor was out, take subscriptions gracefully, as though I were doing the man a favor by receiving his money, the editor was his own foreman, clerk, stone-hand, proofreader, reporter, cashier, business manager, and occasionally his own typesetter and pressman. You remember Julius Morse, don't you, with his limber knees, large, round spectacles, and piety of the Episcopalian stripe? But times hav changed since then, and, conforming to the stern law of evolution, the printing of even a great moral paper, the biggest and best Liberal journal in the world, is accomplished by a division of labor. Lurking somewhere in the gray matter of your young editorial brain there is doubtless a vision of that printing office up in New Hampshire, where one of the partners is a heretic, takes The Truth Seeker and Freethought, holds office among the Odd Fellows and a commission as lieutenant of the militia company, while the other one belongs to the most popular church, teaches a class in Sunday-school, attends church picnics and agrees with the ministers of all denominations. The first gets all the printing of the worldly and wicked ones, while the latter gathers in the patronage of the saints. The scheme works well; I hav admired it often, though the wicked partner, who is your and my friend, assures me that the pious work doesn't pay—the church folks are such professional beggars, he says, that they expect to get their printing done below cost. I hav known them to get a whole edition of a pamphlet for less than The Truth Seeker pays the compositor. But his partner expects to get his reward above, and as the articles of copartnership call for an equal division of profit, I don't see but that the heretic has got to be saved anyway. The treasures these two young men are laying up in unpaid-for job printing for the churches will amount to an enormous sum. Well, that's the way Mr. Somerby and I work it between the Prohibitionists and the anti-tobacco folks, and the jolly souls who follow the example of Old King Cole. I believe there are no two points of political or social economy upon which the Editor and Business Manager of The Truth Seeker agree. But you know how harmoniously we get along, illustrating the ecumenical council motto, In diversity there is unity, or words to that effect. When a Prohibitionist comes in and wants to subscribe on condition that we make the paper an annex to the Voice, he is got into a corner by the B. M., who agrees thoroughly with all he says, and then takes his subscription without a wink. I keep out of sight. But if that intending supporter comes in shouting high license, denouncing all sumptuary laws, and swearing he will drink "ein lager" when he pleases, and resist to the death any attempt to circumscribe his personal liberty, he is directed to the editorial sanctum, where he meets a warm welcome, but gets water to drink. The non-smoker, too, tarries below, buys books, and finds a ready response to all his condemnation of the vile weed which picks your pocket, burns your clothes, and makes a chimney of your nose. Parenthetically, I may remark that the poet who penned that must hav meant cigaret-smokers. Who ever knew a cigar-smoker to inhale powdered hydrocarbon gas and exhale it through his nose? But when some merry companion like McArthur sends to this office a bundle of manuscript, laid flat, and express paid, accompanied by a box of Perfectos, Cuban made, the whole tout ensemblage, as it were, gets up to the editorial rooms with no hindrance to speak of. The manuscript is carefully laid on a broad window-sill. If you search the inner recesses of your mind you can guess what becomes of the Perfectos.

I advise you to likewise divide your labor with Mr. Putnam. Let him sign the pledge not to use any of the wine so plentiful in California, and solemnly swear not to smoke cigars. Then you can be happy, for all the naughty but good things will fall to you, and you can use them with a clear conscience, knowing how much you are contributing to Mr. Putnam's welfare. The cigars you smoke will not hurt him, and the wine you drink will not make his nose red, while, perhaps, if it is good, it will save you from an attack of dyspepsia. The scheme is a great one, and to put it in successful operation it is only necessary to get the consent of Mr. Putnam. Try it.

Return, please, my thanks to all The Truth Seeker subscribers you meet who send their compliments here. Tell them that if they will come to New York I will take them up to Central park and show them the obelisk.

Yours always, Your Elder Brother.]

Cremation.

In 1874, in the Contemporary Review, Sir Henry Thompson wrote an able article in favor of cremation as a sanitary precaution against the propagation of disease. It attracted great attention, and was translated into several languages. He received in six months eight hundred letters asking for information, and showing great interest in the matter. After fourteen years of silence, though not of lessening interest, he again comes forward with another interesting article on the same subject. This time it is published in the Nineteenth Century.

But modern reaction in favor of cremation commenced before 1874. It started in Italy as early as 1866, and Gorini, the able engineer who constructed the best furnaces and retorts for effectiv cremation, commenced practical work for carrying out the ideas then being advocated. The French followed next after the Italians, and in 1874 a cremation society was formed in London, of which Sir Henry Thompson was elected president. It was founded upon this declaration: "We disapprove the present custom of burying the dead, and desire to substitute some mode which shall rapidly dissolve the body into its component elements by a process which cannot offend the living, and shall render the remains absolutely innocuous. Until some better method is devised we desire to adopt that usually known as cremation."

Owing, perhaps, largely to questions of its lawfulness, which seem to be absurd, a furnace and apparatus were not completed until 1878. Ridiculous official opposition having confronted the movement in 1880, Sir Spenser Wells laid the subject before the annual meeting of the British Medical Association, and obtained its unqualified approval. Lively agitation was carried on by essays, articles in journals, and lectures. Meanwhile cremation was going on in Dresden, Milan, Lodi, Cremona, Brescia, Padua, Varese, and Rome. At Gotha, Germany, cremation has been largely employed. Cremation societies, some with numerous members, hav been formed in other countries—Denmark, Belgium, Switzerland, Holland, Sweden, and Norway. Besides our own "United States Cremation Company (limited)," here in New York city, there are many in the United States. In Austria the subject has been brought before the legislature by bill. In Paris a crematory has been constructed under the direction of the municipal council.

Burial of the body means its putrefaction, sometimes protracted for several years, and the inevitable dissemination of innumerable germs of fatal disease. When disease and death hav been caused by bacteria or microbes, the putrefaction does not destroy, but propagates, these pestilential germs. Cremation means the speedy disintegration of the body by a process so rational, philosophic, esthetic, and poetic that it has been said to be actually "fascinating." All germs are absolutely destroyed, the heat of the retorts being 1,500° Fahrenheit.

But this brief article is intended to be historical, so far as it goes, rather than scientific or philosophical. I hav attempted this other way of treating the subject in another place, but still I would suggest that there is philosophy in history for those who are philosophically or rationally inclined, and who will take the pains to find it. History, as well as observation, furnishes us with facts or data for reasoning with, or about, or upon, and "reason superadded to sense" is what makes science or philosophy.

I am largely indebted to Sir Henry Thompson for the matter of this paper. W. M. Boucher.

Jonah.

It would appear from the legend in the Holy Queer that there was trouble in Nineveh, once on a time, that is, there was a "state of things" there not agreeable to the Lord. Brass gods, with other abominations, and high jinks in general prevailed in the "exceeding great city," and the Lord felt inclined to jump on the town and put a stop to all these things, particularly the brass gods, which were an eyesore to him and a maddening inflammation. There was nothing that so upset and roiled the Lord, in those days, as a brass god. What a red rag is to taurus in the bull-ring, a brass god was to the Lord in the days when his chosen people were "going to and fro in the earth, and walking up and down in it," a number of years ago.

Why a God of life everlasting and power almighty should hav been so rattled at the sight of a little measly brass god set up in a household for home consumption—I mean home worship—must be utterly incomprehensible to those whose perspicacity is not away above par, which the writer's is not, though when it comes to perspiration in the summer solstice he asks no odds of anyone.

Would the lord of the forest and jungle shake his mane and roar in thunder tones at the sight of a little tin lion on wheels? Would the lord of the air and the crags ruffle his feathers and shriek piercingly in staccato at the sight of even a gilded eagle of size? No, brothers, no; ten thousand times no, and I know it! And yet an almighty God of everlasting life is rattled beyond measure at a little insignificant brass god squatting on a mantel! I am flabbergasted thinking of it, quite so.

Perhaps it was the fact that the deluded people paid their devoirs to these little brass impotencies, their lares and penates, in their own households, choosing to worship therein something tangible, something sensible to feeling as to sight, and which, on occasion, they could hurl at a howling cur or yowling cat that had abruptly broken the chains of slumber gently binding them up to the moment of the horrisonous outbreak, to going to church and listening to the pratings of pampered priests concerning a God they could neither see, nor feel, nor sell for old metal, and be expected to worship the invisible and impalpable one—perhaps it was this, and not the little brass gods per se, that so rattled the almighty God—perhaps, I don't know.

Anyhow, the Lord had it in deep for the Ninevens, and had decided to make it interesting for them, unless they packed their brass abominations off to the foundry forthwith-immediately-at-once-without-delay, and rallied en masse around the flag of Jahveh, which waved its blood-red folds on holy Zion's mount. But, not wishing to appear brash in the matter, to his credit be it said, the Lord decided to warn the brass god partisans before jumping on their town and squelching it and them.

Not wishing to do this by word of mouth, high in ether over against the center of the city, from which eyrie all could hear, he sought a messenger to carry the warning, and ran across one Jonah somewhere in the rural districts, a fellow of infinit obscurity of place and nothingness of soul, as we learn later, whom nobody ever heard of before, and of whose antecedents there is no mention in the Holy Queer, beyond the statement that he was the son of one Amittai, as if that were quite sufficient.

Unto this yokel he says, "Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, and cry against it; for their wickedness is come up before me." The chump, who must hav been sitting or lolling on the ground, got up, as directed, and—well, he didn't go to Nineveh for a cent, but lit out for Joppa, in an opposit direction, the unmannerly boor, not as much as vouchsafing one word to the Lord, pro or con, but dusting on the instant, the Lord never opening his mouth, but letting him skip.

You all know what followed, who hav read that wonderful story of the gulping of Jonah by the "great fish prepared by the Lord"—it has long been supposed, by thoughtless people, that this "great fish" was a whale, but a whale can't swallow a man or even a twelve-year-old, or anything else of the size, his throat not being built that way. My own opinion is that the "great fish" was an exaggerated cod or sculpin, the swallowing capacity of either of which specimens is most enormous, even in a normal state. However, it doesn't really matter whether it was a whale, cod, or sculpin, Jonah was "swallowed," as we know, and that settles it.

Having been so "providentially" saved from a watery grave, and feeling mighty cheap at the thought of the Lord's helping hand having been put forth in his behalf in a moment of extreme peril, and that, too, after the scurvy trick he had played him, Jonah graciously allowed himself to be persuaded by the Lord to go to Nineveh and "cry against it," and went, but transcended the Lord's instructions by giving it out that in forty days the jig would be up, unconditionally, with no rebate for spasms of righteousness previously before, when Jahveh would jump in on them. Think of the gall of him, when the Lord hadn't named any time when he would shut down on the dance, and had not irrevocably decided to do so, being willing to giv the brass gods' constituency a living chance, if they would but melt and recast their brass abominations into kettles, lamps, andirons, and other useful and even ornamental articles, provided the latter were not invested with godlike attributes; and herein, I say, the Lord was square and aboveboard.

Well, you all know what followed Jonah's brash pronunciamento; how the city was rattled from center to circumference; how the people all, from king to cowboy, jumped into coffee sacks and wallowed in ashes; how all the beasts even, from camels to kids, were wrapped in sacks and rolled in ashes; how they fasted, beasts and all, none eating or drinking—for how long a time it doesn't say; how they all, from great to small, beasts included, "cried mightily unto the Lord;" how the latter was touched on the raw, so to speak, and "repented of the evil he intended to do unto them," and called off his dogs, as it were; how the chump, Jonah, getting his back up because the Lord "repented" and didn't get in his work, à la Sodom and Gomorrah, lit out of the city for the suburbs and lay down in the sand, madder than a hornet that has lost its sting; and you all remember, of course, the gourd story.

Now, this is the whole story of Jonah in a nutshell, yet he gets an entire "book" in the Holy Queer, while doughty Shamgar, the champion ox-goadist of the world, who slew six hundred full-grown Philistines with his trenchant goad, and who, besides, was a "deliverer of Israel," gets but a paltry four-line notice! Out upon such invidiousness, I say. To be sure, the "book" contains but four chapters, and the chapters are short, but it is a "book" for a' that an' a' that; and but a four-line squib for Shamgar! Such partiality doth make me tired.

In this "book" of Jonah the Lord stands head and shoulders above himself, as stands he in many other "books" of the Holy Queer. He is leniency itself, forgiving as becomes a God of love and mercy, and proves a most stunning surprise party to the reader of the previous "books!" And how gently dealeth he with that duffer, Jonah! Never once doth he "wax wroth" with the chump, with reason enough why he should. In no other "book" does he cut the figure he does in this one. If he was rightfully portrayed in this, he was shamefully libeled in the others! As we find him in this "book," so could we wish to regard him. But as the other "books" are "true," as well as this, we are completely flabbergasted; and what are we going to do about it?

Jonah—and how does Jonah appear to the naked eye in his "book?" As a sneaking, sniveling, snarling sorehead; a surly, sulky, soggy son of a seacook from Seacookville! A fellow of infinit nothingness of soul above fire and brimstone. He was probably a "howling dervish"—perchance a "brooding Buddha"—of the Sam Jones stripe, or the Dr. Dix hue in Lenten seasons, which these do seem to overturn the doctor's spleen, causing him through a glass to darkly look, and view things which from fair to middling run, as black as erebus! This was the sort of chump that Jonah was, no doubt, and, in his going to and fro and up and down the earth, the Lord had seen him, doubtless, and in him taken stock, hence chartered him as messenger.

This "book" of Jonah should be called the "book of God," for nowhere in the "holy" tome does God stick out as in this "book"—I mean as one forgiving, gracious, slow to anger, merciful, and all that sort of thing, you know—and Jonah, too, sticks out, but then as Jonah only, nothing more.

But letting Jonah slide, I am convinced that his "book" was written up with a single eye to the booming of God, Jonah being simply a foil for the setting off of the nobler qualities of his, for the time being, "side pardner," so to speak; and the "inspired" scribe who wrote it should hav been well taken care of—had he been "took," as was Enoch, he had not been overpaid to the extent of a farthing—but what of the "inspired" fellers who wrote the Lord down a monster?

The memory of Jonah is not a fragrant, but decidedly a malodorous one. Nobody wants any Jonah in his, particularly on a fishing excursion. Adieu, Jonah, adieu. Selah! Si Slokum.

Rivalry in Crime.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Your extract, "Rivalry in Crime," from a Dublin "religious" newspaper, professes to argue that Protestantism has a healthier influence on reformatory training and home life than Catholicism. Your appropriate heading suggests that you clip, not to enforce the opinion of the Dublin editor, but to show how these Christians love one another. I hav no concern with the rivalry of tweedledee with tweedledum, but, despite an Anglicized cognomen, I am a man of Gaelic race, so allow me to deal with the instance.

The instance is that of the appalling immorality among the Roman Catholic Irish girls of Liverpool and London. For the purposes of this letter it is conceded to be the truth. As a fact, it is largely the truth, though perhaps not quite so black as the reverend editor paints it. But the worse he paints it the worse he shows his inhuman politico-religious system to be.

Their condition is cited to show that the influence of Protestantism is healthy.

Well, first these awful examples, in their own country.

Statistics compiled by a body of officials adverse in every way to them and interested financially and apologetically in giving them a bad moral character, show that the rate of illegitimacy is lower than anywhere else in what is called "the United Kingdom," if not in all Europe. Next, they encourage early marriages even to the verge of imprudence, so far as prospect of comfort is concerned. Some of their men drink excessivly, but if they had not to resist systematic attempts to beat them out of every cent they hav under the guise of rent, they would hav some inducement to thrift. Just now, as soon as they sell their butter they are given to buying American flour for their children instead of giving every cent to the landlord.

They hav been deprived of their lands because they follow tweedledum and not tweedledee.

As tenants by sufferance they hav had to pay rents in cases three hundred and four hundred per cent in excess of government valuation.

They hav been systematically robbed under form of "law."

Their manufactures hav, at times, been suppressed by "law."

The young people crowded out, not by excess of population but by bad "laws," instead of being able ot go away with savings, as people can from any rightly governed country, however poor, hav barely enough to pay their passage, and that amount often comes from another land.

The girls of the very poorest class are thrown alone, and, in their inexperience on the English shore, with starvation before them, ensnared by touters who bring them into brothels and ruin them.

At home, the clergy of the tweedledum, standing in with the government and political preferment for nephews and relativs, say of the men who work for the improvement of the condition of their fellow-countrymen that "hell is not hot enough to hold them"—Bishop Moriarty on the Fenians.

Abroad, the tweedledee whose land-robbing and fanatic system has worked their bodily ruin and loss of purity and self-respect, not to mention their pangs of conscience, gravely sermonizes at what has come to them because they hav followed tweedledum.

Generations of a race of criminals follow because of man's inhumanity to man under the name of religion.

Precisely the same thing is happening in England and Scotland with the hundreds of thousands who hav been driven into the towns to make way for deer, but, as they understand the wiles of their race better, and happen, with their moralizers, to be tweedledees, they cannot be used to point a moral or adorn a tale. If the clergy who "stand in" with the governing classes were in earnest, they would grapple with the sources of the evil.

The reverend writer you quote from makes his living from the class which is the source of the evil.

Mr. Editor, if there is not a hell, there ought to be, and the people who add insult to oppression should be roasting in it.

The saintly Christians who for six days in the week scheme to get the biggest returns out of the tenement houses of New York and other Eastern cities should also receive public attention. Generally in all new countries the landlord has to improve and he is regulated by competition, but in some of your Eastern cities monopoly begets the vice which on the seventh it sanctimoniously pities in its cushioned churches. The Methodist Revival.

The Methodists are having a big revival in the Jane street church, this city, and two weeks ago celebrated the one-thousandth conversion very much as the theaters celebrate the one-hundredth performance of a play by gorgeous programs and great display of flowers. The revivalist Harrison, helped by the Rev. Stephen Merritt, is the drummer, or roperin, of the newly made Methodists, and on "jubilee night" he had the aid of J. M. Buckley and a bishop named Andrews. The performance lasted until midnight, and a free lunch was distributed to enable the converted to hold out to the end. With the assistance of a great many pretty women and girls, bright lights, almost unintermitting music, and the personal magnetism of "Boy" Harrison (aet. about fifty) the Jane street church revival has added more members to Methodism than any effort previously made in this city, unless the Salvation Army is near enough akin to shouting Methodism to number its converts in its ranks.

A great deal of self-gratulation over this event is being indulged in by the church, as though a great gain had been made. But we fail to find in the accounts of the revival that anyone has joined the church who did not already believe in Christianity in general and in its peculiar doctrins in particular. No member of the Manhattan Liberal Club, for instance, is missing, to be looked for at Mr. Merritt's sanctuary. The revival has not added one to the cohorts of Christ; the converted ones are those who, as the Christian Advocate phrases it, hav been taught their duty, but up to this time hav neglected it. This fact givs us a little light on the character of the Methodist creed.

When the average Methodist is asked if his church holds, like the Catholic, that without its limits there is no salvation, he will look wise and generally admit that the members of some other Protestant church may squeeze by St. Peter. If forced into a corner and made to say whether some good folks who belong to no church, but believe in the Christian religion on general principles, may not also get into heaven, he will look up and down and around and evade the query by professing that he believes so.

This revival, however, dissipates that idea; for if a decent man, believing in God and Christ, and the other articles of creedal furniture, but not "belonging" to any church, can obtain salvation, what is the use of such revivals, and why so much jubilation over the thousand converted? There is no evidence, and no pretense by the church, that these thousand are extraordinarily wicked or heretical, or but just plain, common, every-day folks, most of them young and with rather undeveloped minds, who thought the church the regular and usual thing, and were moved by the music and the magnetic power of the preacher and the crowd to affiliate with it. The rejoicing by official journals and creed-makers over these conversions shows conclusivly that the Methodist church possesses no charity but damns everybody who does not join its organization.

Whether these conversions will be permanent is now an interesting question. The church people pretend to think they will, as many of Harrison's converts hav survived two years without backsliding. The Evening Sun, however, proposes a test of their religion which, while not altogether unique, reveals old-fashioned ideas of religion, and has the merit of being practically humanitarian. "Suppose, for example," it says, "that one of them is a retail grocer who has been guilty of evil practices not unknown in that business; it is now his bounden duty to alter his ways. He must refrain from buying or selling adulterated goods; he must not giv short weight; he must not exact undue profit from his customers; he must deal fairly with his employees in the gospel spirit; he must practice the truth in all his business and in all his relations with mankind." These things, the paper holds, are required by true religion even more than praying and singing, and if it be found that this revival is working a change of this kind among the hosts of sinners who are being converted, the facts will soon be known in our town even by the wickedest people.

We suggest that Brother Merritt keep a record in his undertaking shop of all the tradesmen among the converts who are henceforward absolutely honest in all their dealings with their customers. Let the Methodist butchers who hav renounced the practice of slamming meat on the scales and weighing it on the jump come forward. Let the grocers whose sugar and coal is dry set down their names. Let the dry goods men who sell colored cloth that will really wash step up. Let all who hav put away from themselvs and their stores all adulterated things go to Mr. Merritt's coffin shop and hav their names entered in the book of their new life. It is a great test; we hope it will be applied.

Mr. Comstock's Ally.

Anthony Comstock lectured in Washington on the 15th inst., in the Congregational church. As usual, he brought forth the statistics of his seizures of obscene literature, and paid his respects to the National Liberal League. With his figures our readers are already familiar, but we do not think they know why it was that the Comstock law was not repealed. It was because God was with Anthony. Referring to the petition, 2,100 feet long and bearing 70,000 names, introduced by Benjamin Butler for the repeal of his law, he said: "These efforts were so strong that it was only by the hand of God that the law was preserved. Under the opposition of the National Liberal League," he added, "I must hav gone down only for my faith in God." At this point, says the Post, Anthony "riveted his eyes upon the ceiling and looked like the picture of a saint until the applause ceased."

Until this week we hav felt chagrined that our national legislators did not clearly see the abuses of the law and repeal it, but now we feel more content. We are not sufficiently presumptuous to imagin that the Liberals, courageous and numerous though they be, can contend with deity. A God who could make this universe out of nothing is certainly powerful enough to twist a few senators and representativs to his will. And before a House committee, with the Lord on one side and young Dr. Foote on the other, we should, with all deference to Dr. Foote, imagin that the Lord would come out ahead. Neither do we think it any disgrace to the doctor to get worsted in such a contest of wits.

If it be not blasphemous, we trust, for Anthony's sake, that the Lord will stand by him in the suit against him by Mr. Hemmens for conspiring to ruin his business, in which Judge Barrett finds sufficient ground to order his arrest and that of his coconspirator, Mr. John N. Stearns, a pious gentleman of Anthony's acquaintance. For the information of his backer, who may not know to what sore straits Mr. Comstock is reduced, we briefly set forth the case, as found in the daily newspapers: John Hemmens, who was dispossessed on April 5th from his restaurant and wine-room at 50 Broadway by John N. Stearns, the owner of the premises, as a result of Hemmens being convicted of permitting gambling in the place, began proceedings in the supreme court on the 18th inst. against Stearns and Anthony Comstock to recover $30,000 damages, on the ground of conspiracy to ruin his business. It is said that Stearns contemplated rebuilding on the site of 50 and 52 Broadway, but John Hemmens and Charles Shirley had a lease with three years to run, and no arrangement could be made with them to vacate. Hemmens claims that Stearns and Comstock conspired together to oust them from the restaurant and deprive them of the lease for the unexpired term. Several gentlemen obtained permission from him on February 25th to use a side-room for amusement purposes, and they got to gambling with cards and chips. Comstock went around on the night of March 9th, caught the party, finding the chips behind the bar, and arrested Hemmens for permitting gambling in the place. Hemmens was bound over in the Tombs police court, and in the general sessions he was convicted and fined $50. He was dispossessed on April 5th before Justice Clancy, in the second judicial district court, and now he claims that this all came about from Stearns's determination to get him out at all hazards. He says that two of the men that played cards in the private room of the premises at 50 Broadway were detectivs, one of whom was in the employ of Comstock's society. Mr. Comstock had to find bail in two thousand dollars.

Such is the brief account of Anthony's present trouble, wherein he will probably need considerable aid. We bespeak it for him from the same personage who saved his law whereby he once hoped to stamp out Freethinkers and Freethought publications.

Up in Montreal.

The two great divisions of the Christian church in Montreal, Canada—a church whose members always turn the other when thumped upon one cheek—are engaged in a family row of large dimensions. The city has been more or less noted for its religious disturbances, in which blood has not infrequently been shed to honor and glorify the "man of peace" and to show how his followers love one another, and the present division will not improbably lead to such results. The fight is over the Virgin Mary, as important a personage, at least, in theological economy, as her reputed son, and it began over the proposal made by a number of leading Catholic citizens, headed by Archbishop Fabre, to the city council asking for a site in the center of Mount Royal park on which to erect a mammoth statue of the Virgin Mary, nearly as large as Bartholdi's masterpiece on Liberty Island, in New York harbor.

The project has called forth vehement protest from the Protestant population, and Sunday before last, in all the churches, stirring references were made to it, and Protestants urged, irrespectiv of denomination, to combat the scheme. After the services petitions to the council not to allow the diversion of the public park to such purposes were signed by many thousands of laymen and clergymen, and a united meeting of the Evangelical Alliance and the Ministerial Association discussed the project in no mild language. The Protestants threaten that if the statue is erected it will be blown up on some dark night. If the city council sanctions the scheme, as it certainly will, an appeal to Queen Victoria is contemplated, the contention of the minority being that, although the Catholics are in a majority in Montreal, they are in a minority in the whole of Canada. If the Orange element continues to predict that the new statue will be destroyed, it would not be surprising if the Nelson monument and the statue to Queen Victoria, which are equally distasteful to the French and Irish elements respectivly, should suffer a like fate.

Such, in brief, are the facts as telegraphed to this city regarding what we must consider a most important step toward Christian unity. The Virgin Mary, we know, is Montreal's patron saintess, and the first name of the place was Ville Maria. But the proposed statue is not commemorativ but religious, and is designed to secure the Virgin's favor and intercession with her son for the present temporal and future spiritual benefit of Montrealers, who are, as a mass, of such great intelligence that they pray to saints in sickness, and carry the host in religious procession to ward off epidemics of contagious diseases.

This keeping alive of the medieval antagonism of race and religion is characteristic of the French Canadians, who are about the lowest specimens, mentally, of the human race inhabiting this continent. The city is Catholic by a large majority, and its political affairs hav always been directed by ecclesiastics. The Protestant element is, however, a respectable minority, sufficient to bother the Catholic church when questions arise not calling for a strict division on religious lines. But the brains of the city are Agnostics, comprising a hundred or two of the wealthy manufacturers and business and professional men. The two church wings hav usually parceled the offices between them, the Catholics giving the Protestants a few councilmen and officers who could not greatly affect the policy of the city. A few years ago the two factions fell out, neither party would trust the other, and an Infidel was elected to the mayoralty for two terms. Now the Catholics hav recovered their hold, three-quarters of the councilmen being of that faith, enabling their church to do as it pleases in obtaining a site for the colossal statue of the Virgin Mary. The Protestants may vigorously protest, but that appears to be about all the good it will do them. But they hav principally themselvs to blame. They hav never tried to make the government of Montreal Secular, but hav been content to take the crumbs which fall to them from the union of church and state, satisfied to let the Catholics hav millions if they could get thousands, and to see the Romanists rule the city and province if they were only allowed to run a ward or two. In Montreal it is the Protestants who demand the "pro rata" subsidies, and complain that in the division of the world which Christians as the Lord's anointed feel to be due them they hav been left. All of which, in our opinion, comes under the head of righteous retribution.

But what an anachronism this whole matter is, and how well it illustrates the deathly blight which adherence to religion must ever cast on human progress! This is the nineteenth century, not the seventeenth or sixteenth, and this is North America, not Spain. Yet here is the populace of a city clamoring for a public idol to ward off another epidemic of small-pox, and stay the devastation of floods! Words are inadequate to describe the anomaly. Evolution givs place to atavism; the world is whirling backward. Excursions to Montreal will yet be organized, and advertised as the great and only chance to see the dead alive, corpses walking, and a buried city on top of the ground.

The lesson to be learned, however, is that the better Christian a man is, the worse citizen is he. Progress comes from heresy.

The President and the Churches.

The department of the interior, which controls the Indian affairs of the country, has issued orders that hereafter in no Indian school supported wholly or in part by the government shall the nativ language of the scholars be used, but English exclusivly. This has aroused the ire of the churches engaged in evangelizing the red men at the expense of the country, as it renders useless the religious works translated into the various Indian languages, and several religious bodies and conferences hav remonstrated with President Cleveland concerning the order, but to no effect. He believes in civilizing the aborigines before evangelizing them, and contends that teaching them the English language is of more importance than teaching them the catechism.

For holding thus, a prominent religious journal, of more or less mugwump tendency, berates him severely in this remarkable way: "He has lowered the tone of the Indian service, and interfered unwarrantably with religious matters in the mission schools among the Indians—with which matters it is simply impertinent for him to meddle."

Now, while we are no particular admirer of Mr. Cleveland, and dislike a great many things he has done, we must admit that he is lawfully and legally the president of the United States, chosen in a proper and constitutional manner, by a majority of the voters of this country. That being the case, we want to know whose business it is to conduct the affairs of the country if not his? How is it impertinent for the interior department, of which Mr. Cleveland has supreme control, and to which the charge of the Indians has been legally committed, to run its own affairs even against the wishes of the religious sects? Do the pietists own the country? Are their desires superior to law? Is a Methodist conference higher in authority than the department of the government and the president? If so, then the action of the secretary of the interior and the president is impertinent, but not otherwise, and the pietists should restrain their anger at having their evangelizing work hindered. They hav too much to say in Indian affairs as it is.

The Indian policy of the government is and has been for years a failure. When General Grant parceled out the tribes among the sects, he began a policy which has ended in almost unlimited robbery of the government, and exceedingly limited benefit to the Indians. They hav not civilized, only taught religion, and to-day their charges are nearly as wild and unkempt, as savage and lazy, as when the first mission school was established. The little improvement they hav undergone is the result of contact with white civilization, and in no wise due to the prayers of the missionaries. That is our belief, founded upon reports of unprejudiced observers living upon the ground.

The church critics of the president are themselvs the impertinent parties. It is his business to administer Indian affairs, and none of theirs.

Indicted Again.

We were a little premature last week in congratulating the editors of Lucifer upon their escape from the unprincipled and vindictiv Comstock crowd of their neighborhood. Scarcely was the ink dry upon the advance-sheets of Lucifer which were sent out to anxious friends announcing the result of the "trial," when District-Attorney Perry submitted the matter to another grand jury, who returned an indictment, jointly and severally, against the trio of defendants.

Mr. Harman himself seems to hav had a presentiment of this, for in the same issue of Lucifer in which he announces the "lifting of the shadow" and returns thanks to those who hav helped him and his relativs, he says: "As to what shall come after, of course it is impossible to say. It is certainly within the power of the government to again indict us; but against such a procedure there is the remonstrance of one hundred and thirty-six of the citizens of Valley Falls and vicinity, including a strong majority of the business and professional men, and two-thirds of the city officials."

This remonstrance failed, and bigotry and defeated spite will try again. It is probable that the new indictment will hold water, and that the case will be tried, and three men's liberty and property be put in peril because they hold radical ideas upon social and religious subjects. Christianity stands at the head and foot of the business, working the legal levers of the modern torture-rack, and the followers of the crucified Judean blasphemer will chuckle and grin to see their victims suffer.

Every Freethinker in the country should interest himself in this case, as it is clear that the prosecution is one of spite and not of justice—of Christianity against liberty—simply an endeavor to choke heresy and force the heretics to keep quiet. Such attempts must be thwarted. The Christians of Kansas must be made to pay too dearly for their whistle, and then they will not purchase any more. Let everyone who reads this send his or her indignant protest against this persecution to Judge Foster of the United States District Court at Topeka, Kan., and District-Attorney Perry of the same place may as well be admonished at the same time.

A Repugnant Suggestion.

At the annual conference of the Zion Methodist church of this city last week, Bishop J. W. Hood, of Fayetteville, N. C., advanced the curious idea that the government of the United States ought to pay for all the liberated slaves. "The evils which the blacks suffer from the hands of the whites," he said, "are largely the results of the mistake made by the government at the close of the war in its failure to pay the slaveholders for their property. This worked a great injustice upon the freedmen, as the slaveholders looked upon the blacks as property stolen from them by the government, and which they had a right to get back to whatever extent they could. Hence they feel justified in getting the freedman's labor as low as possible, and in taking advantage of his ignorance in every way. The government had encouraged the South to believe that slavery was a firmly established institution, and when the slaves were emancipated it should hav been willing to make full restitution. The government should do now what it refused to do at the end of the war. The slaveholders should be reimbursed in full for their losses, even at this late day, which would bring about a much better state of feeling between whites and blacks, while it would be, at the same time, a convenient method of reducing the surplus."

It is fair to presume that Methodism is responsible for this man's fall—Methodism and the Bible. He might as well plead for restoring the blacks to their former owners. It would be as just to do this as to tax the present generation for the benefit of the late slaveholders. Before the war such a proposition might hav been entertained; but remembering all the circumstances connected with the family unpleasantness of 1860–4, the suggestion is repugnant.

The Christian Unionists.

The talk about a "reunion of Christendom" goes merrily on among the churches, and they pretend to think such reunion a possibility. Bishop Coxe, of western New York, has edited a complete translation of the works of the ante-Nicene fathers, and by a series of lectures based on this translation, it is proposed to show that the sectarian differences are really no differences at all, and that by going back to primitiv Christianity—to the Apostle's and the Nicene creeds—all sects can accept one faith and unite in one grand catholic church. It is a beautiful vision.

A week ago Thursday the opening lecture of this program was given in this city. The subject was, "The Pentecostal Age and the Growth of the Church to the Age of St. John, A.D. 100." This was followed last Thursday by an explanation of "Syrian Christianity and the School of Antioch." Next came a lecture on the "North African church," in which the lecturer told about Tertullianism and Montanism, the baptismal controversy and the dispute between Rome and Africa regarding it, Manichæism and St. Augustine, the Pelagian controversy, and the controversy with the Donatists. Next week we shall hav a talk about the School of Alexandria, in which Clement and Origen will be exhibited, and the grounds of difference given between Eastern and Western schools, and the influence of Philo and his Platonic philosophy expounded. Some time in May the last lecture will be delivered, subject, "Rome and Its Influence on Western Christendom," in which the bishop of Springfield will describe the early condition of the Christian church, the molding of the Germanic nations by Roman Christianity, the beneficial influence of the church in the early Middle Ages, the gradual advance of Roman claims and the growth of the idea of the papacy, and, finally, after defining the papacy, its effect on political liberty.

Thus, it is expected, will the differences of the sects be explained away, and a grand love feast of all Christians be brought about, to the end that the Infidels may be stamped out. But it occurs to us to ask, Of what good is all this hair-splitting speculation upon the tenets of the early Christians if the facts upon which their tenets were based are untrue? It does not seem to us that it will do much good to reconcile conflicting theories concerning an event which never happened.

WE hav thought that never could Jo Cook get near enough the truth to agree with THE TRUTH SEEKER. But he has for once. The occasion was a lecture, in Boston, on the Jesuits. He said: "This mighty organization is described as a naked sword, of which the hilt is at Rome and the point everywhere. There are in this country 2,606 parochial schools containing more than 500,000 pupils under exclusivly Roman Catholic instruction. In the archdiocese of Boston there are 42 parochial schools with 22,250 pupils under exclusivly Roman Catholic instruction. New York has 37 schools, with 40,000 pupils. The power of the Catholics has been used to cause misappropriations of money for public purposes. We may soon expect the church to use its power to obtain a division of school funds! The Roman Catholic schools are officered and controled by Jesuits, and by sisters under their influence. The Jesuit order is an ecclesiastical machine, military in its constitution. You are under Jesuit inspection, and so probably am I. We hav a provision in naturalization requiring a man to renounce all foreign allegiance. Now, I assert that no Jesuit can take that oath in good faith. Private schools and their teachers ought to be inspected. I do not deny Roman Catholics their rights to open schools, though I regret that they do this. Finally, it is high time for the benefit of the republic at large, and the Roman Catholics, that you should secure the undivided supremacy of the white pope over the black."

The Faith-Cure in Boston.

From the New York Star.

A sailor was rigging Commodore Hovey's yacht, Fortuna, in Boston the other day. He fell to the deck and suffered a compound fracture of the right thigh. His superstitious messmates carried him off to the Boston branch of the Faith-Cure League, which has accomplished some wonderful cures. His fracture was duly blessed and prayed upon, and the man was told to get up and walk. He did so, and fell and broke his other leg.

"—— —— —— the faith-cure!" exclaimed the sailor-man. "Take me to the Massachusetts General Hospital." And there the poor fellow lies, doing quite well.

Letters from Friends.

NASHVILLE, TENN., Feb. 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Why is the Freethinker called "Infidel?" The appellation, "Infidel," would be more properly applied to preachers, as most of them preach what they do not believe themselvs. J. P. MULLER.

SPARTA, MICH., March 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I am a new subscriber to your most valuable paper, and in perusing its columns I find lots of good, valuable reading, such as should be read by everyone. Long life, good health, and lots of happiness to Heston. His cartoons are first-class. I see by the advertisments of books and pamphlets in your paper that some of them must be pretty good reading and food for the mind, so I will try some of them, and if they prove to be what I think they are I will endeavor to send for others at some future time.

L. H. TANNER.

STERLING, ILL., March 29, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I, like thousands, believe that THE TRUTH SEEKER is the grandest paper published on earth, and cannot do without it hereafter. Heston's pictures hit the nail on the head.

I also agree with hundreds of thousands, like G. P. Dreisbach in the last TRUTH SEEKER, that the Freethinkers of the United States shall nominate the grandest and noblest men now living: For president, R. G. Ingersoll, and for vice-president, Robert Lincoln. I do hope that the Freethought and Secular papers will agitate the question and bring the good qualities of the above parties before the public. Ingersoll's enemies are gradually discovering his noble qualities, and he of all men is, perhaps, best fitted for president of our grand republic. F. C. CRAMER.

GALION, O., March 21, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: When one finds something good it is quite natural to hav some one to share it, and one has a much better relish for it for telling and sharing. My good find is the lectures of Ingersoll. I know my telling will add nothing to their grandeur, excellence, and beauty, but I would just say to others, Take and eat, for therein is the bread of life. I am proud that I liv in the age of the grandest orator the world ever produced. Ingersoll's works contain the gist of human happiness. No one can read them but he will feel himself a freer, better man, and a better citizen. To say that the family Bible of the future will be chiefly composed of Ingersoll's works will not be saying too much. May he liv to realize that people in these United States will revere and honor the cathedrals of Ingersoll more than they now do the cathedrals of priests. Long may he liv, to the happiness of his family and benefit of his countrymen!

JOHN P. FLICK.

EPHRAIM, WIS., April 2, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I don't think another Infidel paper comes to this place. When I came into the post-office the other day to get my paper the postmaster said to me, "That is a curious paper." I said, "Why?" He said, "You must be blind that cannot see what kind of paper that is. We see every day that there is a God." Now, he must hav looked in it to know. I told him I was sure I was not blind, but I could not see any such God as the Bible tells of, and if there was, I did not think he was very good. A God that will giv orders to kill men, women, and infants, and save young maidens for the soldiers, and tell his chosen tribe to sell their tainted meat to foreigners, was not an honest God. He said, "That is not in the Bible," and told me to show it to him. I told him I could not remember where it was, and had no time to hunt it up, but would let him know some other time, if he did not find it himself. As a general thing, a Christian will get angry when one speaks against his God, and so did he. There was a good deal more said, but as I am a poor writer I will not undertake to giv an account of it. Now, I would like to hav you, Mr. Editor, inform me on these two Bible questions through your paper. I hav no Bible myself.

Yours for light, JOHN LARSON.

[The texts wanted are Num. xxxi, 17, 18, and Deut. xiv, 21.—ED. T. S.]

GUTHRIE CENTER, IOWA, March 5, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. M. A. Freeman delivered a splendid Freethought lecture here March 1st. It was the first Liberal lecture given in this place. Some of the orthodox spouted pretty loudly, but many considered it the best lecture that had ever struck the town, and it will long be remembered, while all the Liberal friends will welcome Mrs. Freeman back whenever it is announced for her to come.

I am sorry not to be able to send you a few subscribers by this time, but I hav some promised; will do my best. I like your paper. The other world has no charms for me until I get through with this one.

Some of your correspondents complain of the way you treat Henry George. I can say your paper was the means of making a Georgeite out of me. It set me to thinking, and studying his works for myself; and I would advise Mr. Denslow to read them before he writes again. I am confident that Henry George is on the road that leads to freedom, and I think that if every Liberal would do all he could to propagate Henry George's doctrin he would be doing a noble work. Still, I must confess that you hav got to drive the ghosts out of the clouds before you can hav a good government. These devilish imps are always a hindrance to any good reform. They call this a Christian country, meanwhile gambling in the natural elements and forcing wages to the starvation-point. I would like to take all the Christians in Christendom and put them off by themselvs and see them trample on one another. Some Liberals are no better than some Christians. I don't mean that they are all opposed to reform, but believe I am safe in saying the most of them are. E. B. RIGLER.

LEON, IA., March 20, 288.

MR. EDITOR: We regret we hav lost a charter-member of our Leon Secular Union, Mrs. A. B. Hall, on March 1st. She was a fearless advocate of Secular principles—one that dared to think, read, and investigate for herself and giv the result of her convictions to her many friends. She lived to a mature age, and was a good citizen, wife, and mother. She was earnest and logical in her advanced views. As a Spiritualist she thought immortality would be the result of natural law. Reason, truth (as she saw it), justice, mercy, and love were her guide, and happiness the end. To do good was her religion. She livs in our memories.

We shall endeavor to hav monthly meetings this summer, with Sunday science schools, lectures, etc.

JOHN W. LONG.

AKRON, O., March 4, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It is with pleasure that I am permitted to write you for the first time. I am living in a priest-ridden city. Our children are compelled to say the Lord's Prayer. In room No. 4 the teacher bent the young minds of scholars to the Methodists; in No. 5, to the Baptists, and so on through the rest of the rooms. That time should be used in study that would benefit the youth on this earth. Let children choose for themselvs, and the churches would be used for other purposes in less than fifty years. I believe in that time we would be a mass of Freethinkers and free people. My reason for being a Liberal is based on the Bible, and pretending Christians, who are nothing more than genuin hypocrits. They pray long and loud—then beat who they can to pay the pew rent and priests.

I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. I miss S. P. Putnam's letters very much. I like to read "Letters from Friends." Find inclosed twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL for 1888. Yours for truth, L. D. TRIPLETT.

BASSETT, IA., March 7, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: We wish to express through THE TRUTH SEEKER our thanks to Mrs. Freeman. We had the rare treat of listening to her splendid elucidation of "His Satanic Majesty" last Sunday evening. Despite icy roads and a very bad snowstorm, a respectable audience was out. Our postmaster, Mr. Dillenbeck, acted as chairman. When Mrs. Freeman dealt in pathos, a deathlike stillness reigned over the audience. Profound attention was awakened by her faultless logic; while her sallies of brilliant wit and cutting sarcasm elicited round after round of laughter and applause. We hav had Remsburg here twice—all honor to him—but as an able speaker and fluent talker Mrs. Freeman is his equal, if not his superior. This heroin iconoclast, by her pleasant, musical voice and sympathetic reasoning, gained the respect and admiration of her more orthodox sisters, and from the liberal sale of pamphlets there is no question that her intellectual shafts were driven home, and that Freethought has received an impetus that will be a lasting momentum as time rolls on. Feeling proud of such a noble champion of Liberalism, We remain, JAS. A. HUFFMAN,
JOHN FRAZER,
BENJ. FRAZER.

OTTAWA, CAN., March 24, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: It affords me much pleasure to send you the name of a new subscriber, while renewing my own subscription. This new acquisition to our cause is an ex-Catholic. It is hard work to rub the sawdust off the eyes of a Catholic, but if you ever succeed, he generally proves a valuable convert to Freethought, as he has to avenge a long mental slavery. He is more aggressiv than old Liberals, and delights in provoking discussions. This one I hope will prove to be a lifelong subscriber to your valuable paper.

We hav had the usual winter revival here. Two Christian actors, Messrs. Crossley and Hunter—the first one a specialist in emotional preaching, the other a professor in "Christian singing"—hav wooed sinners yet unsaved with much pecuniary success—to themselvs.

This revival has had a good effect in that it provoked a discussion in one of the local papers, the Citizen, between "Progressiv Thought" and "Christian Thought." Mr. Hunter (the specialist), having in an unguarded moment attacked Liberalism in one of his sermons, was handled without gloves by "Progressiv Thought" in a long and well-written correspondence. The discussion continued during a week, and closed with a letter from "P. T.," who came out of the contest with flying colors. The ease with which this champion of Freethought vanquished "C. T." has been food for reflection to many, and can but hav the effect of Liberalizing the ideas of a number. May our progress increase until truth is the property of the humblest as of the most gifted. L. F. MATHÉ.

NEW BEDFORD, PA., April 12, 288.

MR. EDITOR: We must keep informed of the past doings and present wishes and purposes of that most infernal and brutal of all religious organizations, the Catholic church. If ever the natural and constitutional rights of our citizens are overthrown and crushed out, it will be done by that colossal enemy of human rights, liberty, and progress, assisted by the blind, infatuated bigots who constitute the God-in-the-Constitution party. They hav no correct idea of human rights or human equality. Unfortunately we hav in this vicinity a practical illustration of the state of society we are threatened with under Catholic influence. In the neighboring city of Youngstown, O., there is a valley which used to be called "Smoky Hollow," but is now sometimes called "Hell's Hollow," and sometimes "the Valley of Rascals." Its inhabitants are mainly Irish Catholics. They hav a surfeit of parochial schools and churches. They hav everything their own way—after their own heart. It is a fair sample of a Catholic millennium, and I doubt if there is a community on the face of the earth that can produce more infamous, lying rascals per capita than it can. The boys, backed and encouraged by their parents, will, if they are able, rob you in the street at noonday of everything in your wagon or possession. Many farmers, when doing business or selling produce in that part of the city, deem it necessary to carry their revolvers for protection. And if this is the result here, where the surrounding higher civilization tends to stimulate them to better deeds and a higher morality, what would it be without it? I rejoice in the exposure you make from week to week of this gigantic pious fraud. I wish Mr. McArthur, or some other capable person, would compile from undeniable Catholic authorities proofs of the cruelty, treachery, debauchery, and degrading influence of that church in the past, and its designs against freedom and human advancement in the present and future. Such a document would be invaluable in meeting and crushing these wily and dangerous enemies. If THE TRUTH SEEKER would leave the discussion of tariff, free trade, and other side issues to the political parties, where they seem legitimately to belong, and devote the space to enlightening us as above suggested, I would feel much more benefited. W. W. WALKER.

CORUNNA, IND., March 10, E.M. 288.

MR. EDITOR: The glad tidings gleaned each week from THE TRUTH SEEKER are music in my ear. From afar come mingled voices of rejoicing for the advent of the coming reason's dawn. I rejoice to know that in other places our cause is advancing with gigantic strides, although here and there the slimy tail of that detestable serpent Superstition drags its blighting influence over the land. It is my sad lot to be cast among a community of non-progressiv antediluvians, who, like St. Paul, are determined to know nothing except Jesus Christ and him crucified. Many will perhaps not believe me, but it is a fact that a majority of my neighbors still believe in just such an earth and heaven as pictured by Heston in a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, with the sun going around. So you see that picture just suited them; thus Watson has failed to make a point among this class. I secured the services of J. L. Andrew last winter and managed to get out a goodly audience, but, alas! although he spoke very plain English, scarcely any could comprehend the subject he handled in so masterly a way. I am convinced that lecturing to deadheads is time and energy wasted. If we would Secularize, we must first educate the ignorant masses. I hav striven hard in this unequal battle with a zeal worthy of a better success than has yet crowned my efforts, but with such a beacon light as THE TRUTH SEEKER to guide my course I cannot waver. It behooves me that it is the duty of all Liberals to do all that lies within their power to advance a higher system of education. Teach the people astronomical, geological, and scientific facts. Teach the people that worlds are more plenty than gods, and that real suns outnumber the sons of God a billion to none. Evolution gains no foothold among the unrefined. To them the clay and rib story, so beloved by Mr. Grabill, is plainer and easier than the complicated testimony given in evidence of evolution. Slowly but surely, the world moves on toward a higher plane of human attainment. JOSEPH A. SHADE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., April 1, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I am not one who thinks Mrs. H. A. Richey's letter in your last paper out of place, for I believe that all sides should be heard, and that is my reason for writing a short reply that I hope will find room in THE TRUTH SEEKER. In the first place, the lady does not seem to hav a clear idea of what the fundamental principles of evolution are, and if she has read the writers she names she must hav done so very carelessly. She seems to guess at what evolutionists believe and then very nicely refutes her wrong guessing. First, no one that I know of claims that an "unintelligent nature has" made any "decrees" whatever, and the reason why water expands with cold has nothing to do with evolution or an intelligent cause. She says she "finds that Darwinians must admit that according to their hypothesis there was a time when the laws of inheritance as they now exist did not exist," and that "they must also admit that the laws of variation upon which the theory depends hav ceased to be." Now, the fact is that we do not admit any such thing, and both laws exist to-day as they always hav existed and always will. No evolutionist will admit that science is against him, and that there is no evidence in favor of the theory. He knows there is, and further that no fact has ever been shown to be inconsistent with the evolution theory. But I will not only correct errors, but respectfully proceed to present the principle of evolution, as, I understand, it is taught by the most advanced minds of the day.

First is the great law of heredity, which is that all things reproduce, similarly, but with slight variations, their own species. Second, the law of the survival of the strongest, which is that those individuals whose variations are favorable to their preservation, such as greater strength in any part or more perfect adaptation to their surroundings, are the most likely to get a living and produce healthy offspring, and this, being continually repeated, gradually produces noticeable variation in species, till the creature, whatever it is, becomes adapted to its environment.

Thousands of facts show these laws to be at work to-day. Change an animal of one climate, one kind of soil, to another climate and soil, where it is with difficulty able to survive, and a few generations will show marked variations toward better adaptation. Example—Southern corn and Northern corn are the same, or will become so, if raised in the same climate. Such things hav been noticed times without number, by many scientists—Darwin, Haeckel, Huxley, and others—and in fact can be seen by any careful, systematic observer. Both Darwin and Haeckel recount their personal experience and success in producing new species by the laws of selection and heredity.

I will not recount a list of what any must admit, for I hav no inclination to force anyone to admit anything. I am not a Christian. It is very easy to answer a theory before one has become thoroughly aware of what it is. "Look before you leap," and read before you refute, is my advice to all.

C. L. HASKELL.

GRANTFORK, ILL., March 25, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: I will send you a few names of persons who, I think, would subscribe if they read your valuable paper once. They are all wealthy, honored, and well-known men. I am scattering my papers around this town, but times are hard, or else I think I could get some subscribers. Just keep Mr. Heston working those pictures up, for they hav a world of meaning, and I think they are better than words could bring it out. This is a small town, but is booming. We hav here a famous spring called the Diamond Mineral Springs. The proprietors are just completing a large hotel, and we hav a chance of getting a railroad. Those mottoes I got from you I am very well pleased with, especially the Nine Demands, and the great Freethinkers occupy a conspicuous place in my saloon. ANTON J. KRAFT.

LEXINGTON, KY., March 9, 1888.

MR. EDITOR: Mrs. Z. Wallace has just delivered a lecture here on "Woman's Rights." It seems that American women are expected to prop up our falling country, leaning on the holy clergy, the clergy leaning on God.

The gigantic scheme of Henry George furnishes a remedy for the wrongs of our race. A small tax on every foot of land will secure to every child born into the world protection and support in the hour of trouble, poverty, or sickness. Compulsory education and strict attention to the rules of politeness and morality will do the rest.

It is evident that monopolism must be sure that its power is tottering to its fall before the next golden principle will be embraced. Is there any well-digested scheme which will attract the attention of the greedy capitalist? A moral earthquake, or the dread of one, is all that can save our country at the present crisis. The hard crust which shields the horrors of the ancient régime must burst asunder before a new order of things can be established. Disraeli said: "Alter the tactics of trade and redeem the country." A railroad enterprise once saved England. A great principle, a general understanding, a secret correspondence—these propagated Infidel ideas in the time of Bolingbroke.

I hav no fear that the pope of Rome will ever be master in this country, but I hav no doubt that the mass of the people regard with silent indignation the contemptible weakness of such men as Cleveland and Blaine, flattering, as they did, in a servil manner, a religious tyrant, who seeks the destruction of our noble republic. Dr. McGlynn knows what are the artful designs of this proud dignitary. Why not listen to his voice? We may believe that the old political parties are rotten and ready to fall to pieces when we find that the only method of propping up their decayed carcasses is for delegates to prostrate their shameless bodies (pampered parasites as they are) to a level with the toe of a pope, whose smile is the leer of a basilisk, his breath the poison of the asp, warmed in the heart of freedom. Away with such miscreants! If there is one honest man who can help us in such an emergency (Colonel Ingersoll), entreat him to accept the high position which he deserves.

Rough reforms are not conducted on any wise principle of reconstruction, though a moral earthquake seems often necessary to rend the iron crust of error. Christians ought to love every system of advance which improves the human race by a natural process, but they are not famed for anything of the kind. ALHAZA.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., April 11, 288.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a remarkable letter from God's vicegerent to "his excellency," the "ruler" of our "nation." This letter proves the truth of my prediction in THE TRUTH SEEKER, not long since, that as Blaine had his Burchard in 1884, Cleveland would surely find his in 1888. Of course, he will get the Catholic vote, but only that, and nothing more. Thus we see how apt the newly fledged politician is to monkey with sacred things, even with popes and "sich." No bull that Leo might hav sent thundering over this continent against this Buffalo politician could hav more effectually damned his prospects for reëlection than this marvelous letter. Alas, how frail the modern demagog! In plaintiv strains this mighty "ruler" wrote the modest Puck anent the lying newspaper press of the country. Since St. Paul justified lying, and bragged with brazen impudence of his craftiness, and how he caught them with guile, the religious press, at least, has some excuse for keeping the lie up. Nevertheless, hypocrisy and adultery should never be forgiven on earth; though in heaven, by St. Peter, this most blasphemous liar who denied his God, they are doubtless overlooked.

Go for the Mormons, Grover; go for polygamy, and you will cover a multitude of your own sins. NELSON HUNT.

THE LETTER.

"TO OUR BELOVED SON, JAMES GIBBONS, Cardinal Priest of the Holy Roman Church, Archbishop of Baltimore: Well-beloved son, health and benediction. Among the countless congratulations which we hav received from all parts of the world upon the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of our election to the priesthood, we hav, as was natural, set most store by the evidence of courtesy and regard sent by the rulers of the nations. For by these marks of their good-will toward the head of the church, they manifest, and this we ardently desire, their kindly disposition toward their Catholic subjects. Since, then, the illustrious president of the United States has, through you, our beloved son, seen fit to exhibit a like courtesy, accompanying the expression of the same with a gift of a superb copy of the Constitution of that most powerful republic, he has, in so doing, afforded us a peculiar pleasure and satisfaction. Moreover, as it is fitting that we should return to his excellency the expression of our gratitude, we commit the discharge of that duty to you, both on account of your exalted rank in the hierarchy of the republic, and of the personal esteem in which his excellency holds you.

"In fulfilling this duty we desire that you should assure the president of our admiration for the Constitution of the United States, not only because it has enabled industrious and enterprising citizens to attain so high a degree of prosperity, but also because, under its protection, your Catholic countrymen hav enjoyed a liberty which has so confessedly promoted the astonishing growth of their religion in the past, and will, we trust, enable it in the future to be of the highest advantage to the civil order as well. You will be pleased to add that we will pour forth fervent prayer to God for your country's constant advance in glory and prosperity, and for the health and happiness of the president and his worthy family.

"Finally, to you, beloved son, and to the faithful intrusted to your pastoral care, we lovingly, in the Lord, impart our apostolic benediction.

"Given at Rome, at St. Peter's, the 4th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1888, and the tenth of our pontificate.

"LEO, P. P. XIII."

FALL RIVER, KAN., April 8, 1888.
